BENGAL REVENUE SELECTIONS.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL, Dated 28th October 1808.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 28 October 1808.

Par. 36. From the proceedings noted in the margin* your Honourable Court will observe, that we have deemed it advisable to institute a commission for the superintendence of the ensuing settlement of the district of Cuttack, and of the Mehals which were formerly dependent on that district, but of which the collections have been since committed to the charge of the Agent at Hidgellee.

37. Were proofs required of the expediency of a local control in the performance of a duty of that nature, the strongest might be drawn from the circumstances which led to this arrangement.

38. By sections 5 and 6, Regulation X, 1807, it was enacted, that a settlement should be made with the Zemindars, and other actual proprietors of land in the district of Cuttack, for the period of four years from the commencement of the current fussily year, and that the jumma which might be assessed on the lands in the last year of that settlement, should remain fixed in perpetuity, provided that the Zemindars were willing to engage for the payment of the public revenue on those terms, and the arrangement should receive the sanction of your Honourable Court.

39. It was consequently expected, that the Board of Revenue and the Collector would be fully prepared to enter upon the performance of that duty, on or before the commencement of the current umlee year (the era of the province of Orissa) beginning in the month of September last.

40. From the proceedings, however, above noticed, it will appear, that very little progress had been made in compiling the accounts and information which were indispensably requisite for the due discharge of the duty in question.

41. These circumstances appeared to us to oppose an insurmountable obstacle to the immediate conclusion of the settlement on the principles above stated. Impressed, however, with the strongest conviction of the benefits which would be experienced in the district of Cuttack, in common with the rest of the country, from rendering the settlement permanent at the earliest practicable period of time, it was determined that a settlement should be made in the Zillah of Cuttack and the other places above described, for the period of one year, viz. the current umlee year 1216; and that, on the expiration of that period, a settlement should be made in that Zillah, &c. for the term of three years, and that the assessment, the last year of that term, should remain fixed for ever, in case the arrangement should receive the sanction of your Honourable Court.

42. With the view, also, of guarding against the recurrence of the disappointment above noticed, and of establishing a more efficient control over the Collector in the discharge of that important duty, a temporary commission was constituted, and invested with all the duties, powers, and authority, which had been exercised by the Board of Revenue in the district of Cuttack and its late dependencies.

43. Mr. C. Buller, a member of the Board of Revenue, was at the same time appointed Commissioner for the performance of the duty in question.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,
Dated 1*st February* 1811.

Letter from, 28th October 1808.
(Par. 36 to 43.) Appointment of a Commission to superintend a settlement of the district of Cuttack and of the Mehals formerly dependent upon it, and an explanation of the causes which led to that arrangement.

Par. 15. Deeming the subject of these paragraphs to be one of considerable importance, both in itself and in its collateral bearings, we think it right to put you fully in possession of our sentiments upon their contents.

16. We cannot but express our surprise and concern at the little progress which has been made, as late as September 1808, in compiling the accounts and information, indispensably requisite for the discharge of that duty which had been imposed on the Board of Revenue and Collector, by sections 5 and 6 of Regulation X, 1807; nor can we overlook the strong insinuation of a charge of remissness against the Collector or his predecessor.

17. In consequence of this disappointment, you deputed Mr. C. Buller, a member of the Board of Revenue, with an Assistant, to superintend the formation of a settlement in the Zillah of Cuttack and its dependencies, for a period of one year, and afterwards for a term of three years, proposing that the assessment of the last year of that term should remain fixed in perpetuity, in the case of our sanctioning the arrangement.

18. When we find two Members of the Board of Revenue professing, in 1808, their want of knowledge of the boundaries and extent of a province of which we came into possession in 1803; their ignorance of the quantity of land liable to assessment; of its produce and value; of the state and extent of cultivation; of the nature of the tenures by which property is held; in short, of the rights and interests both of Government and the subject; we cannot, in the absence of all explanation, reconcile this deficiency of information with an assiduous and active discharge of the duties confided to the Board. At the same time, we cannot help agreeing in the inference deduced from the fact in the Report recorded by Mr. Cox and Mr. Tucker, of the inexpediency of proceeding, under such circumstances, to assess in perpetuity the public demand on the province.

19. In our Revenue Letter, dated 27th February 1810 (par. 44 to 47), we communicated to you our opinion, that it would be premature to introduce the permanent settlement into the Upper Provinces, at so early a period of our connexion with them, and in so imperfect a stage of our acquaintance with their resources. In proportion as our knowledge of Cuttack is more defective than of these provinces, our conviction of the unseasonableness of hastily attempting such a measure in that Zillah is still more decided.

20. Before undertaking so arduous a task, as that of irrevocably settling in perpetuity the lands of a province, and fixing the demand of Government upon those lands in perpetuity, we have always considered a patient and laborious scrutiny of individual rights, a careful investigation of local peculiarities, together with a minute and detailed survey of the extent, cultivation, and productive powers of the territory, as indispensable. By omitting the two first of these operations, we should risk falling into errors which could not be renounced without discredit, and in which it might be often dangerous to persevere: and the last (viz. a survey of the lands), though it be attended with considerable trouble and expense, is necessary to a fair and equal assessment, while the discoveries of fraudulent concealments or improper alienations resulting from it, have in general, we believe, much more than compensated for the additional charge incurred.

21. It is known to you, that in the management of the Conquered and Ceded Territories, which have been annexed to the two subordinate Presidencies, this course has been successfully pursued; and if, after the precautions which it supposes, we have any thing to regret, it is the precipitation, not the tardiness, by which a change of system has been brought about in some districts of the Carnatic.

22. If,

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 1 February 1811.

22. If, in settling the lands of the Bengal provinces, a particular survey was not judged to be necessary, it was because, from long possession, we supposed ourselves (perhaps too hastily) to be thoroughly acquainted with their resources.

23. We are not unaware of the strong objections to which the Mahommedan revenue system is liable, particularly after being vitiated by the abuses of a Mahratta administration. We know the detail of intricate accounts which it involves; the expensive establishments which it occasions; the acts of fraudulent concealment, exactions, and collusion, which it covers; the irksome and pernicious restraints by which it fetters and impedes cultivation; and duly impressed with the weight of these objections, we would not embody the plan to which they adhere into the permanent economy of our Government. But we doubt not of your being fully sensible, that in India sudden innovations are to be avoided, and that all changes, however benignant they may be in principle or salutary in operation, must be cautiously and gradually insinuated among a people, with whom established usage holds the place of almost every recommendation to respect.

24. It may so happen, too, that a fiscal system, which it would be impolitic permanently to adopt, will lend itself for a time with advantage both to our present wants and future objects. With a view to imposing a tax in perpetuity upon the land, with a proper regard to the contributive power of the landholder and the just expectations of Government, it is surely desirable that the latter, before fixing the maximum of its demand, should fully explore and ascertain the extent and value of those resources from which its contributions are to be derived; since, by rating them according to an arbitrary standard or by vague conjecture, we could hardly avoid either doing injustice to individuals, or making improvident sacrifices on the part of the public. Hence a Ryotwar system, though in many respects objectionable, has been found highly useful in several districts of our recently acquired territories, and among others, in the provinces of Guzerat, ceded to us by the Mahrattas, in enabling us to draw forth their resources, and to arrive at a knowledge of the full amount of their taxable means.

25. What has been the system, hitherto, of administering the revenues of Cuttack, we are not informed, and therefore the last observation may, or may not, be applicable to the present state of that province. Our object is to impress upon your mind a sense of the importance we attach to the exercise of caution and circumspection, in the formation of an arrangement which involves the credit of Government and the interests of its subjects, and to a certain extent, its competence to supply the present and to provide for future exigencies.

26. Without meaning either to undervalue the advantages of the permanent settlement of the Bengal provinces, or to desert the principle on which it was formed, it cannot have escaped your attention, that it has some practical inconveniences; inconveniences which are more felt in India than they would be in any other country, under the same or a similar arrangement.

27. The objects of that settlement were to confer upon the different orders of the community a security of property, which they never before enjoyed; to protect the landholders from arbitrary and oppressive demands on the part of Government; to relieve the proprietors of small estates from the tyranny of the powerful Zemindars; and to free the whole body of merchants and manufacturers, and all the lower orders of the people, from the heavy impositions to which they have been long subjected.

28. For the attainment of these objects, the East-India Company, in its capacity of Dewan of these provinces, set an example of equity and moderation, by not only repealing such imposts as were oppressive in their nature, but by fixing in perpetuity its demands upon the lands.

29. One inconvenience of an arrangement of this kind was foreseen at the time when the decennial settlement was framed; and the same inconvenience would have occurred, under a similar arrangement, in any country. It was obvious, that from the circumstance of some estates being more improvable than others, a permanent assessment of the land must, in course of time, become unequal.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 1 February 1811.

unequal. But it was wisely deemed preferable to encounter the inconvenience of ultimate inequality, rather than, by arresting improvement, to keep the whole class of landholders in a state of lasting poverty and depression.

30. It is more problematical, whether the interests of Government were equally consulted in this measure with those of the subject. These interests, when properly understood, we are well aware never can be at variance: but the want of just perceptions upon their true nature and affinities, sometimes makes it necessary to treat them as if they were governed by separate and distinct rules; and in all circumstances, political institutions, it must be admitted, ought to have a reference to the peculiar habits and prejudices of the people for whom they are intended, as well as to the generally acknowledged laws of utility.

31. From the depreciation which has taken place in the value of money in the course of the last twenty-five years, (another inconvenience which is not peculiar to India), we find that our supplies, instead of growing with the demand upon them, are decreasing almost in the inverse ratio of the multiplication of our wants.

32. It was, indeed, imagined at the period of the establishment of the Bengal settlement, that in proportion as the effects naturally to be expected from an enlarged and liberal policy were developed, in proportion as the land was improved, activity given to commerce, and as the people were enriched, our Government would be able, by means of taxation on the necessaries and luxuries of life, not only to indemnify itself for the sacrifices it had made, and for any contingent loss which it might sustain from the depreciation of money, but that our revenues might be made to advance in equal proportions with the prosperity of the country, and that both would go on flourishing in rapid progression. We are afraid, however, that this calculation was rather too sanguine, and that it was formed without sufficient attention to those local peculiarities, by which the hopes founded upon it might be disappointed. But supposing that in Bengal our expectations had been realised to their full extent, it would not follow, that a plan of settlement, which had succeeded in a country of which we had been from twenty to thirty years in possession, was equally applicable to provinces which have lately devolved under our authority.

33. It is not foreign to the subject brought under our consideration, in the paragraphs of your letter above referred to, shortly to glance at those circumstances in the state of India which tend to obstruct the improvement of the public revenue, by means of taxation on objects different from the land; and a little reflection, even upon things with which we are most familiar, sometimes leads to good practical results.

34. Consumable commodities have generally, after the land, been reckoned among the fairest objects of taxation. Imposts of this description, though more difficult of collection than a land-tax, do not so directly invade the sources of reproduction. But it is only amongst a luxurious people that, without becoming oppressive to the individual and highly pernicious to the interests of the community at large, their produce can be rendered very considerable.

35. That such a system of taxation has been successfully adopted in England, is admitted; but it will not therefore follow, that the introduction of it in India will be attended with equal advantage. The experiment, as far as it has gone, confirms the truth of this observation; and for the grounds of it we have only to consider the difference in the state of the two countries, and the peculiar habits, customs, and prejudices of the natives of India, with reference to the established principles of political economy.

36. Without, however, renouncing the benefit of a system of taxation, which may, to a certain degree, be productive, it cannot be denied, that our territorial revenues constitute the principal stay of our Government; that the revenue arising from the land, being that mode of contribution to which the natives have been most accustomed, has fewer prejudices to encounter than any other which could be resorted to; and that, in assessing its amount to perpetuity, the reflection ought to be always present to our minds, that we are imposing bounds to the demands of the state, ignorant of the future extent of the public exigencies.

37. Whether

37. Whether the considerations to which we have been adverting ought to have any other effect upon our financial administration, than merely to inculcate a prudent and cautious application to our newly acquired territories of the principles of the permanent settlement, as established in the Bengal provinces, is an important and difficult question; nor do we feel ourselves competent to offer any suggestions on this subject which appear free from objection.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 1 February 1811.

38. In stating our sense of the inconveniences which have been felt in the existing settlement of the Bengal provinces, our object is to prevent, as far as possible, the recurrence of similar inconveniences in Cuttack, by considering that, when the assessment of a province has once been fixed in perpetuity, the faith of Government is irrevocably pledged to the maintenance of it; that no inhancement of its amount can afterwards take place to meet the exigencies of the state, however great; and, on the other hand, that casualties may occur, to prevent the complete realization of its amount, whilst a resort to the other modes of taxation, adverted to in the preceding paragraphs, affords but little prospect of additional resource. Considering, also, the other observations connected with this subject into which we have entered, we are persuaded that every precaution will be adopted by you, in forming the settlement of Cuttack, with an ultimate view to its permanency, that the importance of the measure and our remarks suggest.

39. At present, however, we deem it expedient to direct, that no settlement shall be declared permanent, in Cuttack or any other of our provinces, till the whole proceedings preparatory to it have been submitted to us, and till your resolutions upon these proceedings have received our sanction and concurrence.

40. As so little appears to be known of the actual state of Cuttack, we approve of your having deputed Mr. C. Buller, one of the Members of the Board of Revenue, with Mr. G. Warde as an Assistant, with full powers and authority to act as a Commission to superintend a temporary settlement of the province; and we trust that the information which will be obtained by the Commission, in the execution of this important trust, will enable you, at some future and not very distant period, to proceed to a permanent settlement of the land revenues of that district, on principles mutually advantageous to Government and the landholders.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,
Dated 27th November, 1811.

Par 2. Our attention has been particularly directed, by your late dispatches in the Revenue department, to a consideration of the question of the expediency of extending the permanent settlement, as established in Bengal, to the Upper Provinces and Cuttack. The question is of such importance, when viewed in reference to the character, the stability, and permanent resources of our Government, on the one hand, and to the rights and legitimate interests of all classes of our subjects, on the other, that a hasty decision upon it would be equally impolitic and unsafe. We shall not, therefore, give an opinion now upon the system of administration which it may eventually be proper to introduce into those provinces, the revenues of which have not been definitively fixed, intending, at an early period, to convey to you our sentiments fully upon the subject.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 27 November 1811

3. The object of the present dispatch is to caution you, in the most pointed manner, against pledging us to the extension of the Bengal fixed assessment to our newly acquired territories. We are aware of your resolution, not to declare any settlement permanent till it has obtained our sanction and approbation. It is not, however, without anxiety, that we have learned from your late dispatches, that a triennial lease has been concluded in the Upper Provinces, which expires, we believe, in the course of April 1812, whereby the assessment in the third year of the lease has been declared by you to be permanent, provided that we shall confirm the terms of settlement, because this arrangement may have excited an expectation, on the part of the natives, which we are not by any means prepared to satisfy.

4. We have perused with attention the report of the Commissioners in the Upper Provinces, dated 13th April, 1808, which only reached us in September last; and the impression which we have received from it is, that the proposed final settlement of the revenues of these territories would be premature, supposing the arrangement otherwise to be completely unexceptionable. It would be attended ultimately with a large sacrifice of revenue; and we are by no means sufficiently acquainted, either with the resources of the country, or with the rights and ancient customs of the different classes of landholders, to venture upon a step of so much importance, and in its nature irrevocable. Whether the measure may be eligible at a future period, and what modifications it may be prudent to apply to it, are questions which will remain open for discussion. In the mean time, you are directed to continue to administer the revenues of these provinces under a renewed lease for a term not exceeding five years.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 20th June, 1808.

Report of the Board of Commissioners in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, dated 13th April, 1808.

To the Right Honourable Lord Minto, Governor-General in Council, Fort William.

My Lord:

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

1. Your Lordship has been apprised, that the late Commission, of which we had the honour to be constituted Members, was employed, from the commencement of November last, in visiting the different districts of the Ceded and Conquered Territory, for the purpose of superintending the formation of the settlement, under the provisions contained in Regulation X. of 1807.

2. Unequal as we consider ourselves to the duty, we should have had great satisfaction in reporting to your Lordship in Council the completion of it; but although it has not been our good fortune to see the work brought to a successful termination, it is still incumbent upon us to submit to Government all the little information which we have had an opportunity of collecting, during the time that we were employed on this particular service.

3. At an early period it became evident to us, that we should not be able to superintend the formation of the settlement in person, throughout the several districts of the Ceded and Conquered Territory. It was scarcely possible to traverse this extensive country within the season which admits of travelling in tents; while to form the assessment on the spot, and to obtain engagements from the numerous Malguzars, several months must have been dedicated to the business of a single district. It became necessary, therefore, to commit the execution of this duty to the local officers, and to direct our attention to those general objects, on which we could hope to employ ourselves with more effect.

4. From a tour through the country, we could still anticipate some benefit to the public service. With a view to the question of a permanent settlement, it was desirable that we should be enabled to form, from actual observation, a general idea of the state of cultivation in the different districts, and of the means which the country possessed of future improvement.

5. It was desirable that we should have personal communication with the Collectors, in order that we might have an opportunity of observing in what manner the public business was conducted, and that the necessity for a voluminous correspondence might, as far as possible, be obviated. Questions had arisen on the proper construction and application of the Regulations; particular instructions became necessary for the purpose of preserving uniformity of proceeding in concluding the settlement; and cases were likely to occur, which would require much explanation from the local officers, to enable us to form a correct judgment on them.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

6. It was desirable, at the same time, that we should visit the different districts, in order that we might be enabled to judge, in some manner, how far the Tehsildars, Canongoes, and other native officers, were qualified for their respective situations, and how far the offices of Tehsildar and Canongoe could be considered necessary or useful. We also wished that individuals, who might have reason to complain of the conduct of those officers, should have ready access to us, without being compelled to travel to a distant part of the country. We must observe in this place (and we do it with great satisfaction), that throughout our tour few complaints were preferred to us against the Tehsildars, who have of late become the objects of such severe reprobation. But we shall have occasion to submit to your Lordship in Council some general remarks on the office of Tehsildar in a subsequent part of this address.

7. Another object of our tour was to obtain a personal knowledge of the principal landholders, to ascertain their character and disposition towards our Government, to conciliate their good will, and to endeavour to inspire them with confidence in our national justice and good faith.

ETAWAH.

Jumma of 1210	..........................Sicca Rupees	25,82,000
.... 1211	....	25,56,000
.... 1212	....	25,82,000
.... 1213	....	25,24,000
.... 1214	....	25,51,000
.... 1215	....	25,46,000

8. Early in the month of November we proceeded to the district of Etawah, and have since had the honour of submitting to your Lordship in Council a particular account of the assessment of that district, as formed by the Acting Collector, Mr. Salmon.

9. From this account it will appear, that a net increase of revenue may be expected at the ensuing settlement, to the amount of about 45,000 rupees; and we have reason to believe that the assessment will still be moderate, as we had occasion to observe in our letter to Government of the 2d of February last.

10. In observing moderation in the assessment, the Acting Collector not only, we think, manifested a just regard to the situation and claims of the landholders and peasantry, and to the general interests of the country, but he acted in conformity with what we believed to be your Lordship's intentions and wishes, and upon considerations which appear to us as much the dictates of policy as of justice. It is scarcely possible, in any case, to separate the interests of the Government and of its subjects; but in this country, where the ruling power assumes so large a portion of the produce of the soil, and where it is in reality in the situation of the landlord, the identification of interest is more clear and decided. The country is an immense estate, and the Government have an immediate interest in encouraging the labours of the peasantry, in aiding the industry of its numerous tenants, and in promoting generally the agricultural prosperity of its extensive possessions.

11. Nor do we mention, as matter of reproach, that the land tax bears so considerable a proportion to the produce of the soil. We found the tax established by the Government which preceded us, the people were familiarized to it, and whatever objection the system may be liable to in theory, it would be extremely difficult to find other sources of revenue which could be substituted with advantage. Any innovation in an established system of taxation is usually productive of inconvenience; but in this country the capital is so small, when compared with the extent of territory and the population, that few proper objects of taxation present themselves. We have succeeded, it is true, in drawing a large revenue from the monopoly of salt and opium in the Lower Provinces; and notwithstanding the clamour which has so often been excited against monopolies, those taxes may, we think, be defended upon just principles. In this remark we can by no means comprehend the salt monopoly which was attempted in the Ceded Provinces. It can answer no useful purpose to comment upon past miscarriages; and the hasty manner in which the measure was abandoned, sufficiently shews that it was undertaken without due consideration.

12. We

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

12. We have had little success in our attempts to introduce customs and excise duties, upon the footing on which those taxes have been established in Europe. The consumption of valuable produce and expensive manufactures is too confined to admit of such taxes becoming productive; and the comparatively small number of persons who consume articles of luxury being dispersed over a great extent of country, the expense of collecting excise duties must necessarily be high, and disproportioned to the produce.

13. It would be necessary, also, to intrust the collection of them to the lower order of the native servants, upon whose fidelity and forbearance little dependence can be placed. Invested, as they must be, with a certain degree of authority, and placed beyond the reach of any efficient control, it is to be apprehended that they would often oppress the people with impunity, at the same time that they practised frauds upon the Government with little risk of detection.

14. These remarks may, perhaps, be considered out of place; but if there were any fair alternative, if any other proper object of taxation presented itself, or if the situation of the Government admitted of a sacrifice of the public revenue, it might have been proper, on our part, to adopt a more liberal standard of assessment than that which we deemed it our duty to prescribe to the Collectors. We directed those officers to assume generally the rate of ten per cent. as the allowance to be made for the income or profit of the landholder; this standard having been adopted at the formation of the settlement in the Lower Provinces, and having been indirectly recognized in the Regulations of 1803 and 1805, which provide for the payment of nankar to the Zemindars. In addition to the proprietory income of ten per cent., we authorised the Collectors to grant some small allowance, in particular cases, to defray the charge of collecting the rents of the landholder, where the expense was likely to be disproportionate to his means.

15. As we do not pretend to a knowledge of agriculture, we regret that it will not be in our power to submit to your Lordship in Council all the information which we could have wished, regarding the present state of the country, its husbandry, produce, the quality of the soil, and its means of future improvement. We must confine ourselves to general observations on this subject; and we shall more frequently refer to the authority of the local officers, without hazarding an opinion of our own.

16. The district of Etawah is described by the Acting Collector, Mr. Salmon, in his letter to the Board of Commissioners of the 28th October last; and as that gentleman resided in the district during several years, he had full opportunity of becoming intimately acquainted with it.

17. The district is represented by him as being thinly inhabited; and although he does not admit that it contains much arable land which is not already in a state of cultivation, he is of opinion that the country is capable of great improvement, by the introduction of a better husbandry, and by the cultivation of more valuable articles of produce.

18. The statistical accounts furnished by the Tehsildars, under our orders of the 5th August last, corroborate Mr. Salmon's opinion, with respect to there being only a small quantity of arable land at present abandoned, and we cannot therefore venture to oppose our own observation to such authority. Without more knowledge than we possess, it is impossible to judge accurately of the nature and capacity of the soil: but the most cursory observation will shew, that the district contains extensive tracts of waste land; and although it may not have been found practicable to produce a crop from it under the ordinary course of husbandry prevailing at present, we cannot think it is altogether incapable of tillage.

19. While the population of the country is so limited, when compared with the extent of its area; while it remains destitute of capital, and little encouragement is held out to industry and enterprize; it is presumable that the best land will be brought into cultivation. But if we can suppose the existence of good government, protection from foreign invasion, domestic tranquility and security, the increase of opulence among the people, the improvement of the art of husbandry, and the gradual advance of population, it cannot, we think, admit of a doubt, that much of the land which is now abandoned and waste in Etawah may be made to reward the labours of the husbandmen. In other words, it appears to us that land which might not produce a crop, when depending entirely upon the course of the seasons, may, by the application of greater labour, by the introduction of artificial means of husbandry, irrigation, the use of manure, &c. be rendered productive to the proprietor.

20. Nor is it of importance to enquire, whether the increase of cultivation must be preceded by an increase of population. In general, cultivation and population will advance together; and promoting each other reciprocally, it is scarcely possible to deduce the augmentation of either as a mere consequence.

21. The inhabitants of Etawah are represented by Mr. Salmon as being indigent, and rather warlike than agricultural, while the incursions of a foreign enemy, internal commotions, and a series of unfavourable seasons, have prevented or checked those advances towards a greater state of prosperity, which might otherwise have been expected.

22. The jumma at the last settlement is supposed to have been equally assessed, with some exceptions, and the income of the landholders is computed to have been in general rather below ten per cent. The more considerable Talookdars appear to have been most favoured at the former settlements; but in forming the present assessment, the Acting Collector has endeavoured, as much as possible, to equalize the jumma. That gentleman, however, seems to entertain an opinion, that it may be necessary to grant a higher per centage in the large estates, on account of the income and charges of the proprietor. But although we acquiesced in the propriety of the assessment proposed by him in the particular instance which gave rise to the remark, it did not appear to us, that such a distinction ought universally to be observed: on the contrary, at the formation of the settlement in Bengal, it was, we believe, considered necessary to grant a larger allowance for the charge of collecting the rents in the smaller estates. No general rate will be established, since the charges of collection must bear a different proportion to the rents in different places, according to local circumstances; and as the allowance made for the proprietor's income and expenses seldom exceeded ten per cent. in the aggregate, it became unnecessary for us to prescribe any particular rule for the guidance of the Collector.

23. Mr. Salmon is adverse to the plan of a russud, or progressively increasing jumma, on the ground that it would operate to discourage industry; and as several of the Collectors appeared to entertain the same apprehension, we did not urge the measure in any instance in which it was objected to.

24. Had circumstances, however, appeared to us to admit of the settlement being declared permanent, we should have insisted upon the adoption of a russud jumma in those estates which are capable of great improvement; for otherwise the assessment in a few years would have become altogether unequal. The proprietors of estates containing much uncultivated land would have possessed the means of ruining their neighbours, whose estates were fully assessed, by inducing the Ryots to quit such estates, for the purpose of undertaking the cultivation of waste lands at a low rent; the public revenue would, in consequence, become less secure in particular instances; and Government would not have obtained, generally, that participation in the produce of the country, which is considered to be its just due.

25. Mr. Salmon is of opinion, that the ensuing settlement ought not to be rendered permanent; and his objections to the plan of a permanent settlement are founded chiefly upon the situation and circumstances of the landholders, their property, their disputes for the proprietory right, the dispossession of many of the Zemindars, the delays of justice in determining contested claims, &c. &c.

26. We concur in opinion with that gentleman, that a permanent settlement would be unseasonable in the district of Etawah; but as we propose to submit our sentiments to your Lordship in Council on that important question, after a review shall have been taken of the state of the country, it is unnecessary for us to offer any observations on the subject in this place.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

27. The Acting Collector proposed, that the settlement should be concluded for a period of ten years, in preference to the plan of settlement prescribed by Regulation X of 1807; but in our letter to Government of the 31st October we observed, that the arguments urged by Mr. Salmon did not appear to us to be of sufficient weight, to induce us to recommend to your Lordship in Council that the existing Regulations, and the arrangements which had been made preparatory to the ensuing settlement, should be new-modelled or altogether superseded. A decennial settlement could not now be adopted, without a breach of faith on the one hand, or a total disregard to the situation and claims of the landholders on the other. The regulations and the resolutions of Government, of the 20th November, require that the ensuing settlement in the Ceded Provinces shall be concluded with the Farmers who engaged at the two first triennial settlements; and they could not now be excluded, merely because the term of the lease was extended, without manifest injustice. To extend their leases, however, beyond the term of four years, to the exclusiou of the Zemindars, would neither be just towards these persons, nor consistent with the policy which we have pursued, in all practicable cases, of giving the immediate management of the lands to those who have a permanent interest in them. Other objections might be urged to Mr. Salmon's plan of a decennial settlement, the want of information to render it more equal, &c. &c.; but the objection which we have noticed appears to us to be conclusive against it.

28. In the district of Etawah, and indeed in almost every district throughout the provinces, various questions have arisen, regarding the proprietory right of the landholders, and the claims of different individuals to be admitted to enter into engagements with Government at the formation of the ensuing settlement.

29. It is much to be regretted, that the Regulations do not provide clear and precise rules for determining the questions which have occurred; and until they are revised, we cannot perceive how they can be applied generally, without the danger of much private injury and much public mischief.

30. On those parts of the Regulations which have given rise to the discordant claims of the landholders and farmers, we had the honour to submit our sentiments to Government, under date the 28th October last, and your Lordship in Council was pleased to approve of our construction of the rules under which the claims of the parties are severally maintained.

31. In our letter of the 17th November, we had occasion to solicit your Lordship's orders upon a question which had arisen, under Clause 7, Section 53, Regulation XXVII, 1803, and Section 10, Regulation IX, 1805; but the orders communicated to us by Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell, in reply, not appearing to us to embrace the particular case which we had in view, we again addressed your Lordship on the subject, under date the 13th January.

32. The object of our reference was to ascertain, whether the superior Talookdars or the village Zemindars were to be recognized as the proprietors of the soil; and what circumstances should be admitted by us to constitute a right, on the part of the latter, to be separated from the authority of the superior Talookdars.

33. The question is quite distinct from that which has arisen between the landholders (whether Talookdars or Zemindars) and the farmers, although both questions may, in the Conquered Provinces, become the source of much embarrassment.

34. The terms of the Regulations applicable to the claims of the village Zemindars are vague and indefinite: but upon the determination of the question the right of property, in a large portion of our new territory, essentially depends; and if the Regulations can be considered to require the absolute emancipation of those persons from the authority of the superior Talookdars, any immediate attempt to enforce them might, we fear, endanger the public tranquillity. We are apprehensive, too, that the rule which directs that the Zemindars be admitted to engage under the second triennial settlement, to the exclusion of the farmers at present in possession, could not be enforced throughout the Conquered Districts, without equal danger of mischief.

35. In

35. In our letter of the 17th November, we had occasion to notice that great difficulty and inconvenience were experienced from the minute subdivision of landed property, and that the frequent disputes which take place in consequence among the numerous Putteedars, or sharers, were liable to impede the collection of the revenue and to create public disorder. Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

36. It was expected, probably, that the rule contained in Regulation VI, 1807, would provide effectually for the security of the revenue; but even with this limited view it has not answered the end proposed, and it has no effect whatever in preventing contests among the sharers, or the disorders which such contests are liable to produce.

37. The Regulation merely provides against the subdivision of estates, as far as regards the public assessment. The lands must yield a revenue to Government of at least 500 rupees per annum, or they cannot be admitted upon the public rental as a distinct estate; but the same lands may, in the course of inheritance, or by gift, sale, or otherwise, become the joint property of many individuals, and be held, in reality, as separate estates by the copartners.

38. It becomes, in this case, a question with whom the settlement should be made.

39. It sometimes happens that there are from ten to fifty Putteedars, or sharers,* in a single village. To assess the portion of each individual separately, would be contrary to the Regulations, and the public revenue would not be secure if the whole estate were not held responsible for it.

40. To collect from the sharers individually, under a general engagement, would be extremely difficult, and in some cases it would be impracticable.

41. If, as an alternative, the parties be required to select a representative or manager, who shall be immediately responsible to Government, much individual injury may be suffered. The manager may misappropriate the rents which he collects, and the whole estate be sold to make good his embezzlement; or the inferior sharers may withhold their rents, and the Collector must, in the same manner, dispose of the whole estate in satisfaction of the public demand, without enquiring in what quarter the default actually took place. This summary proceeding is become necessary; but the unfortunate Putteedar, who has regularly paid his proportion of the public demand, cannot understand it. It is not possible to satisfy him, that no distinction can be made between the parties, and that his little property can, with justice, be made answerable for the debts of another.

42. In our correspondence with the Collectors, and particularly in our letter to the Collector of Etawah, a copy of which was submitted to your Lordship in Council, under date the 2d of February, we gave such general instructions to those officers, with respect to the manner of forming the settlement with the Putteedars, as appeared to us best calculated to obviate the inconvenience which isexperienced from the minute subdivision of landed property; but to prevent all the ill consequences which are to be apprehended, an alteration in the existing law is, in our opinion, become necessary.

43. The question has been examined by a gentleman (Mr. Stuart of Benares) who is much better qualified than ourselves to give a just view of it; and as his sentiments will, we understand, be submitted publicly to your Lordship in Council, the opinions which we may hazard will either be corroborated by high authority, or experience an opposition, which will greatly diminish our own confidence in them.

44. Regulation XI. of 1793, which superseded a long-established usage in favour of primogeniture, has, we think, been attended with many ill consepuences; and this, among numerous instances, is calculated to shew the impolicy of hasty innovations.

45. The

* This is a very moderate number for a Hindoo family. "If we only suppose each couple of "our ancestors to have left, one with another, two children, and each of these children, on an "average, to have left two more (and without such a supposition the human species must be "daily diminishing), we shall find, that all of us have now subsisting near two hundred and "seventy millions of kindred in the fifteenth degree."—Blackstone.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

45. The Mahommedan government, in regulating the succession to zemindarries, were in the practice of conferring the inheritance on a single individual of the family; and in establishing a usage adverse to the principles of their law, they were, no doubt, influenced by the motives of public conveniency.

46. The pride of families and the feudal system produced in Europe the law in favour of primogeniture; but even in the countries of Europe, where the land-tax does not bear so large a proportion to the produce as it does in Hindostan, the minute subdivision of real property must have occasioned inconvenience, and the law, unjust as it may appear in principle, was founded upon public considerations. It was essential to the existence of the system under which it originated, and it seems to have been equally necessary under the system adopted by the Mahommedans in this country, for drawing their revenue almost exclusively from the land.

47. The Putteedars, the Hindoos in particular, might no doubt consider such a law as operating partially and unjustly; but we cannot perceive that the interests of the individuals themselves are at all consulted, by constituting innumerable small estates, which do not afford a subsistence to the proprietors.

48. Nor is it at all inconsistent with the ideas and practice of the Hindoos, to look up to the head of the family for protection and maintenance; and if by investing that head with the guardianship and control of the common stock, the feuds which sometimes prevail among them can be prevented, the apprehension of infringing a useless right ought not, in our opinion, to be allowed to operate for a moment.

49. We should be sorry to be suspected of treating the rights of others with levity; but the property which is liable to become the source of mischief to the proprietor himself, cannot be considered a possession which ought to be respected with too scrupulous a forbearance.

50. We have not, indeed, been able to discover, in the course of our enquiries, that the inferior Zemindars enjoyed, under the native government, the rights of proprietors. They appear to us to have been tenants of superior landlords; or tenants of the Government itself, in its character of landlord, in instances where the lands were committed to the immediate management of its own officers. Some of the more powerful Rajahs and Zemindars enjoyed, probably, all the rights of property in the land, as far as such rights can be enjoyed under a despotic government, and exercised also extensive powers as officers of the state: but this species of independence, which favour might bestow or which power might establish, is scarcely, we think, to be referred to any acknowledged principle in Government, that the possession of land conferred certain determinate rights.

51. We should display our own deficiencies, and should exceed the limits which we are compelled to prescribe to ourselves, if we attempted to discuss at large the nature of the tenures in this country, or to trace the principles and practice which obtained under its native rulers. When a government is despotic and is liable to frequent revolutions, fixed principles and uniform practice are not always to be found. But the system of our predecessors has been condemned in too indiscriminate a manner, and we may still, perhaps, borrow from their experience with the prospect of advantage.

52. It cannot become a question, that two orders of landholders should be recognized in the same estate, and Government must ultimately decide, whether the superior Talookdars or the village Zemindars are to be acknowledged as the actual proprietors of the soil.

53. In our letter of the 17th November, we observed that we could not undertake to trace the origin of the larger talooks. They may have arisen gradually, in the course of inheritance. The industry or good fortune of a family may have invested them with extensive possessions, or they may have been acquired by means less honourable; by favour or violence, by fraud or by intrigue.

54. If, however, the Talookdars were found by us in the possession of certain rights, and the exercise of those rights be not incompatible with the public safety safety, we can perceive no substantial reason for inquiring with too scrutinizing a spirit into their origin; and still less can we admit, that such rights ought hastily to be infringed.

55. A mere name cannot be deemed sufficient to convey a property. If the village Zemindars enjoyed no other right than that of occupying; if their possession was attended with no other benefit than the privilege of tilling the soil, on such conditions as the superior landlord or the officers of Government might prescribe; to call them proprietors of the land is, we think, to misapply terms, and to embarrass ourselves with adverse claims, merely because we have made such misapplications, and is neither necessary nor judicious.

56. Instances, we believe, might be adduced, of the village Zemindars being allowed by the superior landlord to receive a russoom, or small contribution, from the under tenants, even when they were not in the actual occupancy of the land, and to disregard entirely the evidence of their possessing an acknowledged interest in their soil would be unjust. We are apprehensive, however, that the value of the interest depended upon the arbitrary will of the landlord, and that, in the sense in which we are accustomed to apply the terms, the village Zemindars can never be considered to have enjoyed the rights of proprietors of the soil. All those privileges and benefits which they can be supposed to have enjoyed will, we hope, be secured to them; and it appears to us that this may be effected, without attempting to constitute them the proprietors of separate and independant estates.

57. If the pretensions of the inferior Zemindars be maintained upon the ground of expediency, the question must be met in a different manner. But without knowing that this ground is likely to be taken, we shall content ourselves with observing, that it is not apparent to us that the public revenue will be best secured by constituting an infinite number of small estates; that economy is rarely attained by multiplying agents; that the means of preserving the police of the country will not, we think, be promoted by displacing a class of men, who heretofore bore authority and commanded ready obedience throughout their extensive possessions; that the allegiance of our new subjects will not be best secured by an attempt to crush their chiefs, to destroy all distinctions of rank, to root out every thing that was respectable, and to reduce all to one common level of indigence or scanty mediocrity; and finally, that the happiness of the tenantry themselves will not be best consulted, by taking them out of their natural sphere and sending them to our courts of justice, whose rules and practices are unknown to them, to litigate claims of little value, to perpetuate family feuds, and to sow the seeds of public disorder.

58. The disposition of landed property which our Regulations have a tendency to establish, appears to us to have an injurious effect, in diminishing the effective labour of the country.

59. The natives are so attached to landed possessions, and so little disposed to move out of the track which their forefathers pursued before them, that the individual who inherits a pittance of land, scarcely affording a subsistence, will seldom think of resorting to any other occupation. He lives in poverty because he was born a Zemindar, or because he was one of a numerous family, and his labour is in a great measure lost to the state.

60. The population, moreover, becomes unequally distributed through the country.

61. Notwithstanding the increase which may take place in particular families, the various members of it usually adhere to the spot; and although their hereditary possessions may no longer be capable of affording a comfortable subsistence to their increased number, they scarcely quit them, to resort to lands which have been abandoned in consequence of a want of labour to cultivate.

62. In some of the districts, in the province of Bundlecund especially, this inconvenience appears to be remedied, in a certain degree, by the practice which prevails of cultivating the lands under py-khoost tenures.

63. In that province, when the lands of a particular village are fully cultivated, or the assessment is found to be oppressively high, it is common for some

some of the village Zemindars to undertake to cultivate the lands of their neighbours; and for this purpose they remove for a time their cattle and implements of husbandry to other spots. But this practice only mitigates an evil. The country would probably be better cultivated by those who are in the immediate occupancy of the soil; and it appears to us essential, that any part of our system which may have a tendency to create an unequal distribution of labour should, as far as possible, be corrected.

64. Your Lordship will have observed, from our correspondence with the Acting Collector of Etawah, that great difficulty is experienced in obtaining responsible security from the landholders; and although we suggested to the Collector such precautions as appeared to us best calculated to prevent a failure of the revenue, we cannot flatter ourselves that any effectual provision has been made for its security.

65. It has been much the practice for the inferior Zemindars to become reciprocally responsible for each other: but, in this case, Government do not obtain the pledge of any new or independent capital, which could be had recourse to in the event of any extensive failure of the crops; and this kind of security (zunjeery, as it is called) has in general, we believe, been found merely nominal.

66. In other instances, the superior Talookdars and the Canongoes have been in the habit of becoming the guarantees of the village Zemindars; but it would not, we think, be politic to extend the influence of the former persons beyond their own estates: and it would be still more objectionable to allow those among the Canongoes, who may be selected as public functionaries, to become the sureties of the land-holders, for, in the latter capacity, they might have an interest which would sometimes be at variance with their public duty.

67. The difficulty which is experienced arises from the want of capital throughout the provinces, and this deficiency can be supplied only gradually. The land itself has not yet obtained a value generally; nor can we expect that it should obtain a value, while the circumstances which are to constitute a proprietary right remain undefined, and the admission of that right is not attended with any certain advantage. If a Zemindar has been so fortunate as to retain possession of his estate upon a fair assessment, he may enjoy a profit or income during the lease, in the same manner as any other tenant. If, too, among numerous claimants, he should be so fortunate as to command attention, he may, on establishing the fact of his having received nankar from the former government, be admitted to receive the same allowance from our own, provided that it do not exceed ten per cent. on the jumma of his estate. We do not mean any reproach to the Collectors. Some of those officers have made great exertion ; but the claims to pensions and nankar are so numerous in several of the districts, that it was not possible to inquire into them within any moderate time; and even after an investigation had taken place, the allowances were in many instances with-held, from a neglect at the Presidency to communicate the necessary authority for their payment.

68. It has been suggested, that the difficulty of procuring responsible security has been aggravated by the bad faith of some of the Malguzars themselves, who having, on various occasions, subjected their sureties to heavy losses by their default, the few persons possessing capital in the country are now deterred from coming forward in support of them. The Malguzars have thus injured themselves, for the charge of zimnota (or the consideration usually received by the surety) is probably increased in consequence.

69. The Acting Collector of Etawah urged very strongly the necessity of affording some relief to persons who were liable to suffer from becoming responsible for the public revenue; and we would suggest, with this view, that a summary regulation be passed, placing all sureties, who may actually have discharged the demands of Government, on the failure of the Malguzars, in the situation of mortgagees, with the right to have possession given them of the estate or farm, upon establishing before the Collector the fact of its being indebted to them to the amount of their engagement with Government. A rule of the kind would probably give confidence to individuals possessing capital; and in facilitating the means of obtaining security, it would operate beneficially, both with respect to the landholder and to Government.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

70. Although the foregoing observations have been suggested in the course of reviewing the settlement of Etawah, they are applicable, in a greater or less degree, to the other districts. The questions, indeed, which have occurred, regarding the rights of the Talookdars and Zemindars, and the claims of the landholders, generally, to be admitted to the benefit of the ensuing settlement, to the exclusion of the present farmers, are likely to create much more difficulty and embarrassment in the Conquered Provinces; but on these questions we shall offer some further explanations, when we have occasion to bring under your Lordship's notice the situation and pretensions of some of the landholders in the dictricts of Seharunpore and Allyghur. We shall also deduce from our remarks on the present state of landed property in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and from a consideration of the different objects to which our attention has been directed, such specific propositions as may appear to us to merit your Lordship's consideration.

71. After a short residence in Etawah, we proceeded to visit the district of Agra, of which a summary description is given by the Acting Collector, Mr. Ross, in his letter of the 29th September last.

72. That gentleman observes, that the district is in general well cultivated; that the population is not deficient; that no extensive increase of cultivation can be expected; that the landholders do not want the means of bringing their lands into cultivation; that the proprietor's right is not in many instances contested, but that our information of the resources of the country is defective; that the assessment of the former Government was unequal, and that the landholders are not disposed to engage on fair and equitable terms, as they prefer temporary settlements at a low jumma, to any prospect of advantage which a permanent settlement can be supposed to hold out to them.

73. From the reports of the Tehsildars it appeared, that the cultivated land in fourteen of the pergunnahs (the account of the whole district had not been completed) amounted to about 49,000 begahs, and the arable land, at present abandoned, to about 156,000 begahs, the latter bearing a proportion of about three-tenths to the former.

74. While so large a proportion of the district remains uncultivated, your Lordship in Council and the Honourable Court of Directors may justly question, whether the settlement of the land revenue in perpetuity must not be contemplated as a measure somewhat premature. But in our letter of the 3d October last we had the honour to state, for your Lordship's consideration, circumstances which appeared to us to distinguish the district of Agra, and to render the introduction of a permanent settlement more peculiarly expedient in that part of our possessions.

75. The narrow tract of the country on the right bank of the Jumna, which forms the district of Agra, may be considered an advanced frontier or barrier, and as it is in the immediate neighbourhood of foreign states, who are not bound to us by any particular tie of friendship, the district is evidently more exposed than other parts of our territory.

76. It is essential, therefore, that we should provide, by every practicable means, for its security and internal tranquillity; and, with this view, the limitation of the public demand on the land is likely, we think, to be attended with salutary effects.

77. By giving the landholders a permanent establishment in their possessions, and securing to them the benefit of future improvement, they will be interested in the permanency of our Government; they will have a motive for assisting in in preserving order and tranquillity in the district, and in securing it against the incursions of a foreign enemy.

78. On the other hand, if they consider their possessions precarious; if we attempt to raise our revenue in proportion to any real or supposed increase of produce; if we harrass them with frequent scrutinies, or excite their apprehensions in any manner; it is not to be supposed that they will feel the same attachment to our Government, that they will be adverse to a change, or that they will refrain from forming other connections whenever a favourable opportunity may present itself. Upon every occasion of dissatisfaction, it may be apprehended that they will abandon their lands, and take refuge in the neighbouring states; and it is sufficiently evident, that under such circumstances, the progress of cultivation would be often interrupted, and the peace of the country be constantly liable to be disturbed.

79. The district of Agra is, moreover, in a more advanced state of cultivation than the country in general. The population is not supposed to be deficient, the right of property in the lands is not in many cases disputed, and the Zemindars are not represented to be so entirely destitute of capital, as they appear to be in other places. These circumstances must be considered favourable to the immediate introduction of a permanent settlement in Agra; and as the district is small, the experiment will be made on a scale so moderate, that the sacrifice of revenue cannot be of any magnitude.

80. One other circumstance it may be proper to notice. Mr. Ross, the Acting Collector, has been employed for some time in the district, which is of such moderate extent, that he cannot have failed to make himself acquainted, in a great degree, with its present state and with its means of future improvement. To assess the public demand in perpetuity, with justice to the landholders, and without sacrificing the just dues of Government, a knowledge of the particular district is essential. This knowledge we believe Mr. Ross to possess; and, in addition to the advantage of local experience, he appears to us to be eminently qualified, in other respects, for the important duty which, under your Lordship's sanction, has been committed to him.

81. We are aware, that some of the arguments which we have adduced in favour of a permanent settlement in Agra, may be urged in opposition to us, when we have occasion to submit our objections to the immediate adoption of that measure generally throughout the provinces; but we are in no apprehension of being arraigned for inconsistency. It is a blind policy which admits of no distinction, and which would apply the same rules and maxims in all times and under all circumstances.

82. The only mehals in any other district to which we would recommend the immediate extension of the permanent settlement, are talookas Saisoon, Perara, and talook Comayti, in the district of Etawah. Those mehals are situated on the west bank of the Jumna, and our remarks on the district of Agra apply to them in a very forcible manner. It has been found impracticable to reduce the Talookdars to obedience, without the aid of a large military force; and for a more particular description of the situation of the mehals, we beg to refer your Lordship to the Acting Collector's letter, which accompanied our address of the 2d of February. To conciliate and favour the refractory is, we own, to establish a bad precedent; but principle must sometimes give way to necessity: and it would not, in our opinion, be wise in this Government to engage in a bootless contest, for the purpose of establishing a more efficient authority over a small portion of land remotely situated and of little value, when the utmost success could bring with it neither honour nor advantage.

83. The settlement of Agra not having been completed, we cannot report to your Lordship with certainty how far it is likely to be favourable; but we have reason to believe, both from the douls, or estimates, of the Tehsildars, and the personal communication of the Acting Collector, that an increase of revenue will be obtained. A copy of our instructions to Mr. Ross, for the formation of the settlement, was transmitted to your Lordship in Council, under date the 30th of January last.

84. We shall lose sight, for an instant, of the immediate objects of our present report; but it is impossible to visit the city of Agra, without feeling a sensible regret at the neglected state of its greatest ornament, of a work which has rendered it celebrated, not only in India, but throughout the countries of Europe. The beautiful mausoleum erected by the emperor Shah Jehan (the Taje, as it is called), long the pride and boast of Hindostan, and still a solitary monument of the splendour of its former rulers, is hastening to decay, and will soon become an object of reproach to the British Government. This wonderful edifice, which commanded the respect of the hostile sects who at different times have had possession of Agra, is likely to mark, in its fall, the administration of a people who rank among the most civilized in the world. By the rapacious Jaats it was spared, and the predatory Mahrattas preserved it with the utmost care.

85. A small revenue has been assigned, as a fund, to defray the expenses of keeping the building in repair; but we know not that any care is taken to direct its application to the proper object. The Taje speaks to the feelings of all those who behold it; and if it was possible to describe its incomparable beauties, no other appeal would be necessary to obtain for it the attention of a Government which esteems the arts, and which cannot be indifferent to any circumstance affecting, in the slightest manner, the national reputation.

86. That many other of the superb buildings which were once the ornament of Agra and its neighbourhood, and particularly those consecrated to public worship, should have been defaced and appropriated to the vilest uses, is also matter of deep regret; but it would now be difficult to repair the injury which they have sustained, or to obliterate the memory of their pollution. The Taje alone still remains undefiled, and it may be preserved, to commemorate the glories of a fallen empire.

87. The district of Furruckabad was visited by us on several occasions, and we have had an opportunity of seeing more of it than of other parts of the country. We can state, from personal observation, that although some of the pergunnahs are in a high state of cultivation, and the neighbourhood of Furruckabad, in particular, displays a most laborious husbandry, the district still contains extensive tracts of waste land, a part of which is no doubt capable of tillage. We are confirmed in the opinion, that much of the land, at present abandoned, might be rendered capable of producing a crop, from having observed small spots of ground in cultivation, in the midst of what we should otherwise have considered a barren waste.

88. We are so ignorant of agricultural economy, that we cannot venture to enter into any of its details; but we have observed, with the greatest satisfaction, that in this and some other districts, it is prosecuted with singular industry and perseverance. Under every disadvantage of season, and under circumstances of the greatest discouragement, the people appear to labour with unremitting diligence to overcome the difficulties which oppose them, while even a scanty crop cannot always be produced by their utmost efforts.

89. The reports of the Tehsildars and the remarks of the Acting Collector, Mr. Christian, corroborate our opinion, that the district contains a considerable quantity of waste land which might be brought into cultivation.

90. That gentleman observes, in his letter of the 21st of December, that in the present state of the district a permanent settlement would be premature; that cultivation is not sufficiently advanced; that the right of property in the land has not been definitively established; and that the agriculture of the country does not yet obtain the full benefit of its effective labour, a large proportion of the population being at present engaged in military pursuits.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

91. In some few mehals, the Acting Collector is of opinion that a permanent settlement might be formed without disadvantage, as they are in a more advanced state of cultivation; and it does not appear to him that the resources of the district (excepting in pergunnahs Needpore and Kakootmore) can be much improved by the introduction of more valuable articles of produce.

92. We ourselves would not recommend that in the instances referred to by Mr. Christian, any exception should be made from the general plan of the settlement; and as there are no peculiar circumstances which distinguish the district of Furruckabad, we find it necessary only to furnish the Acting Collector with those instructions for the formation of the settlement which are applicable to the Ceded Provinces in general. From the statements which were submitted to us, we have reason to expect that a small increase of revenue will be obtained in some mehals; and we are persuaded that no exertion will be omitted, on the part of Mr. Christian, to form a fair and equitable assessment.

93. The province of Rohilcund may be ranked among the most productive and valuable of our late acquisitions. It is well watered by numerous rivulets descending from the hills on the northern frontier. The atmosphere being more moist, the ground is replenished by frequent dews; the soil is fertile, and without depending entirely upon the periodical rains, it produces crops in seasons when they fail altogether in the neighbouring districts of the Dooab. In the article of sugar alone, Rohilcund possesses a valuable resource. The article is produced in great abundance and of an excellent quality, and it was formerly exported in large quantities to the western parts of India. Whenever, too, the transit duties, which at present check and embarrass the commerce of the country, shall have been established on a proper footing, the sugars of Rohilcuud will, we doubt not, become a valuable article of export beyond sea. We have, however, entered so much at large into this subject, in our letters to your Lordship in Council of the 29th of September last, and subsequent dates, that any further comments from us would be superfluous.

94. The Collector of Bareilly, Mr. Sands, in his letter of the 1st of February, has expressed an opinion adverse to the plan of a permanent settlement. He observes, that we possess no satisfactory information of the resources of the country, and that it is capable of great improvement; that the landholders are indigent; that the right of property in the land remains undetermined; and that the population is at present deficient.

95. To these remarks we must add, that we have reason to believe the district is unequally assessed, and that in the short period which will intervene before it becomes necessary to conclude the settlement, it would be impossible to obtain those materials which might enable the local officers to correct the present inequalities, and to form the assessment with justice both to the landholders and to Government.

96. From the statement submitted by the Collector, it would appear, in one particular mehal (pergunnah Kauber), the revenue does not amount to a moiety of the assets; and although the accounts may not be perfectly accurate, they ought not to be totally rejected. We do not mean to countenance an idea, that such gross errors in the assessment were frequent; but we cannot doubt that great inequalities do exist. In some few instances the farms were given at a light jumma, from personal considerations, we believe, to individuals of rank and influence in the country (to the family of the late Hafiz Rihmut and others): and we are far from recommending, that any moderate advantages which are likely to secure the attachment of persons of this description should be hastily withdrawn.

We

97. We suspect, also, that there have been considerable alienations from the public rental in this province, and that a part of the lands, which are at present held exempt from the payment of revenue, have been appropriated since the cession under invalid grants. It is a delicate question to agitate; but we deemed it proper, in the course of our personal communications with the Collector, to call their attention to these supposed alienations, enjoining them, at the same time, to observe every degree of caution in their proceedings, in order to prevent alarm.

Report Board of Commissioners 13 April 1808.

98. The province of Kuthair, which corresponds with the territory denominated at present Rohilcund, is stated to have yielded to the Patans, prior to its subjection in 1774, an annual revenue of eighty-four lacks of rupees.* In the first year after it became a dependency of Oude, the Nawaub Sujah ud Dowlah is said to have realized from the provinces a very large sum, notwithstanding it had suffered severely from the effects of the war and the previous incursions of the Mahrattas. But no correct judgment can be formed of the natural resources of the province from the collections made by the Nawaub; for his officers shewed little moderation, and a part of the amount realized was probably drawn from the capital or stock of the country. The province rapidly declined under the administration of the Vizier, and when it was ceded to the Honourable Company, in 1801, it produced only a revenue of about forty-six lacks of rupees per annum, independently of the Rampore jaghire.

99. In passing through the Rampore territory, we could not fail to notice the high state of cultivation to which it has attained, when compared with the surrounding country: scarcely a spot of land is neglected; and although the season was by no means favourable, the whole district seems to be covered with an abundant harvest.

100. As we had no reason to conclude, from the description we had received of the present Regent, that this state of prosperity had been produced by any personal exertions on his part, we were solicitous to trace its source, and to discover whether, in the nature of the tenures, the mode of arrangement, or otherwise, there were any peculiar circumstances which it might be useful for us to advert to, in the course of executing the duty intrusted to us.

101. The management of the Nawaub Fyz-oollah Khan is celebrated throughout the country. It was the management of an enlightened and liberal landlord, who devoted his time and attention, and employed his own capital in promoting the prosperity of his country. When works of magnitude were required, which could not be accomplished by the efforts of the individual, the means of undertaking them were supplied by his bounty. Watercourses were constructed, the rivulets were sometimes made to overflow and fertilize the adjacent districts, and the paternal care of a popular chief was constantly exerted to afford protection to his subjects, to stimulate their exertions, to direct their labours to useful objects, and to promote by every means the success of the undertaking.

102. The Government of a vast empire cannot descend to these minute duties; but something might be effected by the agency of proper officers, established on a judicious footing: and if the people seek in vain for the monuments of British munificence in works of public utility, in reservoirs, water-courses, roads, bridges, and publick buildings, they may still find their labours assisted (partially and independently we own), provided we do not suddenly subvert any order of men among them, who can be supposed to possess the smallest capital. If, however, the superior Talookdars are to be left without estates by the emancipation of their tenants, and the Tehsildars are to be degraded into mere receivers of the revenue, without responsbility, without any direct interest in the prosperity of the country, without a motive for exerting themselves in its improvement, it is to be apprehended, that the obstacles, which at present retard the progress of agriculture will operate hereafter with increased force.

* The revenue was paid in the Bareilly and other rupees, which were inferior to the present currency.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

103. In the course of our inquiries, we could not ascertain that the district of Rampore owed its prosperity to any peculiarity in the nature of the tenures under the Patan administration. The lands, we understand, are usually placed under the charge of some of the inferior chiefs or confidential servants of the family, or they are given in farm for a short term of years.

104. The high state of cultivation in which we found the jaghire is to be acribed chiefly, we think, to an abundant population, the Rohillas naturally crowding round their chief, to whom they have been accustomed to look up as the protector of their tribe. The town of Rampore itself is extensive and populous, and the villages appeared to be numerous and well inhabited.

MORADABAD.

Jumma of 1210	Sicca Rupees	19,37,000
.... 1211		21,56,000
.... 1212		23,42,000
.... 1213		21,40,000
.... 1215		23,98,000

105. At the period of our leaving the Ceded Provinces, the Collector of Moradabad, Mr. Lloyd, had not submitted to us officially the reports which were called for by our orders of the 5th August and 7th September; but we had much personal communication with that gentleman, and we have obtained from him, in the course of a private correspondence, many of the documents which were called for by those orders.

106. The district of Moradabad is computed to contain about 57,27,000 begahs,an d the following distribution of the lands is given upon the authority of the Tehsildars and Canongoes.

Land in cultivation	17,10,000
Land uncultivated, but capable of tillage	20,93,000
Land incapable of producing a crop	7,28,000
Land held exempt from the payment of revenue	11,96,000
Begahs	57,27,000

107. The estimate does not include lands appertaining to three hundred and sixty-one new villages, which have been recently established by the care of the Collector, Mr. Lloyd; nor does it include the tract of Jungil, which is situated at the foot of the hills on the northern frontiers of the district.

108. If the statement of the Tehsildars can be depended upon (and they could have no motive for over-estimating the uncultivated land), a moiety of the arable land has not yet been brought into cultivation, and the district does not consequently yield a moiety of the revenue which it may be supposed capable of producing under other circumstances.

109. The proposition is corroborated, in a great degree, by a reference to the former produce of the district, it appearing to have yielded an annual revenue of about forty-three lacks of rupees during the administration of the Patans, according to documents which have been supplied by Mr. Lloyd.

110. The unwearied zeal and indefatigable industry of that gentleman have already been attended with great success. The revenue of the district has been considerably increased, it has been collected with the utmost punctuality, and the remissions which Government were induced to grant, in consideration o fthe losses sustained by the Malguzars from the drought in 1211 and the incursions of the enemy, have since been realized by him, contrary to every expectation, if not contrary to the intentions of Government.

111. A want of population and a deficiency of capital, Mr. Lloyd observes, have hitherto checked the progress of agriculture, and these are deficiencies which can be supplied by only slow degrees, and which constitute in themselves a strong objection to the immediate introduction of the permanent settlement. That gentleman, who strenuously opposes the measure, urges also the objections which have occurred to the other Collectors: our ignorance of the resources of the country; our want of experience; the inequalities which occurred occurred on the first settlement, and which by Regulation V, 1805, were most injuriously extended to the second; the alienations of rent-free land under invalid titles; the dispossession of the landholders; the uncertainty which exists with respect to the proprietory right, &c. &c.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

112. At the first triennial settlement, the jumma of the lands held by farmers in Moradabad amounted to about two-thirds of the jumma of the whole district, and we have reason to believe that a large proportion of the lands must remain under the same management at the ensuing settlement. In fact, if it can be deemed expedient to sanction any remote retrospect, it will be difficult to determine who are at present best entitled to the lands of Rohilcund; for the old Hindoo proprietors were very generally excluded by the Patan Government, and there are few individuals in the province who have continued in the situation in which we found the Tehsildars in the neighbouring districts of the Dooab.

113. The alienations which have taken place we have already slightly adverted to, and although it is unquestionable that a permanent settlement might be formed without reference to them, since the lands can be resumed at any time, if it should be found that they are held under invalid titles, yet we cannot imagine that your Lordship in Council will be disposed to adopt a measure of such importance, until we know more of the country which we propose to assess, and can satisfy ourselves whether the Government are at liberty to assess a large proportion of it, which does not at present at all contribute to the exigencies of the state.

114. At a period not very remote, the province of Rohilcund is stated to have yielded an annual revenue of eighty-four lacks of rupees. It now pays to our Government a revenue of only forty-eight lacks; and if the settlement be formed in perpetuity upon this standard, or upon any higher standard to which we can expect to raise the assessment in the present state of the country, it must necessarily involve a sacrifice, which can never perhaps be justified to the Honourable Company or to the nation.

SEHARUNPORE.

Jumma of 1211	Sicca Rupees	9,40,000
.... 1212		10,97,000
.... 1213		13,51,000
.... 1215		16,80,000

115. The district of Seharunpore is described in an able report from the Collector, bearing date the 22d December; and although we are apprehensive of doing injustice to Mr. Guthrie, we shall endeavour to give the substance of it, in the course of submitting to your Lordship in Council our remarks on that district.

116. Seharunpore, placed between the Ganges and Jumna, in a narrow part of the Dooab, is well supplied with water: the soil is good and is easily cultivated; it produces sugar and wheat in abundance and of a good quality, those articles alone furnishing one-fifth of the whole revenue; the people are industrious; and the cultivation of the lands is gradually advancing.

117. The district formerly suffered severely from the depredations of the Seiks, and the inhabitants do not yet appear to be confident of their security; for independently of the forts which were held by the Geojur chiefs, almost every village is surrounded by a wall or ditch, or by both, as a defence against the predatory attacks to which they were formerly exposed.

118. Seharunpore is stated to contain 5,900 square miles, or about 62,89,000 begahs of land, which Mr. Guthrie classes as follows.

Land held in Mocurrery, or on a fixed assessment:
Cultivated	Begahs	7,36,000
Uncultivated		3,37,000
Land held under a temporary settlement:
Cultivated		9,24,000
Uncultivated		8,87,000

Lands

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

Land held rent-free:

Cultivated	Begahs	6,17,000
Uncultivated		4,74,000
Rivers, mills, roads, &c.		23,14,000

119. The population of the district is estimated at 7,03,000 persons, or one hundred and nineteen persons to one square mile.

120. The proportion which the public revenue bears to the population in the district of Seharunpore and Moradabad, according to the estimates of the Collector, is as follows:

121. The jumma of the former in the present year is Rupees 16,80,000, and of the latter Rupees 23,98,000; and the population of the one is computed at 7,03,000, and the other at 1,422,000.

122. The norther parts, both of Seharunpore and Moradabad, are found to be unhealthy, particularly in the immediate neighbourhood of the hills; and the want of population, as well as the backward state of the agriculture in the former district, is ascribed, in some measure, to the disadvantages of the climate. If the unhealthiness complained of be produced by the influence of the Jungle at the foot of the hills, many years must elapse before any material change can be effected; for this extensive tract of jungle can only be cleared away, by the labour of an abundant population; and the defects of the climate, in checking the natural progress of population, oppose equally the extension of cultivation, by which alone the climate is likely to be improved.

123. Seharunpore comprehends rather a larger area than Moradabad, although the revenue of the latter exceeds that of the former in the sum of about Rupees 7,00,000 per annum; and if the objections urged by us to the immediate introduction of permanent settlement in Moradabad have any weight, they apply, with equal or greater force, to Seharunpore, the population of that district being still more deficient, and the revenue of Government bearing a much smaller proportion to the extent of territory on which it is assessed.

124. It is observable, indeed, that the same quantity of land in cultivation yields less revenue in Seharunpore than it does in Moradabad, the average rate of assessment in the latter district being Rupees 1,431 per Begah, and in the former only one Rupee. This difference may arise, admitting both estimates to be correct, either from the circumstance of the assessment being lighter in Seharunpore, from the land being less fertile, from its particular situation, or from the nature of its produce; for if one district produce, in a greater proportion, the articles of highest value (sugar, cotton, &c.) and if it enjoys at the same time a superiority with respect to markets, roads, water carriage, &c. it is evident that a different standard must be observed in regulating the assessment. Sic orig.

125. The soil of Seharunpore is, however, represented to be fertile; and we are disposed to conclude, that the difference which we have noticed in the average rates per begah, is to be ascribed rather to a lighter assessment than to a deficiency of produce, or to any disadvantages in the local situation.

126. The measure of the begah is, we believe, the same in both districts. The puckah begah ought to be a square of 3,600 guz, or yards; and although frauds may be practised in the measurement, there is no reason to suppose that they prevail to a greater extent in the one district than in the other. The same measure prevails, as far as we could ascertain, throughout the Dooab and Rohilcund, but in the province of Bundlecund the dimensions of the begah appear to be different, the puckah begah in that province being equal only to a square of 2,500 guz, or yards.

127. Mr. Guthrie estimates the average produce of each begah in cultivation at near three rupees; and he computes that if the whole of the malguzarry land were brought into cultivation, the gross produce of the district would amount to 75,82,000; that the produce of all the lands, including those held exempt from the payment of revenue, would amount to Rupees 1,03,40,000; and that for the entire cultivation of the dictrict 2,22,941 Ryots would be required, one Ryot being supposed equal to the cultivation of near eighteen begahs.

128. That

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

128. That the agriculture of Seharunpore is capable of being greatly extended, and that the district is capable of producing a revenue to Government far exceeding the present amount, cannot for a moment be doubted. We have not succeeded in obtaining any authentic accounts of its former produce, but it is matter of notoriety that the district once yielded a revenue to which the present assessment bears a very inconsiderable proportion. It enjoyed, it is true, a great advantage from its situation in the neighbourhood of Delhi, when that capital was in its splendour, and received contributions from every part of an extensive and flourishing territory, but Seharunpore produced a large revenue even after the decline of Delhi, and the diminution of its resources cannot be attributed entirely to any external circumstances.

129. Mr. Guthrie obtained, at the second settlement, a considerable increase of revenue; and when the district shall have enjoyed a state of security and tranquillity; when time shall have been allowed for agriculture, commerce, and population to make that progress which may reasonably be expected under the administration of a wise and liberal Government; when the capital of the country shall have been augmented, and the people shall have acquired that confidence which may induce them to invest their property in the improvement of the land; when such salutary changes shall have been gradually effected, the district of Seharunpore will, we are persuaded, yield a revenue to Government which will fully evince the propriety of postponing the permanent settlement.

130. The objection urged by Mr. Guthrie to the immediate adoption of that measure is founded upon the poverty of the landholders; and we are apprehensive that the want of capital throughout the provinces must operate, for some time, as an insuperable bar to our obtaining from them the revenue which they are capable of producing. The landholders have not the means of undertaking extensive works for the improvement of their estates, and our administration of the country has not yet been marked with that steadiness, which is necessary to satisfy individuals, possessed of capital, that they can invest it with safety in landed possessions. At this moment, it remains a question in whom the right of property in the soil vests under our present Regulations, and what privileges or benefits that right is intended to confer.

131. The Goojur Rajahs, Nyne Sing and Ram Dyal Sing, hold considerable talooks in Seharunpore, at a mocurrery or fixed jumma; and they are also in possession of farms, some of which they allege had been held by them for many years prior to our obtaining possession of the country. The Rajah Ajut Sing of Dadree, and Row Ramdhun Sing of Poonth Sohana, claim in the same manner the right to hold their respective talooks at a mocurrery or fixed assesment.

132. Both the mocurreries and the farmed lands are, we believe, lightly assessed, and as the records of the Collector's office did not shew upon what authority the former were held, we suggested to Rajah Ram Dyal the propriety of his exhibiting his deeds for our inspection. He excused himself, however, on different pleas, and the suggestion appearing to create some uneasiness, we abstained from urging the question further. The former correspondence of the Collector contains the only information to which we could refer in explanation of the claims of the Mocurreridars; but whatever doubts may exist with respect to the validity of the grants, we would by no means recommend that an attempt be made to disturb the Rajahs in their possessions, with a view to any object of revenue. Both Ram Dyal Sing and Rajah Nyne Sing hold fortresses (Lundoura and Pritchitghur) which are supposed to be of great strength; they possess extensive influence in the country; and it is highly desirable, we think, to secure, as far as possible, their services and attachment. At present, there is not the smallest appearance of disaffection among those chiefs. Ram Dyal is rude and uncivilized, but he is supposed to be much under the influence of the old Rajah Nyne Sing, and of the latter we entertain a very favourable opinion, both from the tenour of a personal intercourse and from the high character which he bears in the country. His fort of Pritchitghur is evidently neglected, while Landoura, the principal residence of Ram Dyal, appeared to be kept in high order.

133. Under the operation of the regulations at present in force, both Rajahs will be liable to be deprived of their farms, some of the Zemindars having applied applied to us in a very importunate manner to be admitted to engage for their villages at the next settlement.

134. Claims were also preferred to a part of the lands which are included in the mocurreries of the Rajahs; and in one case which came before us, the villages of Nizampore, &c. forming a part of the mocurrery of Rajah Nyne Sing, were claimed by a person of the name of Zalim Ally, under the istemary sunnud. These claims, however, will probably be brought before your Lordship in Council by our successors; and as we propose to confine our attention to questions of more general import, it does not come within our plan to enter into an examination of their merits.

135. That the landholders in the Conquered Provinces are entitled, under the Regulations, to have the triennial second settlement concluded with them, to the exclusion of the farmers, cannot, we think, be disputed; but it appears to us, at the same time, that the farmers who engaged for the public revenue at the first and second triennial settlements in the Ceded Provinces are entitled, under the same Regulations, to have their leases extended to the expiration of the decennial term. This construction of the Regulations was submitted by us to your Lordship in Council in our letter of the 28th October, and it was fully confirmed by the orders of Government of the 20th November following.

136. We observe, however, from Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell's letter of the 26th February, which we have had an opportunity of seeing since our arrival at the Presidency, that your Lordship has deemed it necessary to qualify those orders, and to direct that all acknowledged Zemindars be allowed to engage for their estates at the ensuing settlement, to the exclusion of the farmers in all cases whatever.

137. A distinction appears to have been made, in the late orders, between acknowledged Zemindars and those landholders whose claims had not been admitted, or had not been established in the regular course of law, at the period of forming the first triennial settlement; and it has now been determined, that persons of the latter description only, who may have been excluded from the benefits of the two first settlements, shall be excluded, in like manner, from the benefits of the third.

138. We must observe, with the utmost deference, that we cannot perceive any just ground for the distinction, and that if any distinction could with propriety be made, it appears to us that it ought to be made in favour of those who had already suffered injury, from our ignorance of their rights, or the inevitable delays of justice. The acknowledged Zemindars had the option of obtaining possession of their lands, both at the first and the second settlements, and if they declined to engage, they voluntarily submitted to the consequences. The claimants had no such option; and yet, on their establishing subsequently a right of property in the land, they must be considered to have been placed on the footing of all other landholders. The right vested in them at the time, although it was not acknowledged. They were landholders, and they were, perhaps, injured landholders.

139. It will remain still to determine (and we fear that it cannot be determined in any satisfactory manner) who were the acknowledged Zemindars; what circumstances are to be admitted as constituting a recognition of their rights, and what authority is to be held competent to sanction that admission; whether, in short, the acknowledgement of Government, or the Board of Revenue, or of the Collector, can alone be admitted to confer the distinction, or whether the mere act of a Tehsildar, or other native officer, in registering the names of the landholders, is to be esteemed a sufficient acknowledgement of their right to have the next settlement concluded with them.

140. We are not, however, contending for the admission of any description of landholders to the benefit of the ensuing settlement in the Ceded Provinces, in instances where they have been excluded from the two first settlements. On the contrary, vague and undefined as the Regulations undoubtedly are, we are of opinion, that they secure to the farmers the right to have their leases extended to the end of the decennial term, in all cases where they shall have performed their engagements with Government during the two first settlements.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

141. It was evidently an object, when we obtained possession of the country, to induce the Zemindars to come forward and engage for their estates, since by that means the nankar allowances payable to those persons would be saved to Government, and it was presumable that the lands would be better managed by those who held a more durable interest in them.

142. But it was necessary, at the same time, to offer some inducement to individuals possessed of property to undertake the management of the lands, in the event of the Zemindars being unwilling or unable to engage; and, with this view, it was provided by Section 29, Regulation XXV, 1803, that the second and third settlements should be made with the same persons who engaged at the first, the advantages of a long lease being thus held out indiscriminately both to the landholders and to farmers, as an encouragement to them to undertake the management of the lands and to acquiesce in a higher assessment.

143. The rule stands qualified as far as regards the second settlement, the admission of the Zemindars being expressly provided for in the event of their coming forward within the period of three years; but should they neglect to prefer their claims within that period, it appears to us to have been intended to guarantee absolutely the possession of the farmers during the two succeeding settlements.

144. The farmers, we believe, rely confidently on this interpretation of the Regulations, which was fully sanctioned by your Lordship's orders of the 20th November. They have also, in various instances, received assurances from the local officers, under the authority of those orders, that their possessions would not be disturbed at the ensuing settlement in the Ceded Provinces; and we are apprehensive that they could not now be deprived of their farms, without an apparent breach of faith on the part of Government towards them. It is not necessary to cite particular cases; but if it can be supposed that individuals possessed of property were invited to engage for the revenue, and that upon the assurances of the public officers or their own construction of doubtful Regulations, they have been induced to lay out their capital in the improvement of the lands, it is obvious that much individual injury may be sustained by their unexpected dispossession. They may, no doubt, resort to the courts of justice for relief; but it can never be the wish or the policy of this Government to compel large bodies of its subjects to seek the redress of their injuries in a tedious and ruinous litigation with that power to which they look up for protection and encouragement.

145. The Rajahs Nyne Sing and Ram Dyal Sing cannot, however, support their claims to an extension of their present leases, under any construction of the Regulations; and if it be judged expedient to continue them in the possession of their farms, some special arrangement must be adopted for the purpose.

146. It is desirable, in our opinion, to conciliate the Rajahs; for when we recollect that our authority has only been recently established, and that our system of Government is not, in some respects, congenial with the habits and dispositions of the people, it must be apparent, that any measure which is likely to indispose towards us those who possess influence in the country, may be productive of the worst consequences.

147. Great reliance seems to be placed on the operation of our laws, which profess to afford equal protection to all classes of our subjects; and in protecting the lower orders against the oppressions of the more powerful, it is presumed that we must secure the attachment of the great body of the people. This we apprehend to be a very deceitful speculation.

148. The lower orders of the people scarcely know us: if they know us at all, it is not generally in a character which is calculated to engage their attachment. We appear to them usually to demand contributions. The salt monopoly proscribed the use of an article which may be considered almost a necessary of life, and which the most rapacious of our predecessors never denied to the people. Our transit duties harass them in every direction; the produce of their labour cannot be conveyed to a market without interruption from a band of custom-house officers of the meanest order. The practice of pressing the villagers to serve as guides to transport baggage, &c. &c. is extremely oppressive, and was in many places made the subject of complaint to us: the Bagaries are carried away from their families by private individuals, as well as by persons employed in the public service, and they seldom, we fear, receive a compensation for their labour. These are grievances, it may be said, which the courts of justice are competent to redress; but those who framed our laws probably never heard of the abuse: and even if the injured villager could find his way to a court of justice, it is not sufficient that redress can be obtained for the particular injury. The abuse ought to be guarded against. But, in fact, there is little disposition at present to resort to our courts of justice: they have not yet become objects of veneration to which our new subjects look up for protection; and our whole system of administration, excellent as the intentions may have been of those who framed it, is, in many respects, calculated rather to alarm the prejudices of the people than to conciliate their regard. This is not an exaggerated description. We have no motive for exaggerating: we wish to convey to your Lordship a correct idea of the country; and if any individual, whose opinion is entitled to the smallest respect, can seriously maintain that the lower classes are more attached to us than to their natural chiefs, we hope that every thing we have advanced may be treated with utter neglect.

149. Is it possible to conceive that a few foreigners, little acquainted with the language, manners, and prejudices of the people, hateful from their religion and from many offensive habits, should suddenly supersede the influence which, in a succession of ages, particular families have established in the country?

150. It has been contended, that the condition of the lower orders has improved under our Government, and we are not at all disposed to dispute the fact. The practice of seizing Bagaries may have prevailed under the administration of our predecessors, even to a greater extent; their rahdarry duties may have been more vexatious and oppressive than our customs, and other grievances may have existed. All that we mean to advance is, that the people do not enjoy, under our Government, those comforts and advantages, which might be supposed to suggest comparisons highly favourable to their present rulers. The peasantry do not, by any means, enjoy a state of comfort; their huts are miserable, and their ordinary food is of the meanest kind. Millet, pulse, and the smaller grains (jour and bajera), usually furnish their subsistence, and they rarely consume the more substantial grains (wheat and barley) which are produced by the labour of their hands.

151. And even if it be admitted that the peasant enjoys a greater degree of comfort at present, it does not by any means follow, that he can trace the source from which it proceeds. He who labours for a daily subsistence indulges not much in retrospect: he makes few comparisons; and the impression made by past sufferings, if it be retained by the individual, will not be conveyed to his posterity. The village landlord may appear to him more lenient than his predecessor, but the Government is removed far beyond the sphere of his observation.

152. We moreover greatly over-rate the advantages to be expected from a favourable disposition on the part of the peasantry. In Hindostan they pass with the land from ruler to ruler, with scarcely any consciousness of the change. The chiefs and the military classes can alone disturb the tranquillity o fthe country by their disaffection, or assist in securing it by their attachment. The former, placed between the Government and the people, are the objects in whom power ostensibly vests, and the habitual exercise of authority has given them extensive influence in the country. Their military retainers are attached to them by the obligations of service, and they have manifested, on several occasions, a courageous fidelity, which ought to convince us that they are by no means contemptible as a soldiery.

153. It will readily be admitted, that little has been done by us to conciliate the good will of those who heretofore bore sway in the country; and, from the very nature of our situation, they must suffer under our administration. We have, in fact, taken their places, and every station of rank and emolument has passed from their hands. We should be careful, however, that they do not not suffer unnecessary degradation; and every motive of policy and humanity dictates that we should regard their prejudices with indulgence; that we should observe towards them a just and liberal conduct; and that we should not attempt, by an obstinate adherence to system, to introduce among them maxims and rules, and a mode of proceeding revolting to their feelings, and to which they cannot submit without self-degradation, and without forfeiting the esteem of their countrymen.

154. The military classes have also suffered from the change of rulers. Our regular military establishment is not, by any means, on so large a scale as that maintained by the native governments, and a large proportion of the soldiery which the country formerly supported has been deprived of service since our acquisition of it. Mr. Christian, the Acting Collector of Furruckabad, computes that one-third of the male inhabitants of that district have been bred in the habits of a military life; but without adopting this estimate, it may be affirmed that the country contains, in vast numbers, soldiers who have of late been deprived of employ, and who are ready to engage in any service which will afford them a subsistence. Except in one solitary instance, no attempt, we believe, has been made by us to employ persons of this description in any civil duties, although the experiment in Agra has been attended with success; and it is unquestionable, that men of active habits and courageous dispositions may not only be rendered useful instruments by a vigorous government, but that by employing them in the public service, they may be prevented from preying upon the defenceless part of the community, and from becoming dangerous auxiliaries to an active enemy. Considerations of police do not, however, fall under our cognizance, and the remark was intended to apply exclusively to objects of police, the experiment of employing an irregular military force having been already tried and abandoned.

155. Let it not be supposed, from any thing which we have advanced, that we consider the inhabitants of our newly-acquired territory to be turbulent or disaffected. We are far from entertaining an unfavourable opinion of them. Men of the most patient tempers may be driven into resistance and rebellion by violence and injustice; but if the people of the western provinces should ever attempt to throw off our authority, the attempt will originate, we apprehend, in our own mismanagement. They do not appear to us to be an unmanageable or an ill-disposed people: they understand when they are justly treated, and they are not insensible to generosity and kindness. The respect and influence which two individuals of our service have obtained among them (Mr. Crisp and Mr. Seton will pardon us for pointing them out to notice) sufficiently attest the justness of the remark. But if the Government, unmindful of the customs and prejudices of the people, insist on forcing upon them laws and a system of administration which they cannot understand, which appear to trench upon their rights and at which their feelings revolt: if that Government, placed at such a distance that sensible traces of it can scarcely be discerned, should commit the administration of the country to men who can descend to sordid and corrupt practices; who, inflated with extravagant ideas of their own importance, are accustomed to treat others with haughtiness and disdain; who, from habits of indolence, from ignorance, from apathy, or a devotion to their personal pursuits, disregard the claims of the people whose welfare they are appointed to watch over; who, in short, regardless of their own and of the national honour, can be guilty of extortion, of violence, and wanton injustice; in such a state of things, if such should ever unfortunately exist, we must not be surprised that a proud high-spirited people should attempt to throw off our authority, and to sacrifice the individuals who have so justly become the objects of their indignation and abhorrence.

156. The order of the 28th of December, directing a military force to be detached eventually against Pritchitghur, might have thrown the district into confusion; for had Rajah Nyne Sing been marked for a victim, it is scarcely to be supposed that the other Goojur chiefs would not have taken the alarm. The order, we are aware, was founded upon an incorrect representation of circumstances; but a local administration could not have failed to become acquainted with the Rajah's character and situation, and it must immediately have detected such a mistake. We happened to be in the fort of Pritchitghur on the day on which we obtained intimation of the order, and the occurrence was calculated to shew in a very forcible manner, the defects of our present system. In consequence of the want of an efficient local control, every order must originate at such a distance from the scene where it is to be enforced, that it cannot always be founded upon an accurate knowledge of circumstances; and those circumstances being liable to change, the order may become altogether inapplicable, long before it can be received by the executive officers on the spot.

157. The foregoing remarks are intended to shew, that if considerations of humanity and justice could ever be dispensed with, motives of policy ought to induce us to treat our new subjects, and the chiefs who have still an ascendancy over them, with the utmost indulgence. They have, perhaps, only one art to learn: to unite and attack, instead of waiting to be individually reduced. The Goojur Rajahs and the Jaat chiefs of the adjoining district of Allighur, are not at all connected, we believe, or friendly to each other; and we do not suspect any of the Rajahs to be ill-disposed towards our Government at present. We should suppress what we deem essential for your Lordship's information, if we omitted to state, that those chiefs, by the operation of our Regulations, may find themselves deprived of a large portion of their possessions, and that the attempt to infringe what they are accustomed to consider a right, may have consequences which we could not contemplate with satisfaction.

158. In the district of Seharunpore the estates and farms are in general small, the annual jumma frequently not exceeding two or three hundred rupees. The Zemindars receive nankar; but as they are indigent, the Collector is of opinion that the permanent settlement ought to be postponed. Mr. Guthrie objects to a russud jumma, and he does not think that it would be advisable to extend the ensuing settlement beyond the term of four years originally proposed. He recommends that the jumma of the current year 1215 be assumed as the basis of the assessment, care being taken to correct any existing errors, and to render the settlement as just and equal as possible. We are not, however, without hopes, that by the exertions of that gentleman an immediate increase may be obtained on the jumma of 1215; and we have the fullest conviction that the district, at a future period, may be made to yield a much more ample revenue.

159. The communications of the Collector respecting the former system of management, the rules for the division of the crops, &c. &c. not being essential to our present purpose, we have not adverted to them particularly; but we beg to refer your Lordship to that gentleman's report of the 22d of December, for much useful information regarding the district under his charge.

ALLIGHUR.

Jumma of 1213 ....Rupees	22,33,000
.... 1214	22,91,000
Estimated 1215	23,01,000

The settlement being rupees of sorts.

160. The Acting Collector of Allighur, Mr. Russel, in his letter of the 12th of October, strongly objects to the plan of a permanent settlement. He observes, that frequent revolutions in the government, war, the rapacity of the public officers, and the extortions of farmers, have checked the progress of agriculture and population; that, with very few exceptions, such a settlement could not now be undertaken without a material sacrifice of the public revenues, particularly in the lands held by the Jaat chieftains; that it could not be rendered equal and just; that under temporary settlements, the resources of the country may be expected to improve, if moderation be observed in the assessment; and that at a future period, when these resources shall have been brought forth, a permanent settlement may no doubt be adopted with advantage. He recommends that the ensuing settlement be concluded for the term of three years, great care being taken to equalize the assessment, and that a russud, or increasing jumma, be not had recourse to.

161. The district of Allighur, as well as the neighbouring districts of Seharunpore and Agra, and the western parts of Etawah, suffered severely from the the drought which prevailed in the past season, and its effects were distinctly traced by us, large tracts of land which had been prepared for cultivation having failed to produce a crop. These districts fortunately are more lightly assessed than the southern parts of the Dooab, and the calamity was not therefore so severely felt as it might otherwise have been.

162. We could not fail, however, to observe the singular difference which the application of greater capital and greater industry is capable of producing in the state of contiguous lands. While the surrounding country seemed to have been visited by a desolating calamity, the lands of the Rajahs, Diaram and Bugwunt Sing, under every disadvantage of season, were covered with crops produced by a better husbandry or by greater labour.

163. When we reflect, that the miseries of famine may be averted by such a difference of circumstances; when it occurs to us, that these miseries have perhaps been averted in Bengal by the lamented patriot who gave the permanent settlement to that country we feel the utmost repugnance at the idea of opposing its extension to our new possessions. But Bengal is different in many particulars. The land is more easily cultivated, and is fertilized by a periodical inundation; water is easily procured; wells, reservoirs, and aqueducts are unnecessary; and a large capital is seldom required for agricultural purposes. The inferior landholders, and even the peasantry, can carry on the cultivation of their lands without those aids which must be furnished to secure the prosperity of the western provinces. But, above all, we were in every respect better prepared in Bengal to undertake a measure, which, at a future period, we shall gladly see extended to the rest of our possessions.

164. In our remarks on the district of Seharunpore, we have anticipated much of what we should have had occasion to notice in reviewing the district of Allighur. Our observations regarding the Goojur chiefs apply to the Jaat Rajahs of Allighur, with this difference, that the latter are more powerful from the extent of their possessions, from the superior strength of their forts, from the magnitude of their military establishments, and from their numerous connections.

165. Rajah Diaram possesses a talook paying an annual revenue of 1,35,000 rupees, and he holds farms to the amount of 3,31,000 rupees. His relation, Bugwunt Sing, has a talook assessed at a jumma of 96,000 rupees, and he is in possession of farms to the amount of 1,49,000 rupees. Another relation of the family, Hurry Kishen Sing of Bissaivun, holds a talook and farms paying a revenue to Government of 84,000 rupees per annum. There are other considerable Talookdars in the district (Shur Sing, Heera Sing, &c.), but we do not believe that they are connected with this family.

166. The forts of Hatras and Moorsaun are well known to Government; and unacquainted as we are with military affairs, we cannot pretend to give a description of them. Compared with the places which lately occupied our arms, they appeared to a casual observer extremely formidable. They are kept in good order (Hatras in particular), and are garrisoned by the numerous retainers of the Rajahs.

167. The village Zemindars did not apply to us to have the settlement concluded with them, either in the talooks or farmed lands of Diaram and Bugwunt Sing: but it is not improbable that the power of the Rajahs might have deterred them from coming forward, even if they were desirous of emancipation. From the state, however, in which we observed the country, we think it fair to conclude, that the Rajahs are good landlords, and that the under tenantry are satisfied with their present dependent situation.

168. The lands held by the Rajahs are supposed to yield double the amount of the annual revenue paid by them to Government. The estimate is not given with any degree of confidence, for we have little information of the country; but from the extent of the establishments maintained by those chiefs, it is unquestionable that they command considerable resources.

169. We cannot expect to ascertain the real assets of the lands held by the Rajahs; for if they did not actually oppose an attempt to scrutinize and to assess assess the villages in detail, they have influence sufficient to counteract it, and to render the success of such an undertaking extremely difficult.

170. To their talooks they have, we believe, an indisputable right, and to resume even their farmed lands would be a measure of great delicacy. We ourselves incline to a temporising policy in this instance, although it is sometimes a contemptible policy. But the Rajahs are at present powerful, their followers are numerous and warlike, and their forts are in high order. A few years may be expected to produce a sensible change. Both Diaram and Bugwunt Sing are rather of an advanced age, and the next generation will probably have adobted different habits. The continuance of peace and internal tranquillity will prevent their followers from engaging in active military pursuits, and both in their habits and dispositions a change may gradually be expected to take place. When their forts are not found to be necessary for their personal protection, the expense of keeping them in order and of maintaining large military establishments will by degrees be curtailed: the forts will probably be neglected and allowed to fall into decay, while the income of the Rajahs will be appropriated to objects of personal gratification. We do not mean to assert, that such a revolution will suddenly take place; but the effects anticipated by us will, we think, be produced gradually. Still less do we mean to insinuate, that our Government should basely wait until the Rajahs are less powerful, in order that it may degrade them with less danger. We hope, on the contrary, that their rights will be held inviolate, and that the individuals will experience at our hands every degree of favour and indulgence.

171. It would be contrary to all principle to set aside Regulations which profess to guarantee private rights, with any view to political objects; nor could there be any real security, or any rational ground of confidence, if the Government reserved to itself a general power of dispensing with its own laws.

172. It occurs to us, however, that without any actual violation of the Regulations, the superior Talookdars may be placed on a footing which would secure to them essentially all the privileges and advantages at present enjoyed by them, and which is calculated, at the same time, to improve the situation of their tenantry.

173. The Regulations which authorize the separation of the village Zemindars must be modified; but the terms of it are so vague and undefined, that it is impossible to say under what circumstances it was intended that the separation should take place; and in whatever manner it may be judged necessary to qualify the rule, there can be no violation of private right, in amending or superseding a law which has no ascertained object.

174. With respect to the farms, we would propose that the Talookdars be continued in possession of the lands, in the characters of Tehsildars or Aumils; that if the measure can be attempted without the risk of creating disturbances, the villages be separately assessed, and a liberal allowance be granted to the Rajahs for their own personal income, the charges of collection, the maintenance of the police, &c.; that if the attempt to form a village settlement be considered premature, the lands be continued in the same manner, under the charge of the Talookdars, in the capacity of Aumils, at their present jumma, or such jumma as it may be judged proper to fix, without instituting any enquiry into their resources; that the Talookdars be required, in the latter case, to grant pottahs to the under tenants, at fair and equitable rates, for the term of their own leases; that they be invested with the charge of the police; and that the officers of Government, both judicial and revenue, be prohibited from interfering with them on trivial occasions, and from issuing any compulsory process against them, without the express authority of the Governor General in Council.

175. The foregoing suggestions can be considered only as exhibiting an outline; but an arrangement may, we think, be formed upon the foundation which we have traced: and if it tend, in any manner, to promote the tranquillity of the country and the happiness of the people, we shall have abundant reason to congratulate ourselves in having suggested it.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

CAWNPORE.

Jumma of 1210	Sicca Rupees	29,62,000
.... 1211		29,21,000
.... 1212		29,21,000
.... 1213		26,84,000
.... 1215		26,98,000

176. The district of Cawnpore, we have reason to apprehend, was over-assessed at the first triennial settlement; and it is still suffering, we fear, from the consequences of that injurious proceeding. Much too great an anxiety was manifested, in this and other circumstances, to draw from the country suddenly the utmost revenue which it could be supposed to yield.

177. Large deductions became necessary, in consequence, at the second settlement; but even after these concessions were made, the assessment, in particular mehals, was far from being moderate. Pergunnahs Jaujeenore, Behtoar, Selimpore, and Dirnunpore, are supposed to be still heavily assessed.

178. The reduction of the jumma in 1213, from Sicca Rupees 29,21,000 to 26,84,000, is not to be ascribed wholly to a deficiency of resources, jaghires having been granted, in that and the following years, to Narundeer Ghur and others, to the amount of near 1,50,000 rupees,

179. It may appear extraordinary, that persons should be found to engage for a revenue far exceeding the assets of the lands; but independently of the attachment of the natives to landed possessions, and of the effects which may be produced by exerting a jealous competition, several circumstances have been mentioned to us, which explain, in some degree, the means by which engagements for so large a revenue were obtained in the district of Cawnpore, on our first acquisition of the country.

180. In 1210 the crops were most abundant, the season was unusually favourable, and the Malguzars enjoyed advantages, which are not to be expected in the ordinary course of the seasons. They had received advances of tuccavy in the preceding year from the Vizier's Aumils, and from this demand, as well as from all former balances, which would otherwise become a charge upon the resources of 1210, they are entirely relieved in consequence of the cession.

181. Advances of tuccavy were also made by our Government in 1210, and they enabled the Malguzars probably to settle with the Tehsildars for partial deficiencies, it being a practice not uncommon, we suspect, for the landholders to return the advances made by them on account of tuccavy in discharge of existing balances.

182. In pergunnah Sehimpore, the manufacture of indigo had been carried on by the late General Martine on a very extensive scale, and the rents paid for the lands were extremely high. The manufacture has been since abandoned, or greatly reduced, and the resources of the pergunnah have been much diminished in consequence.

183. A large portion of pergunnah Jaujernon was given in farm to three individuals (Meherbaun Sing, &c.), who appear to have had no intention of performing their engagements with Government. These adventurers, after having realized all that they could extort from the mehal, absconded, and took refuge in the dominions of the Vizier; and as they possessed no property, and had given no substantial security, the Tehsildar (we doubt how far justly) was held responsible for their balances.

184. These are particular cases; but the landholders generally complain, that they engaged for the jumma assessed on their estates, on an assurance that their nankar would be deducted from it at the end of the year, according to the practice which obtained under the administration of the nawaub Vizier. The question has been much discussed; and a reference having been made to the Collector who formed the settlement, that officer declared, that the nankar of the Zemindars had actually been deducted from the gross assessment, and that they were not therefore entitled to any further allowance on this account.

185. Upon

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

185. Upon the authority of this declaration, the landholders were referred to the courts of justice for redress; and one of the parties having unfortunately brought forward his action in some irregular form, he was nonsuited, and the other claimants seem for a time to have been discouraged from making any farther attempt to obtain relief. They have lately renewed their complaints; and although we were not called upon to make any public inquiry into the facts, the whole tenour of the information which we had an opportunity of procuring from private sources leads us to believe, that the Collector was under a mistake, and that the claims of the Zemindars have some foundation. The question will probably undergo judicial inquiry, and we shall only therefore notice a single circumstance, which seems to corroborate the representations of the landholders. The Collector was required to take acknowledgements from them on settling the account of their nankar; but although every inquiry was made by his successor, no such documents have ever been produced.

186. The Zemindars, in this as well as in some other districts, are supposed to have suffered from the necessity they have been under of lowering their rents. The Ryots finding that they cannot be compelled to cultivate particular lands, as heretofore, remove to other spots, with a view to obtain more favourable terms; or they undertake the cultivation of waste land, on being exempted from the payment of rent for a certain period. But whatever injury individuals may suffer under such circumstances, no steps can be taken to prevent it, without the danger of introducing evils much more injurious to the community at large.

187. The present Collector of Cawnpore, Mr. Dumbleton, in his letter of the 20th October, has offered an opinion rather favourable to the plan of a permanent settlement; but he suggests, in preference, that the ensuing settlement should be concluded for a period of ten or fifteen years. He computes that the waste land and the arable land not at present in cultivation, do not exceed one-third of the whole district. He does not profess to have obtained any information respecting the population, but he seems to think that it is not equal to a more extended cultivation. He observes, that the resources of the landholders are circumscribed; but that he does not consider the circumstance of the proprietory right being in dispute an obstacle to the formation of a permanent settlement. Mr. Dumbleton recommends that the practice of underletting farms be discouraged; and he is of opinion, that a russud jumma will be necessary, although he would not propose to extend it beyond the term of four years. The principal articles of produce the Collector states to be cotton and sugar, with some indigo; but the manufacture of the latter article, he observes, has been very considerably reduced of late in pergunnah Selimpore, where it was produced formerly in great abundance.

188. It does not occur to us to offer any remarks on the Collector's letter, the only material proposition submitted by that gentleman (the extension of the term of the settlement) having been adverted to in the course of submitmitting our sentiments to your Lordship in Council on the plan of settlement proposed by the Acting Collector of Etawah.

BUNDLECUND.

Original District.

Jumma of	1213	12,31,000

Estimated	1215	11,09,000

Jaidad Lands.

Rupees of undermentioned value		12,02,000

189. Bundlecund, under the government of Rajah Chatter Sal, is understood to have yielded an annual revenue of a crore of rupees, exclusive of the produce of its diamond mines; but the dominion of the Rajah extended over several districts which do not form a part of the British territory.

190. Nor can an inference be drawn with any degree of certainty from comparing the present revenue with the revenue of a remote period, the value of the the currency varying greatly, and it being extremely difficult to ascertain satisfactorily in what coins the public demands were realized at particular periods.

191. It may, however, be affirmed with safety, that the province of Bundlecund formerly yielded a much more ample revenue than it does at present, and that it is capable of producing a revenue greatly exceeding the present amount. The country is far from being generally well cultivated, and little progress has yet been made in ascertaining its real resources.

192. As we have not the public records to refer to, it is with some reluctance that we undertake to furnish an abstract of voluminous reports on the authority of scanty notes; and in attempting to give the substance of the letter from the Collector of Bundlecund, bearing date the 13th January, we think it more particularly necessary to premise, that we can scarcely hope to convey a correct idea of the argument mentioned by that gentleman.

193. The Collector states, that the province was better cultivated at a former period; that about two-thirds of the arable land only are at present in a state of cultivation; that the waste land comprises one-third of the area of the district; that the progress of cultivation, as well as of population, has been unequal in different parts of the province; that the quantity of land at present in cultivation is computed to amount to 15,18,000 begahs, although Mr. Erskine observes that the estimate appears to him to be too low; that the average rate of assessment per begah is about one rupee; that cotton, the most valuable article of produce, is exported in considerable quantity to Mirzapore; that awl (a wood or root used for a red dye) is also produced and exported; that the district produces only a small quantity of sugar; that the landholders are too indigent to undertake extensive improvements; that there are no wells or reservoirs in the province for agricultural purposes, the soil being loose, water being found only at a great depth, and the wells being liable to fall in; that they might, notwithstanding, be used with advantage, for the purpose of extending the cultivation of the country by artificial means; that the husbandman depends at present upon the periodical rains, although the crops are produced in Bundlecund with less rain than is found necessary in the Dooab; that advances of tuccavy are frequently required, the landholders being distressed and in debt to bankers; that the estates are small and much subdivided, and the number of sharers so great as to occasion public inconvenience.

194. Mr. Erskine, both in his report of the 13th January and in a former letter to the Board of Revenue, bearing date the 10th July last, has explained very fully the many inconveniences which are experienced from the minute subdivision of landed property, and he has submitted some propositions for obviating them in future; but as we have already offered our sentiments on this subject, it does not appear to us necessary, on the present occasion, to enter into the details which that gentleman's letter embraces.

195. The Collector states, that no sales of land have yet taken place in the province; that one-fourth of the land is cultivated by pykhoost Ryots, or Ryots who have not the permanent occupancy of the soil; that the manufactures are inconsiderable; that saltpetre might be produced; that the roads are bad, and the soil such as to render it difficult to construct roads; that Government should, he thinks, undertake to keep in order the high roads, and the landholders be required to keep up all cross roads of communication through their estates; that there appears to be no obtacle to the navigation of the river Jumna, although it may be necessary for some time to furnish convoys for the protection of trade; that the town duties are vexatious, &c. &c.

196. Mr. Erskine, in adverting to the question of a permanent settlement, makes some distinctions in which we cannot follow him. He observes, that under the temporary settlements, the produce is taxed, while a permanent settlement operates as a tax upon the land itself; that in a country, where the land-tax is so high, it is peculiarly necessary to apportion it equally, whereas if an attempt be made to form the assessment upon the ground of the present produce, it must necessarily be unequal, since the estates will have very different capacities; that great difficulty would be experienced in apportioning a fixed assessment on the small portions of land into which the estates are subdivided; that those villages which are completely cultivated might, no doubt, be assessed in perpetuity, and the permanent settlement be extended in the same manner, gradually, to lands which may hereafter be brought into a complete state of cultivation; but this suggestion is offered as an alternative only, the documents which we possess being unsatisfactory, and the information which they contain being applicable only to the present produce of the land: that in the event of a russud jumma being had recourse to, the increase should be moderate, and should not extend beyond the period of three years, and that competition should not be encouraged. The Collector observes, that the landholders are not under any apprehension of being dispossessed, as it rarely happens that they are deprived of the occupancy of their lands, even under a farming settlement. That gentleman finally gives a decided opinion in favour of temporary settlements, which he considers best calculated to insure equality; and he maintains that they afford sufficient encouragement to the landholders, while moderation is observed by Government in regulating the assessment.

197. Mr. Erskine's distinction between the assessment of land and the assessment of produce, appears to us to be somewhat too refined; for whether the settlement be permanent or periodical, the public revenue is drawn equally from the produce, the land itself being nothing more than an instrument of production. That gentleman, we presume, means that under a temporary assessment, the actual produce is taxed, while a permanent settlement can be founded only upon the quantity of land liable to be taxed, whose produce must depend upon the course of future events; or in other words, that in the one case an actual, and in the other an expected resource, is made the object of taxation. But we see no force in this objection to the principle of a permanent settlement; for it applies equally to temporary assessments, if they are formed before the crops are produced and their value actually realized,

198. In Bundlecund it is supposed that considerable alienations of the public revenue have taken place, and the numberless small jaghires and pudaruck villages (lands granted for charitable purposes) which are intermixed with the malguzarry land, occasion, we understand, much inconvenience. The landholders, who are mostly Brahmins and Rajepoots, are represented to be turbulent and refractory; and, as far as a judgment can be formed from a short residence in the province, we certainly think that much remains to be done, to bring it into a state of good order.

199. We have heard it suggested, that the revenue and judicial authorities might, for a time, be united with advantage in Bundlecund, where, from the turbulent habits of the people and the frontier situation of the province, a more vigorous authority is apparently called for. Even the principle of the consolidation of authority is contended for by men, whose opinions are entitled to respect: but without professing that we ourselves have adopted similar sentiments, we are induced to mention the suggestion, in order that your Lordship may determine how far it is entitled to attention, either from the circumstances noticed by us, or from the tenour of any other communications which may have been made to Government on the subject.

200. No question is likely to arise in Bundlecund between the village Zemindars and any order of landholders similar to Talookdars of the Dooab; for the Hindoo Rajahs, Chatter Sal and his descendants, seem to have occupied the place of the latter, and the lands in possession of the family at present (Rajah Kishow Sing and others, the descendants of the Hurdah Sah and Juggut Raje) are held on an independent footing, and we have never understood that any pretensions have been preferred by them to the proprietory right in other parts of the province.

201. Bundlecund has been ranked, we believe, amongst our most valuable acquisitions. We do not pretend to appreciate political objects; but, in a financial view, its value, we apprehend, has been much over-rated. The province is capable, no doubt, of yielding a much larger revenue than it does at present; but we can perceive no ground for those sanguine expectations which were once entertained of its financial and commercial resources. Cotton is its only valuable produce at present, and if the navigation of the Jumna should be found practicable and safe, the article may be exported with great advantage. The wheat of Bundlecund is represented to be of a very inferior quality, and the the province produces little barley. The character and quality of the soil we cannot undertake to describe, although we are led to suppose that it is not equal to the soil of Rohilcund and of some parts of the Dooab. After making allowance for the difference in the measure of the begah, the quantity of wheat usually produced from a given quantity of land appears to be less in Bundlecund. Still, in particular places, the crops were luxuriant; and if the landholders possessed the means of extending the cultivation of their lands by artificial aids, we have no doubt that the province might attain a high degree of agricultural prosperity.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

202. Some of the pergunnahs (Punwarry, &c.) are supposed to be lightly assessed, and to be capable of great improvement; but we were concerned to observe that the Collector, in forming the assessment of the jaidad districts for the current year 1215, had found it necessary to grant deductions very generally. The settlement had not been completed, nor had the progress made by the Collector in forming the assessment been officially notified to us, at the period of our departure from the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; the duty, therefore, of reporting upon the merits of the settlement necessarily devolves on our successors.

203. Your Lordship will observe the very large decrease of revenue which took place in this district at the second triennial settlement; but, if information obtained through private channels can be relied upon, the first settlement was in a great measure fictitious. The lands were never regularly assessed, the district was let out in farm to three or four individuals, and all the errors and irregularities of the first settlement were, by the operation of Regulation V, 1805, extended to the second. The new Commissioners will, however, have made a longer residence in Allahabad, and they will no doubt be enabled to submit to your Lordship in Council much more satisfactory information respecting the district than we had an opportunity of acquiring.

204. The Acting Collector, Mr. Cuthbert, in his letter of the 8th January, observes, that the permanent settlement cannot with propriety be undertaken without a previous measurement of the lands; that in the last year of every periodical settlement the lands are neglected, and he proposes therefore that all arable land, whether in cultivation or otherwise, be indiscriminately assessed. He recommends, that a decennial settlement be formed, in preference, on a russud or increasing jumma, and that it be concluded with the landholders instead of the farmers, who have possession of the lands at present. He observes, that many of the Canongoes hold lands (particularly in pergunnah Ekdullah), and that their accounts are not to be depended upon; that the population is fluctuating, and cannot be stated upon any satisfactory grounds; that the assessment not having yet been regularly apportioned on the lands, a permanent settlement could not be concluded immediately, without great loss to Government, &c. &c.

205. We must add to this report, that the statements prepared by the Tehsildars shew that some of the mehals contain a considerable quantity of arable land, the cultivation of which has been abandoned, and that an uncommon degree of diligence and attention is called for in the management of this district, both for the purpose of ascertaining its resources, and of enabling Government to avail itself of them upon just and satisfactory grounds.

206. Pergunnah Khyragur, including the talook of Manda, which has been granted in mocurrery at a very low jumma, is supposed to be lightly assessed; and pergunnah Secundur, as well as some other mehals, will also, we believe, admit of an increase of assessment; but partial deductions, it is apprehended, must be granted in other instances. As the formation of the ensuing settlement will be concluded under the immediate direction of the new Commissioners,

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

Commissioners, we shall not venture to anticipate the course of their proceedings.

GORUCKPORE.

207. We regret extremely that we had not an opportunity of visiting the district of Goruckpore in person (it is the only district which was not visited by us); but it is so remotely situated, with relation to the other provinces, that we found it impracticable to proceed to the spot without neglecting various other duties. From every account which we have received, we are disposed to consider Goruckpore as possessing more ample means of furnishing a large increase of revenue at a future period, than any other district of the Ceded or Conquered Provinces. That it yielded an abundant revenue formerly is matter of notoriety; and as the soil is excellent and the district enjoys many advantages of situation, it cannot be doubted that it is capable of attaining great agricultural and commercial prosperity.

208. It may appear extraordinary that in a district so circumstanced, a considerable decrease of revenue should have taken place at the second settlement; but as the public correspondence furnishes the only information to which we could refer, we shall merely observe, that the settlement in question was formed by a gentleman on whose zeal and attention great confidence may be placed, and we presume, therefore, that the deductions granted had become absolutely necessary.

209. The present Collector of the district, Mr. Balfour, in his letter of the 20th October, represents that agriculture and population are at present in a very backward state; that some accession to the latter is obtained by the emigration of Ryots from the Oude and Napaul territories; that the soil of Azinghur is very superior; that a part of the district was highly assessed in 1213, and lands bearing a jumma of 1,22,000 remained khas, and now produce only an annual revenue of 94,000 rupees; that few estates are completely cultivated, and that the Zemindars at present wilfully neglect the cultivation of their lands; that the jungleboory pottahs, which were granted for five years at the low rates, had the effect of drawing the Ryots from the lands already in cultivation; that there is a large quantity of land held exempt from the payment of revenue, and that the Maafydars have the means of seducing the Ryots from the estates paying revenue; that, on this account, some regulation for preventing the removal of the Ryots is become necessary; that the customs do not, in his opinion, operate injuriously in checking the progress of agriculture, &c. &c.

210. The Collector proposes, that whenever the proportion of three-fourths of the land in any estate shall have been brought into cultivation, the settlement be rendered permanent; that in all other cases it be formed for the term of ten years; that in consideration of the late drought no increase of revenue be demanded until 1218, or the third year of the settlement; that a small rateable increase be assessed on uncultivated land; that the accounts of 1212 be assumed as the basis of the assessment, without instituting further inquiries; and that the settlement be formed at the commencement of the rains, when the land is sown for the khurreef harvest.

211. On Mr. Balfour's letter we had the honour to submit our sentiments to your Lordship in Council, under date the 31st October, and it does not appear to us necessary to offer any further remarks on it. We shall only observe, generally, with respect to Goruckpore, that if the permanent settlement can be considered unseasonable in any part of the provinces, it is peculiarly so in this district, which, notwithstanding the excellence of its soil, is only very partially cultivated at present. The grass jungle, with which a large portion of the district is covered, may, we understand, be ploughed down during the rains, with little labour and at a trifling expense, and in the first season of cultivation the land becomes highly productive. Under such circumstances, that limitation tion of the demand of Government would be attended with so wasteful a sacrifice of the public resources, that with every predisposition in favour of the principle of the measure, we should hold ourselves most responsible if we maintained the proposition for a moment.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

212. We have now taken a hasty review of the state of the different districts, in the order in which they were visited by us. We are sensible that it must appear superficial and imperfect, and we can only plead in apology, that we had many important duties to perform within a very limited space of time; that few of the statements, which were called for by our orders of the 5th August, had been submitted by the local officers at the period of our leaving the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and that our present report has been prepared with little aid from official records.

213. The whole tenor of the communications which we have had the honour to make, will probably have suggested doubts to your Lordship with regard to the expediency of declaring the permanency of the ensuing settlement; but the question is of such importance, that we shall endeavour to give a more distinct view of it, by recapitulating, in a connected manner, the objections to which the measure appears to us to be liable at present.

214. 1st. The resources of the country have not been brought forth. Upon the most moderate computation, one-fourth of the arable land still remains uncultivated; and assuming the gross annual jumma of the provinces at 22,50,000 rupees, an asset of future revenue, to the amount of not less than 75,00,000 rupees per annum, must be considered to be relinquished by an immediate limitation of the public demand upon the land.

215. 2d. In the talooks and farms held by the Rajahs Diaram and others, a sacrifice still more disproportioned will be made, the public officers possessing no means, at present, of ascertaining the resources of the lands, and it being questionable whether an immediate attempt to scrutinize or to assess them, upon the ground of their actual produce, might not endanger the public tranquillity.

216. 3d. The lands held by those chiefs could not now be regularly assessed; and if, at a future period, it should be found practicable and expedient to assign the farmed lands to the village Zemindars, those persons will obtain them at a rate of assessment very different from that which prevails in other parts of the district, or Government, in adopting any new standard of assessment, would be justly chargeable with a breach of engagement.

217. 4th. We have not yet obtained a sufficient knowledge, either of the present state of the country or of its means of future improvement, to enable us to assess the lands upon a just and equal footing, or without the risk of making gross mistakes to the prejudice of Government. It has been so much the practice, of late years, to translate the public officers from station to station, that few of them have had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the districts over which they are appointed to preside, and the uncertainty of their retaining a particular charge for any length of time renders them perhaps indifferent to it. At least it cannot be supposed, that they will be equally diligent in collecting information and accounts, and in procuring materials for use at a future period, when they see a probability of their being removed before that period can arrive. A succession of officers is, moreover, usually attended with a succession of plans, and the frequent changes which take place, not only prevent the adoption of any systematic arrangement for conducting the public business, but they perplex and confound the people.

218. 5th. The population of the country is at present very deficient.

219. 6th. The population being unequal to the entire cultivation of the lands, and the different estates possessing very different capacities, it would follow that the proprietors of estates lightly assessed, or of estates containing much waste land, would have the means of drawing away the Ryots from estates fully assessed, and the public revenue assessed on the latter might not only become precarious in consequence, but the original injustice of an unequal assessment would be aggravated, to the ruin perhaps, ultimately, of particular individuals. It may not be practicable, we are aware, to assess lands with perfect

fect equality in the first instance, or to preserve exact equality afterwards, under any plan of settlement; but in a conntry where the land-tax is so high, it is peculiarly necessary to guard against those extreme errors, which must be injurious both to the Government and to individuals.

220. 7th. The landholders do not, at present, possess that capital which is necessary to enable them to undertake improvements, for the purpose of obtaining from the land the full produce of which it is capable, and Government cannot, therefore, assess it with any reference to its actual capacity.

221. 8th. In the same manner, the country being without commerce, or enjoying only a commerce which is fettered by injudicious restrictions, agriculture is checked and discouraged, many articles of produce are probably suppressed, and even the land which is already in cultivation does not produce the value which might be obtained from it under other circumstances. The commerce of the country is circumscribed, also, by the want of opulent consumers; and although it has been questioned whether the wealth of the community is not derived exclusively from agriculture, it is certain that a government cannot draw a revenue from the land proportioned to its productive powers, until there exists a demand for its produce, sufficiently extensive to bring those powers into action.

222. Some of the Collectors have reported, that they are not aware that the customs operate injuriously in checking the progress of agriculture; but this negative testimony we cannot admit, in opposition to authority which directly points to a different conclusion, and which is corroborated by the whole course of our own observation and experience.

223. 9th. The landholders, accustomed to annual or short settlements, and discouraged by a succession of unfavourable seasons, would not, it may be apprehended, be willing to engage generally for that revenue, which the country, even without an extension of its agriculture, may be expected to yield under more propitious circumstances. The excessive drought in the past year was severely felt; and it is not easy to persuade the landholders that, in making arrangements for the next settlement, former casualties must be disregarded. They feel differently: nor ought we to be suprised that a mere temporary calamity should leave a strong impression upon the minds of men, whose experience has not taught them to expect from the future an indemnification for past disappointments. Under the government of our immediate predecessors, the landholders, we believe, were little accustomed to look forward to any distant good; and we greatly apprehend that our own administration of the territory lately acquired by us has not yet been marked with that character, which is calculated to inspire confidence and to stimulate exertion.

224. 10th. A large portion of the country must, by the operation of the existing Regulations, remain under the management of farmers during the ensuing four years; and it cannot be supposed that persons who have only a temporary interest in the lands will appropriate large funds to their improvement, or that they will engage for a revenue to be produced by the gradual extension of such improvements. An opulent proprietary might engage with safety to contribute towards the public exigencies, from an income to be created by means of its own capital at a future period; but such a proprietary does not exist in the country at present, even if the pretensions of the farmers could be set aside without injustice. Let us then hold in mind, that in divesting itself of the right to participation in the benefit of future improvement, the Government relinquish a source of revenue for which no proper substitute is likely to be found. The land has long been the chief object of taxation in this country; and circumstanced as it is at present, we are apprehensive that any attempt to introduce a new system of taxation would not only be unsuccessful, but that it might be attended with very mischievous consequences.

225. 11th. Great alienations of land are supposed to have taken place in several districts; and it is, we think, desirable that the fact should be ascertained, before a permanent settlement be concluded. Such lands can unquestionably be resumed and assessed at any time; but they may, in some instances, appertain to particular estates, and a question would then arise, whether they were resumable for the benefit of Government or of the proprietors. All such questions, and the necessity for all local investigations, should, if possible, be precluded, before we announce to the people that the public demand on the land is fixed for ever.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

226. 12th. A similar question will also probably arise (in the district of Goruckpore especially) with respect to the right of property in the extensive tracts of waste land, which are not comprehended within the limits of particular estates; and it is equally desirable that this question should be previously decided.

227. 13th. If the arguments urged in our letter of the 12th of October be entitled to attention, we must conclude that the value of the standard coin of the country has not yet been definitively fixed; and should Government wish to alter the standard of the currency after perpetual engagements shall have been concluded with the landholders, one or other of these difficulties must be encountered:—If the standard be lowered, the Government will sacrifice a portion of its revenue; if it be raised, the public demand upon the land will actually be raised in the same proportion, in breach of engagement; or if an attempt be made to accommodate subsisting engagements to the change which has taken place in the value of the coin, it is to be apprehended that the landholders will not feel the same confidence in the permanency of them.

228. 14th. The proprietary right in the land is at present contested, and the Regulations have not provided clear and precise rules for deciding the questions which have arisen regarding it. The settlement cannot, therefore, be formed with any of the claimants, upon a satisfactory assurance that they will establish ultimately their right of property in the soil; and with mere temporary occupants, it cannot, we think, be concluded without great disadvantage.

229. Finally. It will not, in our opinion, be judicious to attempt a permanent settlement, until it can be concluded without any condition or reservation whatever. The natives understand the value of a mocurrery tenure perfectly well; but they are little acquainted with the constitution of our Government, and they cannot readily comprehend that the local administration is not paramount. If they adopt the idea, that the grant is conditional and must await the sanction of a superior authority, it will lose much of its value: but if, on the other hand, they should consider it absolute, and the Honourable Court of Directors, not satisfied with the documents upon which the settlement has been formed, should ultimately withhold their confirmation of it, the landholders will, we fear, suspect that they have been imposed upon, and that we had no other view in holding out the advantages of permanency, than to extort from them a higher revenue. Such a disappointment would finally extinguish the embers of an expiring confidence; and when, hereafter, we may really intend to confer upon the country the benefits of a permanent settlement, distrust will greatly diminish its value in the estimation of the people.

230. We are ourselves fully sensible of the many advantages which may be expected to result from a limitation of the public demand upon the land. We are aware that temporary settlements are harassing to the people, and that they afford opportunities for frauds and abuse. It has been questioned, indeed, whether a country can make any considerable advances in improvement, while the public taxes are progressively increased, and the individual is not permitted to enjoy any benefit from the execution of greater industry; but with every previous disposition in favour of the principle of a permanent settlement, we submit to your Lordship in Council our deliberate and unqualified opinion, that the measure, considered with relation to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces generally, is at this moment unseasonable, and that any premature attempt to introduce it must necessarily be attended with a material sacrifice of the public resources, and may, in particular cases, prove injurious to the parties themselves, whose prosperity it is the chief object of the measure to secure upon a durable foundation.

231. Should your Lordship in Council, on a consideration of the circumstances which we have had the honour to represent, be pleased to determine that the permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces be postponed, we beg to submit, whether it will not be necessary or expedient to suspend the operation of Regulation XXI, 1806, which places the office of Tehsildar in these provinces, upon a footing entirely different from that on which it was originally constituted.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

232. The Regulation itself assigns no reasons for the change of system; but we have been officially informed, that it was adopted with a view to economy, and to prevent the abuses and oppressions which those officers are supposed to have committed in the course of exercising the extensive powers entrusted to them.

233. The statements exhibiting the economical tendency of Regulation XXI, 1806, have not fallen under our inspection: but projects of economy, as we have had occasion to observe before with reference to this question, should not be confined to the mere reduction of charge; they should embrace other considerations, and they must prove fallacious in the extreme, should they be prosecuted without a proper regard to the security of the public revenue.

234. The Tehsildars, under the new system, are not to be held responsible for the jumma payable to Government; they can be required to pay no more than they may have collected, and the grossest neglect and mismanagement will subject them to no pecuniary penalty. Receiving from Government a fixed monthly stipend in lieu of the commission upon their collections, they will have no interest in discharging the public demand with punctuality, in discovering new sources of revenue, or in improving those which already exist. On the contrary, a different bias may prevail; they will find the landholders ready to purchase their forbearance and to reward their neglect, and as far as considerations of personal advantage may have influence, they will instigate the Tehsildars to betray the duty which they owe to their employers. These officers will be liable to dismission from their situations, no doubt; but the apprehension of forfeiting an office of little value while it is faithfully administered, will operate but feebly, we apprehend, in enforcing those obligations of duty, which strong temptations perpetually assail.

235. We presume, of course, that it is intended to place the new Tehsildars on very moderate allowances, for otherwise the object of economy will not be accomplished upon the most partial view of the question. If, however, the office be placed upon an inferior footing, men of rank and respectability, on whose fidelity and integrity reliance might be placed, will scarcely be prevailed upon to accept it; and those who may be solicitous to obtain it will be influenced, we fear, more by an expectation of deriving illicit emolument, than by any prospect which the authorized allowances can be supposed to hold out to them.

236. If, then, the office should fall into the hands of needy individuals, whose conduct is not restrained either by a sense of rectitude or a sense of interest, the public service must inevitably suffer. They will collude with the Malguzars, and countenance every imposition which may be attempted. Complaints will be heard of accidents of season, of drought, hail, storms, mushkhoory, pymauly, &c. &c.; claims to remissions will be brought forward on the slightest pretences; balances will accrue, without the possibility of ascertaining, in many cases, how far they originate in misfortune or misconduct; the time of the Collectors will be occupied in making local enquiries with little chance of any satisfactory issue; or if Aumeens be deputed on every occasion, and measurements be undertaken under the superintendance of those persons, the Government or the landholders will be subjected to expense, without any certainty that the one will not be imposed upon, or that the other will not be oppressed. These are not fancied difficulties. We ourselves experienced them in a less degree; and we found that, except in cases of severe calamity, it was absolutely necessary to have recourse to the responsibility of the Tehsildars for the security of the public revenue. These officers, residing immediately on the spot, have the means of detecting misrepresentations on the part of the Malguzars, of frustrating attempts to embezzle the revenue on the part of the inferior officers who have charge of the collections, and of obviating, in some degree, the difficulties which occur in collecting the revenue from a multitude of petty proprietors, whose interest in the land is so minute that it is scarcely possible sometimes to discriminate it. While, then, our knowledge of every thing relating to the country is so imperfect, it appears to us essential that that the interests of the Tehsildars should, as far as possible, be identified with the interests of their employers.

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

237. Some of these officers are men of great respectability, and are possessed of property. When this is the case, they supply, in some respects, the want of an opulent proprietary: their capital may be employed in assisting the landholders in the execution of useful works for the improvement of their estates; and an instance was mentioned to us by Mr. Lloyd, the Collector of Moradabad, where the resources of a pergunnah had been encreased by the good management of the Tehsildar from 23,000 to 96,000 rupees per annum. The present Tehsildars have an interest in preserving tranquillity, and in realizing from the land the utmost revenue which it is capable of yielding. Their successors will, we expect, have an interest in fomenting disputes among the Putteedars, and in instigating the landholders to abandon their estates, with a view to their being held under khas management; for relieved as they will be from all responsibility, they will be solicitous to obtain the immediate management of the lands, as a source of patronage or of personal emolument.

238. In the past year, the demand of Government, with few exceptions, was discharged by the Tehsildars with the utmost punctuality, under circumstances the most unfavourable; and notwithstanding all the disadvantages of the season, balances of the year 1211 were realized in several instances. The arrear at present due from the Ceded Provinces, on account of 1214, does not exceed 20,00,000 rupees; and although it would be a vain speculation to attempt to estimate what the deficiency might have been under a different system, we cannot doubt, for a moment, that it would have been very considerable.

239. Many of the present Tehsildars, from their rank and connections, possess influence in the country; and it is by means of such influence that the revenue is sometimes realized without the necessity of calling for the aid of a military force. Influence, as a milder instrument, is obviously to be preferred to force. But can it be supposed that the new Tehsildars will possess the same influence? Or will any individual, at all acquainted with the country, maintain that our authority is already so completely established, and that the people are every where so familiarized to habits of obedience, that any petty officer is likely to succeed in realizing the public demand?

240. And if, from that officer's want of influence, from his mismanagement, from connivance with the landholders, or otherwise, a single instalment of the revenue should remain in arrear, Government would not only sustain an actual loss of interest, but the public service would be liable to suffer from the disappointment.

241. The monthly kists, or instalments, are at present paid with regularity; and we have reason to believe that they are sometimes advanced by the Tehsildars from their private funds, or from the resources of their private credit. The difference of interest arising from tardy collections will not appear as a charge upon the new system, but the loss will nevertheless be incurred.

242. Nor will other expenses incidental to it be traced to their genuine source. The present Tehsildars are interested in supporting the landholders and in promoting their success. Their successors, when urged by the Collectors, will resort without compunction to the expedient of selling their estates and confining their persons; and, independently of other objections, this proceeding will subject Government to an expense, which on every account it would be desirable to avoid: we mean the expense of prosecutions, of maintaining additional guards, of providing jails, &c. &c., as well as the charge of furnishing a subsistence to individuals whose labour is lost to the community. These charges will sink unperceived into the general mass, but they will infallibly increase its pressure.

243. Sales of land should be avoided, as much as possible, in our new territory, for the land does not yet bear a sufficient value to admit of their being resorted to generally as a means of realizing the public demand, and they are calculated to indispose the minds of the landholders. Personal coercion should should be equally avoided, in a country where our study should be to conciliate and to inspire confidence.

244. We much doubt, moreover, whether any material saving of expense will be effected by the change of system, even if it can be supposed that the revenue will be equally secure, that a loss of interest will not be sustained, and that the incidental charges which we have adverted to are not likely to be incurred. The new police establishments, which we had an opportunity of seeing, were upon a very high scale, and whether the services of the Tehsildars be compensated by a salary or by a commission, the expense of collecting the revenue in our new possessions must for some time be very considerable.

245. The Tehsildars, however, are presumed to have been guilty of great oppression; and it is expected that, by divesting them of their powers as officers of police, they will no longer have the same opportunity of committing abuse.

246. We know not upon what evidence the misconduct of those persons has been presumed: our own experience has not furnished us with any such presumption. In Bundlecund and in the district of Furruckabad (in the latter a solitary instance only occurred) complaints were preferred to us; but the exceptions rather favour a presumption, that complaints in greater number would have reached us had grievances existed, and that the rare occurrence of such complaints is to be attributed to the general good conduct of the Tehsildars.

247. If the representations of one or two of the magistrates have been unfavourable to the Tehsildars, we must oppose to them an authority which is certainly entitled to as much respect as any in the judicial department. Mr. Stuart, the late magistrate of Benares, has long resided in the province where the greatest abuse is supposed to have prevailed; and your Lordship has already, we believe, had an opportunity of observing that the opinions of that gentleman are directly adverse to the intended change of system. His comprehensive report has given so just a view of the question, that we feel it less necessary to attempt to enforce our own conviction by a laboured argument.

248. If the Tehsildars have been oppressive, it is extraordinary that so few of the landholders should have emancipated themselves from their authority, by availing themselves of the liberty which the Regulations allow of paying their revenue direct into the Collector's treasury. But what assurance have we that the same powers, when committed to two individuals, will be exercised with more moderation. Is it not possible, that we may create two oppressors where there existed only one before? If the Tehsildar and the police officer coalesce, will not the people be exposed to greater injuries? Will not the difficulty of obtaining redress be increased, when both these officers have an interest in preventing an appeal to a higher authority?

249. On the other hand, if they should be hostile to each other, is there not reason to apprehend that the public service will suffer from their contests and intrigues? Supported by the officers of police, the Malguzars will disregard the authority of a petty Tehsildar; and when this is the case, it will become necessary to exercise a degree of coercion in collecting the revenue, which ought if possible to be avoided.

250. The police Darogahs, selected from a lower order of the people and receiving only small stipends, can scarcely be entitled to the same confidence which may be claimed by men who have a more valuable interest at stake, and a higher character to support; and if they become either corrupt or oppressive, they can never be rendered useful instruments in checking the conduct of revenue officers.

251. Some of the present Tehsildars, we have observed, are men of great respectability, and have deserved well of our Government: they remained firm in their allegiance when the country was exposed to an invading enemy, and our authority over it was imperfectly established. To stigmatize any class of men indiscriminately is ungenerous; but to calumniate those who have distinguished tinguished themselves by their services, is a species of injustice which is calculated to excite singular indignation. The office of Tehsildar is the only one under our administration to which a native of rank can now look forward for the remuneration of eminent services: we cannot often reward such services by pecuniary bounties, and our Government has not yet exercised the right of conferring titles and honours. If, then, we take away the only object which can flatter the ambition or administer to the comforts of the higher orders of the people, upon what ground can we promise ourselves a continuance of their fidelity and attachment, if adverse circumstances should ever again place us in a situation to require their services?

Report Board of Commissioners, 13 April 1808.

252. That the present tehsildary system may have been abused in particular cases, we cannot dispute; but there is no system which is entirely exempt from abuse: and even where the Tehsildars have been guilty of misconduct, the evil is sometimes to be traced, perhaps, to a higher source.

253. In concluding this address, we shall endeavour to give a more connected view of the objects which we have proposed to ourselves, by submitting, in the form of propositions, the different results to which our inquiries have led us.

254. With the utmost deference, we would recommend that the permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces be for the present postponed, with the exceptions which we have had the honour to suggest to your Lordship in Council, in paragraphs 75 and 83 of this address.

255. That the ensuing settlement be concluded for a period of four years; and that during the interval a reference be made to the Honourable Court of Directors, for the purpose of obtaining their authority for the formation of a permanent settlement, unconditionally, at a future period.

256. That during the same interval, the attention of the public officers be particularly directed to the important duty of collecting materials which may form the basis of a fixed assessment; and that, with this view, the Collectors who have distinguished themselves by their successful exertions in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces be continued in their present situations, and be renumerated by larger allowances, rather than by promotion to higher offices.

257. That at the expiration of the next settlement, mocurrery or istemerary grants be made to proprietors of all estates which shall have attained a high state of cultivation.

258. That in all cases where it shall appear that the resources of a district or pergunnah may not have been brought forth, the settlement be made for a term of years, upon a russud or increasing jumma, and that the assessment in the last year of the term, wherever circumstances may admit of it, be declared fixed for ever.

259. That the Regulations which regard the different classes of landholders and tenants be revised, and distinct rules be prescribed for determining claims to the property in the soil.

260. That the subdivision of estates, either by inheritance, by gift, sale, or otherwise, be restricted by law, unless each portion into which it may be proposed to divide it be liable to be assessed, with a revenue of not less than 500 rupees per annum.

261. That a Regulation be passed, rescinding Regulation XI, 1793, and enacting that all estates at present assessed, or which may hereafter be assessed, with an annual revenue of less than 500 rupees, shall devolve to the next heir according to primogeniture, in full property, to the exclusion of other descendants who under the Hindoo or Mahomedan law might be entitled to participate in the inheritance.

262. That the Regulations under which the adverse claims of the landholders and farmers to be admitted to engage at the ensuing settlement are severally maintained, be revised and explained.

263. That in instances where it may be found highly inexpedient to deprive particular individuals of the farms at present held by them, the settlement be made with them in quality of Aumil or Tehsildar; and that, as far as circumstances stances may permit, engagements be taken from them, for the purpose of securing the rights of the under tenantry.

264. That a Regulation be passed for granting to sureties, from whom the public revenue may have been realized on the default of the landholder or farmer, the rights of mortgagees, and for empowering the Collector, upon a summary inquiry, to place such sureties in possession of the land, whenever it shall appear, from the accounts of the parties, that the estate has become indebted to the surety to the amount of his engagement with Government.

265. That Regulation XXI, 1806, which provides for an alteration in the office of Tehsildar, be rescinded; and that such parts of Regulation XIV, 1807, as regard the constitution of that office, be revised and amended.

266. Finally, that a more efficient authority be established in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, for the purpose of affording greater security to the rights of the people, and of guarding with a more vigilant circumspection the general interests of the Government in that part of the empire.

267. The vast fabric which we have raised in this country is an object of astonishment, and perhaps of jealousy, to surrounding nations; but it is still a question, whether its strength has increased with its extension. The parts are so disposed, that, as in animal life, no member can be violently separated without danger to the whole. Our attention should, then, be equally directed to the most remote of our possessions; and it would be folly and presumption to suppose that such an empire is long to be preserved without the greatest energy, without consummate prudence, or without the constant exercise of that provident and watchful spirit, which directs its regards far beyond the objects which the revolutions of the hour produce. Fortune and our arms have placed under our Government an extensive and valuable territory, which an enlightened policy may preserve to us. To trace the course of such a policy is an undertaking to which we are altogether unequal; but among the features which should distinguish it, there are some which cannot escape observation, and to us it appears most essential that our administration should ever bear the character of steadiness, moderation, and justice.

We have the honour to be, &c. &c.

MR. COLEBROOKE'S MINUTE.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

1. The final report of the late Board of Commissioners for the settlement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, dated 13th April, contains propositions of so much importance, and so greatly at variance with the previous resolution of Government, that in recording my opinion, I think it necessary to go at some length into the consideration of the reasons which have been urged by the late Commissioners in support of their propositions. Those reasons, as far as they relate to the question of a permanent settlement, correspond so precisely with arguments which were fully and repeatedly discussed upon the occasion of the permanent settlements of Bengal and Behar, in 1789-90, and the territories on the Coast of Coromandel, in 1799, that my task will be merely confined to show their exact correspondence, and to refer to the former proceedings of this Government for the ample discussion which they underwent, and for the final decision which was passed on the merits of the question by the Honourable Court of Directors.

2. I trust that arguments which were not suffered to weigh against a measure recommended by wise and enlarged views of policy, but not then promised to our subjects, will not be allowed greater weight at this momentous period, against a similar one, equally recommended by liberal considerations of policy, and solemnly promised by an express declaration in a legislative act.

3. Government

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

3. Government is pledged, by the proclamation of the 14th July 1802, and 11th July 1805, to conclude a permanent settlement with the landholders, at the expiration of the periods there specified, for such lands as may be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure on fair and equitable terms. It was judged expedient, on full consideration of the subject, and with ample knowledge of the circumstances now alleged, to anticipate those periods; and accordingly, in June 1807, the Governor-General in Council notified to the Zemindars and other proprietors, by Regulation X, 1807, that the jumma assessed for the last year of the ensuing settlement shall remain fixed for ever, if they be willing to engage, and the arrangement shall receive the sanction of the Court of Directors.

4. The pledge, which has been thus solemnly contracted, cannot be forfeited, without such a glaring violation of promise as would indeed lose us deservedly the confidence of the people. I do not mean to intimate, that the obligation which has been voluntarily contracted is so indispensable, that no exception can on any consideration be admitted. Some exceptions must unavoidably be made; and the postponement of the measure is not a matter of choice but of necessity, in various instances which have been already under consideration, and which must become the subject of further deliberation. But exceptions should be admitted for only such reasons as are clear and intelligible even to the persons whom they concern. The general postponement of the measure, a twelve month after it was solemnly announced, and when so many steps have been publicly taken for carrying it into execution, would demonstrate a degree of fickleness which would be far from creditable to Government, even independently of the higher considerations of public faith.

5. The late Governor-General, than whom no man was more conversant with the subject of a permanent settlement, which had indeed engaged a large portion of his attention within the last twenty years, deliberately resolved on accelerating the highly beneficial measure of a permanent settlement of the land revenues in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, upon a comprehensive view of the interests of the Honourable Company and of its new subjects. There is room for regret that the gentlemen, to whom the execution of that measure was committed, should have put into deliberation, not the best means for carrying it into effect, but the expediency of the measure itself which they were selected to execute. Giving them all credit for their good intentions in the call which they made upon the Collectors to canvass a legislative enactment of Government, I feel it my duty to say, that the attention of the revenue officers would have been better directed to the requisite preparation for the settlement which had been ordered, than to the discussion of its expediency, upon partial views of a most important question, which had been already decided by the Governor-General in Council.

6. The objections alleged by several of the Collectors, as well as by the late Commissioners, against the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement, are principally the imperfect knowledge yet acquired of the resources of the country; the inequality of the present assessment; the great proportion of uncultivated lands, estimated generally at a fourth of the arable lands; the deficiency of population, and want of capital to extend the cultivation; the existing restrictions on commerce; the want of opulent consumers; the extent of resumable land yet unascertained; the necessity of continuing certain farmers in possession of their farms; the general uncertainty in regard to the proprietary right, either at present contested or not ascertained, in respect of extensive tracts of waste land; the doubtful value of the standard coin; the risk of disappointment, should the settlement be disapproved by the Court of Directors.

7. Lest this brief abstract should inadequately convey the reasons alleged, I beg that reference may be made to the recapitulation in the 210th and following paragraphs of the late Commissioners' letter, where they are stated at full length.

8. All these circumstances, it will be remembered, existed in Bengal. They were alleged partly as reasons against the conclusion of a permanent settlement,

and

and partly as arguments for the immediate adoption of that measure, though now all marshalled against it.

9. The argument, on which, if I mistake not, the late Commissioners chiefly rely, is, that the right of participating in future improvement ought not to be relinquished, because Government is, in a manner, the landholder and proprietor of a vast estate, the resources of which are not yet fully brought forth, and because no other productive source of revenue exists, to supply the place of the future revenue which would be abandoned by an immediate permanent settlement. The late Commissioners, therefore, propose the postponement of a permanent settlement for four years, after the expiration of which period mocurrery grants to be made to the proprietors of estates which have attained a high state of cultivation; but where the resources have not been brought forth, the settlement to be made on a russud, or increasing jumma, and the assessment of the last year, whenever circumstances may permit, to be declared fixed for ever.

10. The motive for this proposition is explained where the late Commissioners estimate one quarter of the arable lands to be yet uncultivated, and conclude that 75,00,000 rupees per annum would be relinquished, if the demand of Government be now limited to the present available jumma of 2,25,00,000 rupees.

11. It appears, from instructions issued by the late Commissioners to the Collectors, as well as from several passages in the report now under consideration, that they consider ten per cent. to be a sufficient allowance for the landholder, both for income and charges of collection, and that the landholders are not at present supposed to realize more.

12. Without offering any opinion on the correctness of those estimates, I shall contrast them with the declared intentions of Government in regard to the landholders of Bengal, when the permanent settlement was concluded in this province.

13. Mr. Shore (now Lord Teignmouth), whose diligence of research and whose thorough knowledge of the revenues of Bengal are universally acknowledged and need not the tribute of praise, estimated no less than a third of the amount received from the cultivator for the charges of collection and intermediate profit between Government and the Ryot.* This estimate is quoted, and confirmed as corresponding with experience on the Coast of Coromandel, by the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, in the very able report of that Board, dated 2d September 1799.

14. It was with the belief that a third part of the collections made from the cultivator were applicable to the charges of the collection and the support of the Zemindars, that the assessment in Bengal and on the Coast of Coromandel was fixed for ever. At the same time, Lord Cornwallis estimated no less than a third part of the Company's territory to be a jungle;† and the researches in which I was engaged at that period, furnish me with grounds for the opinion that the estimate may, with great approximation to accuracy, be understood as applicable to lands fit for cultivation, and totally exclusive of lands barren and irreclaimable.

15. With this opinion as to the extent of the uncultivated lands, Lord Cornwallis, far from desiring to reserve any right to participate in future improvement, argued strenuously against the pretension, and in these memorable words: "If the idea of permanence is to be withdrawn from the settlement
" now in agitation, of what avail will the power of Mr. Shore's arguments be " to the Zemindars, for whose rights he has contended? They are to have " the property in farm for a lease of ten years, provided they will pay a good
" rent for it, and this property is then to be again assessed, at whatever rent
" the Government of the country may at that time think proper to impose.
" In any part of the world, where the value of property is known, would not " such a concession of a right of property in the soil be called a cruel
" mockery?"

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

16. The sequel is no less forcible and convincing; but it may be sufficient to refer to that important document for the powerful arguments by which Lord Cornwallis demonstrated the propriety of declaring the settlement permanent. His observations on the power reserved to the Court of Directors, of confirming or annulling the settlement, are no less important, and bear directly upon the subject now under consideration.

17. "The power of making a perpetual and irrevocable settlement of a great "empire, without being subject to the revision of the controlling authority at "home, would, in my opinion, have been too great to delegate to any distant "Government. I cannot, however, believe that the Court of Directors would "hold out the flattering hopes of a permanent settlement, which alone, in my "judgment, can make the country flourish, and secure happiness to the body "of the inhabitants, unless they had been predetermined to confirm the per-"petuity, if they found that their servants here had not failed in their duty, or "betrayed the important trust that had been reposed in them. Nothing, I am "persuaded, but our expressing doubts and fears, can make them hesitate; "and as I have a clear conviction in my own mind of the utility of the system, "I shall think it a duty I owe to them, to my country, and to humanity, to "recommend it most earnestly to the Court of Directors to lose no time in de-"claring the permanency of the settlement, provided they discover no material "objection or error, and not to postpone for ten years the commencement of "the prosperity and solid improvement of the country."

18. Before I quit the subject of the Court of Directors' sanction, I must be indulged in one more quotation from the same minute. "It is not for the "purpose of taking shelter under a great and revered name, that I shall quote "from Lord Cornwallis, instead of arguing on new grounds or in new words, "but because the answers by him given to the objections which are now re-"vived, have received the seal of the approbation of the Company's adminis-"tration at home."

19. Mr. Shore had stated, that if, after the notification that the settlement if approved by the Court of Directors would be declared permanent, the Court of Directors should not declare the permanency, the confidence of the natives in general would be shaken, and those who relied on the confirmation would be disappointed, and conclude that it was meant to deceive them. Lord Cornwallis replies: "I can only say, in answer to this objection, that I can-"not believe any people to be so unreasonable as to accuse Government of a "breach of faith and an intention to deceive them, for not doing what Govern-"ment in express terms assure them it is not in their power to promise to do, "as it must depend on the approbation of their superiors."

20. Entirely concurring in the sentiments here expressed, and in the conviction that the uncontrolled power of fixing an irrevocable assessment ought not to be delegated by the controlling authority at home to a distant Government, and that the ratification of the Court of Directors will not be withheld from the permanent settlement which may be concluded, unless they discover material error in it, I can see no sufficient reason for the previous reference recommended by the Board of Commissioners, were it even still a matter of choice, and the question now for consideration were, whether the intended permanency of the settlement should be notified or suppressed.

21. But the subject of participation in the future improvement to be expected from the cultivation of waste lands is not new to the Court of Directors. A doubt was expressed by the Honourable Court, in their general letter of 19th September 1792, on this point. "If the different proprietors should be "allowed to avail themselves exclusively of the whole benefit to be derived "from the lands (at present left uncultivated), in the improved state of culti-"vation which the new system has an evident tendency to promote, such a "circumstance may, in process of time, add very considerably to the value of "possessions already too large. It is, besides, to be considered, that if it can "be effected without counteracting the principal object of encouraging indus-"try, Government may fairly expect, in due time, some reasonable participa-"tion in the wealth arising from such a source." The Honourable Court afterwards remark, that the subject is connected with points of considerable delicacy; delicacy; and add, "nor should we be inclined to adopt it, if it should, on due "consideration, be thought to break in upon the principle of permanent property in the present landholders, or should appear likely to discourage or "retard the progress of cultivation."

22. It was among the last duties of Lord Cornwallis's administration to reply to the Court's letter. The general letter of the 6th of March, 1793, expresses: "With respect to the suggestion concerning waste lands, we do "not hesitate to offer it as our opinion, that any attempt to stipulate for a "proportion of their produce would greatly counteract, if not wholly damp "that spirit of industry and improvement, to excite which is the greatest "object of fixing the tax on each estate."

23. After distinguishing two sorts of waste land; first, those in the level country, interspersed in more or less extensive tracts among the cultivated lands; and secondly, the Sunderbunds, and the foot of the vast range of mountains which nearly encircle the Bengal provinces; it is observed:

24. "The first mentioned description of waste ground will be easily brought "into cultivation when the Zemindars have funds for that purpose, and pro-"vided they are certain of reaping the profits arising from the improvement. "These lands, however, are not wholly unproductive to them at present: "they furnish pasture for the great herds of cattle that are necessary for the "plough, and also to supply the inhabitants with ghee and milk, two of the "principal necessaries of life in this country. It is true, that the lands in this "desolate state far exceed what would suffice for those two purposes; but it "is the expectation of bringing them into cultivation and reaping the profits, "that had induced many to agree to the decennial jumma which has been "assessed upon their lands. It is this additional resource alone, which can "place the landholders in a state of affluence, and enable them to guard "against inundation or drought, the two calamities to which this country "must ever be liable, until the landholders are enabled to provide against "them (as we are of opinion they in a great measure might) by the above-"mentioned and other works of art. To stipulate with them, therefore, for "any part of the produce of their waste lands, would not only diminish the "incitement of those great and essential improvements in the agriculture of "the country, but deprive them of the means of effecting it. The landhold-"ers and cultivators of the soil would continue, as they have hitherto been, "little more than the farmers and labourers upon a great estate, of which Go-"vernment would be the landlord. In endeavouring, therefore, to obtain an "addition to the public income by reserving a portion of the produce of "the waste lands, Government would risk the realizing of the very ample "revenue which has been assessed upon the country, and landed property "would continue at the very depreciated value which it has hitherto "borne."

25. It may not be superfluous to observe, that the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, in their report dated the 2d of December, 1799, quoted this reply as equally applicable to the waste lands on the Coast of Coromandel, upon which they "remark with regret that the proportion is very considerable:" and the Governor General in Council, on the 31st of December, 1799, authorized the Governor in Council at Madras "to adopt the principles laid down "in that reply, as the rules for their guidance with regard to waste lands."

26. Thus, upon the important occasions of the permanent settlement of Bengal and Behar, and of the territories on the Coast of Coromandel, and after mature deliberation, a claim of participation in the future improvement of the waste lands was relinquished, to a greater extent than the proportion at which they are computed by the late Board of Commissioners in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

27. The happy result of the measure is now witnessed in Bengal. The reviving prosperity of the country, its increased wealth and rapid improvement, are unquestionably due to the permanent settlement, the principle of which was so wise, that even the serious errors which were committed in filling up the outline of the plan could not ultimately disappoint its views.

28. But

28. But the Commissioners argue that we were better prepared for the measure in Bengal: the land is here more easily cultivated, water more readily procured, wells and public works unnecessary, capital seldom required.

29. That is not the picture of Bengal as then drawn. A reference to the minutes recorded by the members of Government will shew that the same representations were then made, respecting the deficiency of information, the uncertainty of the proprietary right, the poverty of the landholder and cultivator, the scantiness of population, the decline of agriculture, and the depreciated value of landed property. A permanent settlement was the proposed remedy of those evils; and it must, indeed, have been postponed for ever, if it waited until they were remedied by other means.

30. Of all the objections which were then urged, the most serious was drawn from the still imperfect knowledge possessed by Government respecting the real resources of the different districts, and regarding the respective rights of the different classes of landholders and tenants, and the consequent extreme difficulty of distributing the assessment on the several districts with the requisite equality, and securing to the great body of proprietors and occupants the undisturbed enjoyment of their rights. A similar objection is repeatedly urged, with great earnestness, by the late Board of Commissioners, and by the Collectors of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. It was urged no less strenuously in Bengal, after twenty years had been employed in successive investigations, and three years had been especially devoted to inquiries preparatory to the decennial settlement. Were the permanent settlement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces now postponed, the same objection would be again advanced, with equal force and truth, at the expiration of four years or of any greater period whatsoever. The deficiency of correct information is the unavoidable consequence of the system under which the revenue is administered. Persons of every description are interested, or think they have an interest, in withholding information and suppressing the truth. Apprized of this disposition to baffle their inquiries, the officers of Government can place no reliance on the information which they receive, though it may happen to be correct. Under a different system, in which the adjustment of the rent demandable from the cultivator would be the immediate duty of the officers of Government, and a first step towards a settlement of the revenues, accurate information would be collected in a long series of patient surveys. But it is not now a question, whether the influence and authority of all intermediate orders of men between the ruler and the cultivator shall be suspended. The settlement, even if temporary, must be made, in the first instance, with landholders or with farmers, and the intervention of those, and of Aumils or Tehsildars, must prevent the acquisition of accurate knowledge respecting the real resources of the lands. Minute scrutinies would be vainly undertaken: they would harass the people with no real benefit to Government. And, without such minute and vexatious scrutinies and measurements, the same complaints of the insufficiency of information obtained from general inquiries or from accounts of doubtful accuracy, would be made at a future period as at present.

31. After the lapse of eighteen years, we are now enabled to pronounce with certainty on the solidity of the objections which were urged against the permanent settlement of Bengal. That the distribution of the assessment was not originally equal is indisputable. That it is now equalized will not be asserted; but experience has not shewn that the inequality of assessment has been productive of those evils which were then foreboded, and which are now again anticipated in regard to other provinces.

32. I appeal to this experience in preference to any speculative argument. The design of the permanent settlement in Bengal has been fully answered. It was the wish of the Company's Administration at home, as well as of the Government in Bengal, to limit the demand of land revenue and fix its amount on a moderate scale. It was computed that the assessment left not ten per cent., but fifty, on the sudder jumma, for the charges of collection and income of the proprietors. It was estimated, that the landholder's income alone amounted to ten or fifteen per cent. It was expected that the improvement of estates by the culture of waste lands would enrich the landholder by the increase of his usual income, and enable him to meet the variations of seasons and temporary porary calamities of drought and inundation, without needing remissions of revenue.

33. Those expectations have been realized. And if the persons whose benefit was immediately intended have not generally profited by the beneficence of Government, if a great change has taken place in the property and occupancy of the lands, this event, though much to be lamented, has arisen from extrinsic causes: and it remains an undoubted truth, that the landholders of Bengal are now in the enjoyment of an aggregate income, not indeed greater than the author of the measure contemplated, but exceeding their former profits, by more than the amount which the late Board of Commissioners think too great a reward of future improvement in the hands of the land proprietors of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

34. If a permanent settlement on a moderate scale of assessment, leaving to the landholder the whole benefit of future improvement from the cultivation of waste lands, was in Bengal a judicious measure, which justice called for, which policy dictated, and which the interests of the Company countenanced, how much more is a similar measure recommended by like considerations, in regard to our new territories. It is of the utmost importance, it is essential for the safety of the state, to conciliate the great body of the landed proprietors; to attach to the British Government that class of persons whose influence is most permanent and most extensive; to render it their palpable interest to uphold the permanence of the British domination; to give them a valuable stake in the present administration of the country. This can be in no other way accomplished, but by creating for the proprietors or possessors of the soil a beneficial interest, which emanating from the British Government, would increase with its duration. The landholders enjoying their estates under a moderate assessment fixed in perpetuity, are not ignorant that a change of government would be followed by the exaction of an enhanced assessment. Love of novelty may blind some, dissatisfaction with the local administration may indispose others; some may be turbulent by inclination, others may be restless by habit: but the greater number, sensible that they benefit by the continuance of the British authority, would be little disposed to listen to the suggestions of disaffection. If, on the contrary, the utmost revenue be exacted, the landholders have nothing to fear and every thing to hope from a change; and the consequent impulse to promote that event will be permanently added to the other causes of indifference or disaffection, which have been pourtrayed by the Board of Commissioners.

35. This has been viewed in a very just light by the late Commissioners, when the settlement of zillah Agra was under their consideration; and though there be no inconsistency in their taking a different view of the subject as relating to other districts, I cannot think that the distinction is well founded. At this period especially (could there have been at any time a doubt) every part of our Indian possessions must be considered as exposed to the same hazard and the same means of conciliation tending to ensure internal tranquillity. What are expedient in a frontier district, are advisable in all; and a limitation of the demand of revenue from which salutary effects are expected in the one, cannot be less productive of good consequences in the others.

36. This point, as of the highest importance, deserves ampler illustration. It may be drawn from past experience.

37. During the late war in Hindostan, the necessity of retaining a large force within the Company's territories left but a small portion of a great military establishment applicable to active operations. It will be remembered, that the safety of the state was thought to have been more than once hazarded in engagements fought under great disadvantage of numbers against an enemy essentially inferior, but who was able to bring his whole force into action, while a small part only of the British strength could be put forth against him. In future wars, the same necessity must again recur (I need not say how much to be deprecated), if the internal tranquillity of our provinces have not meantime been placed on a securer basis than that on which it then rested. But it is only by conciliating that class of men, whose conduct and disposition, whose influence and example, must determine the character and condition of the people, that the tranquillity of the country can be secured. I allude to the Zemindars, who are unquestionably the persons possessing most natural influence and effective power over the minds of the people; it is only by conferring on them the benefit of a permanent assessment of the land revenue, that great body, consisting not of a few individuals, but of the numerous landholders of the country, may be suddenly and effectually gained.

38. It appears to be a very prevalent opinion, that the British system of administration is not generally palatable to our Indian subjects. Admitting this opinion to be not unfounded, it follows that while they taste none but the unpalatable parts of that system, and while the only boon which would be acceptable to them is withheld, the landed proprietors, and with them the body of the people, must be more and more estranged from the Government, in proportion to the expectations which they had formed and the disappointment which they will have experienced.

39. In Bengal, where the national temper is indeed less turbulent; in Behar and in Benares, where the popular character and disposition are the same as in the western provinces, the permanent settlement has been long since tried with ample experience of its benefits. No disaffection, no discontent, are there supposed to prevail among the landholders and peasants. Is it credible, that the Zemindars, who have the experience of a moderate and fixed assessment, should be so insensible to the advantages which they enjoy, or so ignorant of the consequences which would follow, as to desire or in any way promote a change?

40. In fact, no apprehensions have been entertained for the public tranquillity on withdrawing the military force from those provinces; and whenever the internal peace of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces shall be as well secured, nearly the whole military establishment will be available for the purposes of active warfare. No measure would more essentially contribute to this very desirable end, than that of a permanent settlement; and even if it be attended with some sacrifice of future revenue, that would be more than compensated by an increased efficiency of military strength, giving a greater disposable force in war or permitting greater reductions of expense in peace.

41. Neither can it be admitted, that the relinquishment of a claim to participate in the future improvement of landed estates is an entire sacrifice of the revenue. Though concurring in many of the observations of the Board of Commissioners on the subject of transit and excise duties, I cannot think it would be unreasonable to attribute the productiveness of the Salt revenue and Abkarry, in Bengal and Behar, to the increased opulence of the country, ascribed to the permanent settlement as the principal cause of its general prosperity. In the increase of the revenue from unexceptionable sources, the Company have ample compensation for the doubtful expectation which was abandoned. In these observations I do not mean to hint a proposition for renewing the attempt which was unsuccessfully made to establish a Salt monopoly in the Ceded Provinces. The form of it was injudicious, and the attempt to obtain a large revenue from salt was premature: but it does not follow that, at a future period, a judicious plan may not be devised for levying a large revenue upon that necessary of life. In most countries it is heavily taxed, and it is almost the only necessary that can be taxed with propriety and effect. In the present state of society in India, where the opulent indulge less in personal enjoyment of luxuries than in maintaining numerous attendants, no productive source of revenue can be looked for, except an impost on an article of primary necessity.

42. I shall only state one further reason for a decided opinion in favour of persevering in the proclaimed intention of immediately concluding a permanent settlement for the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. I allude to the abuses to which temporary settlements are liable, and which, indeed, have been usually attendant on them. The Board of Commissioners express themselves as aware that temporary settlements are harassing, and afford opportunities for frauds.* They describe the possible misconduct of public officers in language which has greatly the appearance of pointed allusion.† Government has not before it the grounds grounds of judging whether abuses which are possible, and indeed probable, have been practised to a great extent. There certainly is no sufficient preventive, nor any effectual remedy against abuses, without a permanent assessment of the revenue; and the purity of the civil service of the Company on this establishment, which was fixed on a basis apparently secure by the system of administration established by Lord Cornwallis, would be inevitably lost in the long continuance of temporary settlements of the revenue in the extensive provinces above Benares.

43. For this and for other reasons, which have been here imperfectly stated, but which are fully set forth and amply illustrated in the copious minutes which were recorded on the settlement of Bengal, I am clearly of opinion, that the proposition of the late Board of Commissioners for the general postponement of the permanent settlement for a period of four years, which upon the same ground on which it is proposed would lead to a further and indefinite postponement, should not be adopted, and that the measure should be carried into effect in every practicable instance, conformably with the provisions of Regulation X, 1807.

44. The proposition of the Board of Commissioners next in importance * is for the continuance of the Tehsildars on the former footing. This proposal is stated contingent on the postponement of the permanent settlement: it will consequently be unnecessary to discuss the reasons of it, under a contrary resolution respecting that question.

45. I am glad, however, to observe so strong a testimony borne by the Commissioners in favour of the general character of the present Tehsildars. From the knowledge which the course of judicial functions had given me of the Tehsildars of Benares, Allahabad, and Goruckpore, particularly, and of the western zillahs in general, I had a less favourable impression of their character and conduct: but independently of this consideration, the power with which they are invested was unnecessarily great and inadequately controlled; and the intervention of such a class of persons between the landholders and the officer representing Government appears highly objectionable.

46. In regard to the expected economy from the change of system, it will be recollected that the Court of Directors have disapproved the magnitude of the revenue charges under the Government of Fort St. George, and that the amount of the charges, as remarked by the late Government of that Presidency, is very short of the expense of collection in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. A reduction of the charge has been promised by us, and will no doubt be expected by the Court of Directors, and the amount of the saving to be looked for from this source cannot be rated at less than ten lacks of rupees.

47. Another proposition of serious importance, brought forward by the late Board of Commissioners, is the rescinding of Regulation XI, 1793, and enacting a law, by which estates not exceeding 500 rupees shall go to the eldest son, to the exclusion of the rest. If the Regulation above cited, which abrogated the special customs of families in regard to the inheritance of land, were now first proposed, I should without hesitation vote against that interference with established usage. But it is late to rescind a law which has been in force for nearly fourteen years. I think it much more objectionable to interfere, as is now proposed, with the general law of inheritance, and in opposition to the usages of the country. We must be aware of lifting a rash hand against civil institutions, which are sanctified by their association with the religion and dearest prejudices of our native subjects.

48. Very minute subdivision of landed property is, no doubt, inconvenient to Government: but other means may be devised of remedying the inconvenience, without interfering with the law of inheritance, or without excluding coheirs and copartners from the enjoyment of their several rights. Regulation VI, 1807, does not, to my apprehension, provide the proper remedy. But the consideration of this subject does not press for immediate attention.

49. I am happy to concur entirely with the Board of Commissioners in the expediency of revising the Regulations concerning different classes of landholders holders and tenants, and prescribing definite rules for determining claims to property in the soil. Instructions have been issued on this subject to the Board of Commissioners, and information from them may be early expected; it may, however, be proper to draw their attention again to this very important subject.

50. It would be wrong to prejudge the question of the concurrent rights of Talookdars and Zemindars; it ought to be decided on considerations of justice and preferable right, and not on those of policy and expediency. But if the scale of justice be so equally balanced as to leave room for the admission of other considerations, I am disposed to think that expediency might incline the scale in favour of the village Zemindars against the superior Talookdars.

51. The inferior class of landholders in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces appears, from such information as is at present before Government, to be precisely similar to the village Zemindars of Benares, and Malicks of Behar: the Talookdars correspond to the pergunnah Zemindars of both these provinces. The preference was there given to the village Zemindars; but that did not operate to the extent of entirely depriving the superior landholder of his estate. The greater part remained to him, as also happened in the case of the separation of inferior Talookdars in Bengal, except perhaps a few instances or a solitary one, in which nothing remained to the superior landholder, and here the liberality of Government interposed for his relief.

52. Considering the hazard which may attend the measure of depriving the powerful Talookdars, in zillahs Allighur and Seharunpore, of the farms held by them, the late Commissioners suggest* that the settlement may be made with them as Aumils, under a stipulation requiring them to grant pottahs to the inferior Zemindars at fair and equitable rates, and under a prohibition to the judicial and revenue officers against interfering on trivial occasions.

53. It is known to every judicial officer in Bengal, that the provisions in the Regulations for preventing undue exactions from department Talookdars have proved totally nugatory, though the courts of justice are open to them for recourse. The proposed stipulations would not be more efficacious, and would be a very illusory fulfilment of that guarantee of private rights, which, in the Commissioners' opinion, it would be contrary to all principle in any case to suspend.

54. I am by no means satisfied, that any necessity exists for continuing the powerful Talookdars in possession of all their farms They do not pretend to have received any permanent grant of them, or to possess any proprietary right to them. That they will be best pleased to retain them on the advantageous footing which they at present enjoy, cannot be questioned: that they would be provoked to rebellion or irritated to disaffection by the refusal to renew their recent farms, may be doubted. But even if it be necessary or advisable to conciliate these powerful chieftains by so great a sacrifice of public revenue, it would be much more for the interest of Government to grant them their entire estates in jaghire, in lieu of the more extensive farms held by them for an inadequate tribute. Their local influence would be thus restricted to narrower limits, the hazard of irritation from the interference of revenue and judicial officers would be greatly diminished, the sacrifice of the public resources would be not augmented, and Government would be at liberty to fulfil, with sincerity, its guarantee of the rights of landholders.

55. The late Commissioners propose† that clauses of the Regulations, under which the claims of farmers and landholders to be admitted to the settlement are maintained, should be revised and explained. I am not aware of any objection to this proposal; and considering how much doubt has been entertained, and how desirable it is that no room should be left for misconstruction, or for any strain in favour of one description of persons to the injury of another, I think it may be right to introduce into the intended Regulation a declaration of the true meaning of the clauses in question.

56. I cannot omit to remark, in this place, an extraordinary misapprehension of the Regulations, which appears in the report of the Collector of Etawah‡ transmitted transmitted by the Board of Commissioners. He says that, "as the Regulation "for the guidance of Collectors allowed no discrimination beyond the fulfil-"ment of engagements on the part of the Zemindars or farmers, with whom "the second settlement was in all cases to be concluded, he could not in any "case eject the farmers. He could only refer the claimants to the Adawlut: "but he made it a rule to require an engagement from the farmer, that if the "Zemindar should obtain a decree the farmer should account to him." The Collector had here totally lost sight of the 7th Section of the Regulation to which he alludes (Regulation V, 1805), where provision is expressly made for the admission of the Zemindars, conformably with a former Regulation (Regulation XXV, 1803, Section 33); and he had forgotten, that the Court at that period had no power to decree immediate possession to the Zemindar and dispossession to the farmer, in any other case but where it was already the Collector's duty to admit the Zemindar in preference to the farmer.

P

57. There is some appearance of a misapprehension of the same kind in the Commissioners' observations* on the question between the Zemindars and farmers, where they argue, that the Zemindars, who declined the first settlement, voluntarily submitted to the consequences (of being excluded not for the three years but for ten); and especially where the Commissioners cite Regulation XXV, 1803, Section 29,† as directing that the second and third settlements should be made with the same persons, whether Zemindars or farmers, and as holding out the advantages of a long lease indiscriminately to both landholders and farmers.

58. Another proposition of the Commissioners regards a Regulation intended for the security of sureties, by giving to them the right of mortgagees, when they have been compelled to make good the revenue for which they were answerable, and authorizing the Collector to give them possession after a summary enquiry.

59. Though consideration be undoubtedly due to sureties, whom the bad faith of the landholders had subjected to heavy responsibility, I entertain some doubt of the propriety of creating, by Regulation, a contract not in contemplation of the parties. It may however be advisable, that the opinion of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut and present Board of Commissioners should be taken on the proposed enactment.

60. I have felt so much concern in the necessity of repeatedly expressing my dissent from the propositions of the late Board of Commissioners, that I have a sincere gratification in passing to other propositions which have my unreserved concurrence.

61. Sales of land for arrears of revenue should certainly be avoided, to the utmost practicable degree. I entertain a hope, that means may be devised for the recovery of arrears, without recourse against the person of the defaulter or the property of his estate. The Regulations for Benares contained provisions adapted to that purpose; and unless it appear on enquiry that they have been neglected for sufficient reasons, I should recommend the revival of them in that province, and the extension of similar provisions to the western provinces.

62. The Board of Commissioners recommend‡ a more efficient authority in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, to afford security to the people and guard the interests of Government. This is desirable, not only for the immediate purpose hinted by them, but for the important end of conciliating our new subjects, who are acquainted with their British rulers in none but the invidious characters of lawyers and tax-gatherers. They see only judges administering obnoxious laws with undiscriminating rigour, and collectors exacting the utmost revenue with uncongenial punctuality. We cannot, perhaps, establish any controlling authority, which is not connected either with the revenue or with the administration of law: but I am willing to believe, and an incidental remark of the Commissioners authorizes me in the belief, that the court of appeal may be less unpopular than the district courts, and that a permanent controlling authority in the revenue branch would be conciliatory and useful.

63. I shall conclude by declaring my concurrence in the Commissioners' recommendation, that steadiness, moderation, and justice, should be the features borne borne by the administration of Government. But it is not by abandoning a measure deliberately resolved on, and beneficial to our subjects, that we shall prove our steadiness. It is not by grasping at the highest revenue, and wringing from our peasants the utmost rent, that we shall evince our moderation: nor is it by depriving the sons of our petty landholders of their birth-right that we shall demonstrate our sense of justice.

MR. LUMSDEN'S MINUTE.

Mr. Lumsden's Minute, 11 June 1808.

1. THE several propositions submitted for the consideration of Government, in the final report of the late Board of Commissioners in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, involve questions of the first importance to the interests of the East India Company, as well as to the future condition of an extensive and populous division of our Indian territory, constituting, as well from its distant situation from the immediate seat of Government, as from the character and habits of the people, one of the most interesting portions of the British possessions in Asia. I have accordingly perused, with the attention which the subject required, the report of the late Commissioners, and the minute which has been circulated by Mr. Colebrooke, containing his observations on the several questions to which that report has reference.

2. The first and most important of these questions undoubtedly is that, which has for its object the decision to be passed on the recommendation of the late Board of Commissioners, that the conclusion of a permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, subject to the confirmation of the Honourable the Court of Directors, shall be postponed until the expiration of the fussily year 1219, or the year 1812 of the Christian era.

3. The objections to the conclusion of an immediate conditional permanent settlement, which were stated in the report of the Commissioners, appeared to me to be entitled to very serious consideration, and I still think that many of those objections are of considerable magnitude. Since the perusal, however, of Mr. Colebrooke's very able minute, I have referred to the proceedings of this Government on the conclusion of the permanent settlement of the revenues of Bengal and Bahar, in the years 1789 and 1790, when the subject was fully discussed, in all its relations, by the late revered Governor General, Marquis Cornwallis, and by Lord Teignmouth; and I am now satisfied that it will, under all circumstances, be most expedient to adhere to the decision announced to the public by Regulation X. of 1807, and to conclude, in all practicable cases, a settlement for four years, including a stipulation that the settlement for the year 1219 fussily shall be permanent, if it shall be approved by the Honourable the Court of Directors.

4. Although, however, Mr. Colebrooke's conclusions on this important question have my concurrence, I still consider it to be my duty to record my sentiments in some detail on each of the objections to the proposed measure which have been stated by the late Board of Commissioners. I cannot agree with Mr. Colebrooke in the regret he expresses, that the late Board of Commissioners should have called for the opinion of the several Collectors of Revenue on the expediency of the conclusion of an immediate permanent settlement: on the contrary, believing, as I do, that the reports which they have collected under this requisition, with respect to the present condition of those provinces, contain a body of information which may be essentially useful, both to this Government and the Court of Directors, on a subject which, from its magnitude, cannot be canvassed with too much scrupulous attention, I am of opinion, that the time both of the Commissioners and of the Collectors of Revenue could not have been employed in any way better calculated to promote the public interests, and that, without such information, the Honourable Court would not have possessed the means of deciding whether the approaching settlement should or should not be declared to be permanent.

Mr. Lumsden's Minute, 11 June 1808.

5. The objection first in order, of those adverted to by the late Commissioners, is founded on the imperfect knowledge yet acquired of the resources of the country. On this subject I entirely agree with Mr. Colebrooke, that we are not likely, without the institution of vexatious local inquiries and hustaboods (which I must deprecate, as of all other measures that which is most calculated to lead to abuse, and to alienate the attachment of our native subjects), to possess any more accurate knowledge of the resources of the country, at the expiration of four, or even of ten years, than that which we have already obtained, and indeed, that the same obstacle would oppose the conclusion of a permanent settlement at any given period of time. Still, however, I think it is a fortunate circumstance, that the objection has been now brought under discussion, because, if I am not mistaken, the sanction of the Court of Directors was given to the conclusion of a permanent settlement at Fort St. George, on the principle of its being preceded by an actual survey; and it may, therefore, be supposed, that they will wish to be in possession of the sentiments of this Government, with respect to the expediency of the adoption of a measure of the same nature in our late acquisitions. For my own part, I am satisfied that we are not in danger from this cause, of making any sacrifice of revenue to an extent which merits consideration, when opposed to the objections which exist against harassing local inquiries.

6. The next objection is founded on the inequality in the present assessment of the revenue in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. That such inequality exists, there is abundant evidence on the records of Government; and it is unquestionably desirable that the evil (for such it is) should be corrected, as far as may be practicable. To expect perfect equality, either now or at any future season, would be fruitless; and it is certain that equality, even if obtained, would not continue for any considerable time. But it may be hoped that the experience which has been acquired during the last settlement will enable the Collectors to do much towards the equalization of the jumma; and this expectation is sanctioned, in some measure, by the remarks of the late Board of Commissioners on the effect of Regulation V. of 1805, in extending to the second settlement of the Ceded Provinces the errors which had been committed at the conclusion of the first. It may be inferred, from their observation, that many of those errors have now been discovered, and that they will be corrected at the approaching settlement.

7. On the observation of the late Board of Commissioners, with respect to the means which will be afforded to the proprietors of large tracts of arable lands now lying waste, to ruin the landholders of a different description by enticing from them their Ryots, for the purpose of bringing those lands into a state of cultivation, I have to remark, that the proprietors of estates of the same description in Bengal, as well as the proprietors of the very extensive estates held in that province under rent-free tenures, possessed equal means of injuring their neighbours, by the offer of more favourable terms to the cultivators of the soil than could be afforded to them by the holders of the lands assessed at a high revenue, and that experience has shewn that in Bengal no material inconvenience has arisen from this source.

8. On the subject of the objections to the conclusion of a permanent settlement, founded on the great proportion of uncultivated land, the deficiency of population, and the want of capital to extend the cultivation, and on the prospect of obtaining at some future period an increase of revenue, to the annual extent of seventy-five lacs of rupees, the arguments which were recorded by the late venerated Marquis Cornwallis, on the occasion of the formation of the permanent settlement of Bengal and Bahar, appear to me to be conclusive. The same objections were then opposed to the conclusion of a permanent settlement in the lower provinces, and they were considered to exist, in a greater extent, in Bengal and Bahar, than is now supposed in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. I entertain very serious doubts, whether or not any considerable improvements, either in the population or in the capital of the country, can be expected under temporary settlements; and I consider it to be probable, that the possession by the landholders of large portions of waste lands, capable of being brought into a state of cultivation for their own exclusive advantage, will afford the means best calculated, and most likely to be be efficacious, in the conversion into a race of quiet and well-disposed subjects of a large proportion of the inhabitants of our western provinces, who now subsist either by engaging in the military service of foreign states, or by the exercise of the occupation of professed robbers and plunderers.

9. Acknowledging, as I do, in its fullest extent, the great improvement which has taken place during the last eighteen years (as described by Mr. Colebrooke) in the provinces of Bengal and Bahar, and ascribing that improvement almost exclusively to the operation of the permanent settlement, I do not consider the expectation of a future possible exclusion of the land-revenue of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, even to the amount of seventy-five lacs of rupees, to be of sufficient moment to justify the dereliction of the proposed measure of the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement, on such conditions as may be warranted by our present knowledge of the resources of the country. The acquisition of such additional resource must, at any rate, be precarious and distant; and if, by the operation of that settlement, the general body of the landholders shall be enriched and the population extended, there can be no doubt that the resources of the state will be ultimately improved by the increased produce of the existing taxes, and of others which may hereafter be introduced, without proving burthensome to a prosperous and wealthy community.

10. Although, in the estimation of the causes which may be supposed to have produced the late increase in the consumption of salt purchased at the Company's sales in the Lower Provinces, and the consequent augmentation of the revenue from salt, something may be allowed for the check which has been given to the practice of smuggling, yet I am persuaded that this advantage is chiefly to be ascribed to the increase of the population and wealth of the country, which has been the consequence of the permanent settlement. The improvement of the customs has been less perceptible; but there is reason to believe that the principle on which they have been collected has been injudicious and oppressive to trade: and I have no doubt that, even under the present defective system, they would have proved greatly more productive, had not the situation of Europe, for these last fifteen years, operated as a serious discouragement to those important branches of the commerce of these provinces, which are dependant on the state of the markets at home. It may be hoped that, in the course of a few years, corresponding advantages will be obtained from the limitation of the land-revenue of the Upper Provinces, and that any sacrifice which we may make of that branch of our resources will be amply compensated by the encreasing produce of other objects of taxation, of which the consumption will take place with the improvement which may be effected in the condition of the people. Whether any considerable revenue can ever be obtained from the article of salt in those provinces, it would now be premature to determine. I am persuaded that, under present circumstances, no such revenue could be collected, without the intervention of such vexatious regulations, for the prevention of smuggling, as would inevitably excite universal disgust in the minds of the people in general, and that this result should not now be hazarded. When the operation of our general system of revenue shall be better understood, and its advantages acknowledged, we may, without risk, introduce many new taxes which ought not now to be attempted.

11. The objections to a permanent settlement, arising from the existing restrictions on commerce and the want of opulent consumers, are founded on the same principles as the objections arising from the want of capital to extend the cultivation, and with these last they must stand or fall. The restrictions on the commerce, certainly, require early consideration; and they will, no doubt, be removed as soon, and to as great an extent, as the public exigencies will admit. They do not appear to me, however, to constitute any valid obstacle to the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement; and it may be hoped that the operation of that measure will tend, more than any other, to the extension of individual wealth, and to the consequent increased consumption of all articles of trade.

12. I do not perceive, that the necessity for continuing a certain description of farmers in the Ceded Provinces in the possession of their farms for a further period of four years, can be considered to constitute any objection to the conclusion clusion of a permanent settlement of estates which are not under such circumstances. I must take this opportunity of observing, however, that after an attentive perusal of the proclamation issued by the late Lieutenant-Governor and Board of Commissioners, on the 14th of July, 1802, incorporated into Regulation XXV. of 1803, and of clause 3, section 53, of Regulation XXVII. of 1803, I am by no means satisfied that our orders of the 26th of February last, for the conclusion of the approaching settlement with the acknowledged proprietors of lands which have been let in farm during the two last settlements, in cases where the farmers have fulfilled their engagements, and where the proprietors did not claim the right of engaging for their own lands within the period of the first settlement, can be reconciled with the conditions under which the leases were granted to those farmers. These acknowledged proprietors must have had the option of engaging for the first settlement, if their rights were admitted within six months from the 14th of July, 1802; and for the second, if they were admitted within the period of three years from that date: and if they did avail themselves of that option, I am disposed to think that it must have been understood, as well by the officers of Government as by the farmers, that the latter were entitled to continue in the occupation of their farms, until the expiration of the tenth year from the formation of the first settlement.

13. I do not immediately recollect, that the extent of resumable land yet unascertained is stated by the late Board of Commissioners as an objection to the conclusion of a permanent settlement; but, at any rate, the investigation of the tenures under which these lands are held may be prosecuted, with equal facility, after the settlement shall have been made as at present, and the revenue of the lands which shall be found to be liable to resumption may be added to the jumma at the conclusion of the proposed inquiry.

14. The next, and, in my judgment, the most important objection to the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement, is founded on the prevailing uncertainty with respect to the proprietary right in the lands, and the non-existence of any rules, applicable to the cases of the superior Talookdars and the village Zemindars, respectively, by which the Collectors of Revenue and the Board of Commissioners may be enabled to decide with whom the settlement should be made. It is true, that this question was referred to the Board of Commissioners on the 26th of February last, with directions to consult the several Collectors, and afterwards to submit, for the consideration and orders of Government, the draft of a Regulation for defining the relative rights of those persons; and it may be hoped that some progress has been made in the performance of this duty: but I doubt whether the interval which will elapse before the commencement of the ensuing year, when the new settlement must be concluded, is sufficient to admit of the acquisition of such accurate information on this important subject, as will be absolutely necessary to enable the Governor-General in Council to decide a question in which so many interests are concerned. I shall have occasion again to revert to this subject in a future part of the Minute.

15. I am not aware, that any very material inconvenience will arise in consequence of the doubtful value of the standard coin. The settlement is to be concluded in the Lucknow sicca rupee of the Furruckabad coinage, of which the actual value is declared in Regulation III. of 1806; and although a considerable period of time will probably elapse before this coin can be brought to circulate to the exclusion of all others, yet as the relative value of the other coins in use in the Upper Provinces has been ascertained (it is presumed with considerable accuracy), and has been fixed by the same Regulation, neither the Collectors of Revenue nor the landholders will have much difficulty in determining the amount of the payments to be made by the latter in rupees of sorts.

16. With regard to the risk of disappointment, should the settlement be disapproved by the Honourable the Court of Directors, I consider the answer of the late Marquis Cornwallis to the same objection to a provisional declaration of the permanency of the decennial settlement in Bengal and Bahar, as quoted by Mr. Colebrooke, to be equally applicable on this occasion. I think, however, that it will be prudent to instruct the Board of Commissioners to issue a positive injunction to all the Collectors, requiring them to explain, in the clearest manner, manner, to all with whom engagements are concluded, that the permanency of the settlement must depend on its confirmation by the Honourable Court, and to take special care that this provision shall be clearly specified in every engagement.

17. The sentiments stated in the forty-second paragraph of Mr. Colebrooke's Minute, on the baneful consequences which may be produced by frequent temporary settlements in the purity of the character of this service, have my entire concurrence; and I consider the removal of the means of abuse which the formation of a new settlement, under whatever restrictions and control, unquestionably affords to those whose principles of integrity and honour may be lax and unsettled, to be one very important advantage of a permanent settlement.

18. The observations of the late Board of Commissioners on the office of Tehsildar, do not appear to me to be sufficient to warrant any immediate alteration of the rules respecting the constitution of that office, established by Regulation XXI of 1806. Whether those rules shall be found to be compatible with the punctual realization of the public revenue, must be determined by the test of experience, and they may be either amended or abrogated at any future period of time. I consider it, however, to be proper to declare, that I entertain much doubt whether the alteration in the constitution of the office of Tehsildar will be found to be a measure of economy. The estimate of Mr. Colebrooke of the extent of the actual saving from the reduction of the allowance to the Tehsildars, will certainly be verified; but I do not conceive that the public revenue will be realized with nearly the same facility and punctuality as at present: and I apprehend that the irrecoverable balances, for some years at least, will be much more considerable than they have proved under the responsibility of the Tehsildars. It will afford me real pleasure, if this apprehension shall hereafter appear to be groundless.

19. Mr. Colebrooke is much more competent to speak of the general character of the Tehsildars than I am. The abuses practised by some officers of this description in the zemindary of Benares have undoubtedly been of great magnitude; but I am strongly disposed to believe that, in common with the generality of the natives of India, their conduct in the discharge of their official functions is greatly influenced by the character and proceedings of the European officers of Government under whom they are employed, and that under an active Collector of scrupulous intregrity, all gross abuse of the powers intrusted to them, under the original constitution of the office, may be, and frequently has been prevented. I avail myself of this opportunity to state my entire concurrence in the sentiment of regret expressed by the late Board of Commissioners, that the nature of our situation, as sovereigns of this extensive empire, necessarily compels us to exclude from almost all offices of responsibility and advantage the natives of India of rank and character. This I consider to be a very serious evil; but I am afraid that it does not now admit of remedy. I trust, however, that at a future season it will be practicable to admit persons of this description, whether Mahommedans or Hindoos, to a larger share in the management of the affairs of their country than could at present be intrusted to them with safety, or with that regard to the principles of rigid economy, which the state of public affairs so imperiously requires.

20. The proposition of the late Board of Commissioners for rescinding Regulation XI of 1793, and enacting a law, by which estates not exceeding in value 500 rupees per annum shall descend to the eldest son, to the exclusion of the remaining heirs, is undoubtedly of great importance, and ought not to be adopted without the most mature deliberation. The arguments by which the suggestion has been supported are, in my judgment, extremely forcible; but as the question does not require early decision, and as Mr. Colebrooke is of opinion that the evils arising from the law of succession, as it now stands, may be effectually removed by other means, it may lie over for future consideration.

21. The question of the relative rights of the Talookdars and village Zemindars must undoubtedly be decided on considerations of justice and preferable title, as recommended by Mr. Colebrooke. At present we are not in possession of information sufficient to enable us to give any opinion on the subject; and and I am by no means prepared to acquiesce in the proposition, that the village Zemindars ought to be entirely separated from the superior Talookdars, even if their condition shall be found to be precisely similar to that of the village Zemindars in Benares and Malicks in Bahar. By whatever means the village Zemindars may have been placed in a condition of subordination to the Talookdars, I am disposed to think that the existence of that subordination, for a long course of years, ought to be considered to constitute, in favour of the Talookdars, a right by prescription to the exercise over the inferior landholders of that degree of authority which may not be inconsistent with the principles of distributive justice. It is the duty of the ruling power to see that none of its subjects are oppressed: but I apprehend that the emancipation of an inferior from the authority which has so long been exercised by his superior, as to vest the latter with what is generally understood to constitute a prescriptive right to the exercise of such authority, even although no pecuniary sacrifice is required from the superior, must be considered to be a violation of the just rights of the superior. This question will certainly be considered with the attention to which, from its importance, it is entitled, when we shall be in possession of correct information with respect to the actual situation of the parties.

22. The powerful Talookdars in the zillahs of Allighur and Seharunpore can certainly prefer no claim of right to be continued in possession of their farms: but if there is any reason to apprehend that to deprive them of these at the present time would either excite them to rebellion, or occasion serious disgust and disaffection, it is my decided opinion, that this ought not now to be attempted, and that the conclusion of a permanent settlement, as well of their talooks as of their farms, ought to be postponed to a future opportunity. We have the testimony of the late Board of Commissioners, that at a season when every other part of the district of Allighur had suffered severely from the effects of the last year's drought, the lands in the occupation of Thakoor Diaram, of Hautrus, and of Bugwunt Sing, were in a high state of cultivation, and it may be inferred from this fact that they are not oppressive landlords.

23. The Acting Collector of Allighur, Mr. Claud Russell, has already given his opinion, that neither Diaram nor Bugwunt Sing would relinquish their farms without a struggle; and as Mr. Russell has held the office of Collector of Allighur from the period of its annexation to the British possessions, his authority with me has much weight. But if further information shall be deemed necessary, it may be called for through the Board of Commissioners, and the opinion of Mr. Crisp (who doubtless possesses much information on every topic connected with the affairs of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces) may be consulted.

24. The suggestion of the late Board of Commissioners, with respect to the additional security proposed to be granted to sureties, may be taken into consideration, when the opinions of the present Board of Commissioners and of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut (to whom a reference is recommended by Mr. Colebrooke) shall have been received. If the information communicated by Mr. Salmon, the late Collector of Etawah, on this subject is correct, it is not to be expected that any sufficient security for the public revenue will be obtained at the approaching settlement, unless some means shall be devised for facilitating the recovery of the just claims of persons of this description from the estates of the petty landholders, for whom they may become responsible.

25. I am not aware of any objection to the proposition of Mr. Colebrooke for the revival of Section 17, Regulation VI of 1795, in the zemindarry of Benares, and its extension to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; but before any regulation for this purpose shall be enacted, it will be proper to ascertain from the Board of Revenue, why the provisions in that clause have become obsolete in Benares (if such is the case), and to consult the opinion of the Board of Commissioners as to its extension (with any modification they may suggest) to the Upper Provinces. A considerable time must elapse before landed property can acquire its real value in those provinces; and it is much to be wished that, until then, all sales of land could be avoided.

26. I have long been satisfied that the Board of Revenue in Calcutta can exercise no efficient control over the officers of Government employed in the collection collection of the revenue in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and that the establishment of a local Board of Superintendance, possessing the same powers as are now vested in the Board of Commissioners, is extremely desirable. Mr. Lumsden's Minute, 11 June 1808.

98. We have the satisfaction, however, to be able to point out, for the consideration of your Honourable Court, the reports furnished by the Board of Commissioners upon the settlement of the district of Agra.* Revenue Letter from Bengal, 30 December 1809.

99. We shall not attempt, until the receipt of the revised and final settlement account, to draw any arithmetical comparison between the present and the former jumma, as exhibited in the general statement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, contained in the third paragraph of the dispatch from this Government of the 21st August 1806. We cannot, however, omit to draw the attention of your Honourable Court, generally, first to the large increase of jumma stated in the above-mentioned report in the district of Agra; and secondly, to the considerable reduction already effected in the expense of the tehsildarry establishments. A portion of the former is indeed nominal, arising from the resumption of the jaghires which had been granted to the connections of Dowlut Rao Scindia, and which have been since commuted for pecuniary allowances. The net increase is, however, still considerable, and the reduction effected in the tehsildarry establishments is a clear saving to Government.

100. We shall embrace the earliest opportunity of submitting to you the most explicit information on this important and interesting subject.

(Letter from, dated 30th Dec. 1809. Par. 98 to 100.) Triennial settlement of the district of Agra.

Par. 59. Till the revised and final settlement account of this district, which you have promised to transmit, comes before us, we are unable to draw any comparison between the present and the former jumma. Revenue Letter to Bengal, 15 January 1812.

60. Our attention, however, having been repeatedly attracted, in the course of your late correspondence in this department, to the very important subject of a perpetual settlement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, the revenues of which, since the period of their acquisition, have been administered under temporary arrangements, we embrace this opportunity of renewing a discussion upon which we have already entered, in our dispatch dated 1st February 1811, paragraph 15, and which you will have perceived, from that communication, engages much of our solicitude.

61. If we can judge from the tenour of your correspondence, it would seem that you consider the measure of extending to the Ceded and Conquered Territories the permanent settlement, on precisely the same footing on which it has been established in the Bengal provinces, as one, the policy of which does not admit of doubt, and the adoption of which ought not even to be delayed.

62. In the papers to which reference is made in the paragraphs to which we are now replying, we find a decision couched in the following terms, and communicated by your Secretary to the Board of Commissioners, in a letter dated 4th August 1809.†

63. " The Governor-General in Council has been pleased to approve and " confirm the triennial settlement concluded by the late Acting Collector " of Agra. His Lordship in Council has likewise been pleased to determine, " that

"that the assessment fixed in the last year of that period, amounting to Rupees "3,12,495, be considered permanent, with the reservation of the approval of "the Honourable the Court of Directors."

64. In explaining the reasons which induce us to withhold our sanction from this resolution, we shall take occasion to state several suggestions which occur to us, as presenting questions worthy of the most mature deliberation, without (at least in this stage of the discussion) meaning to found upon them a fixed rule of conduct to which you are inflexibly to adhere. To the formation of any system connected with the administration of India, we are fully aware that, besides a studious attention to the general principles of political economy, an intimate knowledge of the character and manners, the habits and prejudices of the natives, is required; and we could have wished that you had put us fully in possession of your views upon the subject of the depending settlements of our territorial revenues, together with the grounds on which they rest, without taking it for granted that the plan now in operation in Bengal is indisputably the best that can be framed, in reference not only to past experience, but to its probable operation in future. An exposition of the doubts which we entertain will give you an opportunity of supplying this omission, and may lead either to improvement in that plan, or a more entire conviction that improvement is unnecessary.

65. We have uniformly been of opinion, that supposing the principle of the permanent settlement in the Bengal provinces to have been as politic and wise as the sentiments which dictated it certainly were liberal and disinterested, a similar settlement ought not hastily to be introduced into territories which have but recently devolved under our anthority, and with the resources of which we must be imperfectly acquainted.

66. The Company had been in possession of Bengal for nearly thirty years before the Government fixed limits to its demands upon the land: it was not, therefore, without surprise, that we were informed, in your Revenue Letter dated 28th October 1808, of your having deputed two Commissioners, for the purpose of extending that settlement to a vast extent of country which was acquired, by treaty and conquest, only five and six years before.*

67. Upon the coast, experience has already shewn the ill effects which we apprehended might result from precipitating such an arrangement. The permanent settlement which was introduced into the province of Dindigul totally failed; and after sustaining a considerable loss of revenue, the Madras Government has been obliged to resort to the establishment of a system of village leases.

68. We are the more surprised at your resolution, declaring the triennial settlement of the district of Agra permanent, with the reservation of our sanction, as it is an open departure from your own Regulations. In Regulation IX, 1805, the provisions of which are expressly applied to the settlement of the zillah of Agra, it is enacted, "that three successive settlements of the "land revenue, in the territory aforesaid, shall be concluded for the following "periods of time: first, for the years 1213, 1214, and 1215, fusily; secondly, "for the years 1216, 1217, and 1218, fusily; and, thirdly, for the years "1219, 1220, 1221, and 1222, fusily," under the terms and conditions therein specified: at the conclusion of which term (and not till then) a permanent settlement was to be concluded only for such lands as might be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure.

69. Instead, however, of following the course prescribed by this Regulation, we find, in your decision already quoted, the second triennial settlement of the three declared permanent, subject only to our approval, without regard, as far as we can perceive, to the state of cultivation at the time, or waiting the progress of improvement between the termination of fusily 1218 and the commencement of fusily 1223, as originally intended and apparently definitely arranged.

70. Upon

* Cuttack was ceded to the Company by the treaty of peace concluded with the Rajah of Berar, dated 17th December 1803, and the provinces in Oude were ceded by the treaty with the Nabob Vizier, dated 10th November 1801.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 15 January 1812.

70. Upon this ground, as well as upon those stated in the preceding paragraphs, we have no hesitation in withholding our acquiescence from the decision above quoted.

71. But it is not merely to the question of time that we mean to confine our observations.

72. We have, in paragraphs 31 to 37 of our dispatch dated the 1st of February 1811, pressed upon your consideration the expediency of so far limiting the perpetual settlement of the territories in India which still remain unsettled, as to guard against the inconvenience which is now felt in those provinces, where a permanent settlement of the land revenue has been established, by the loss which Government must sustain from a gradual and increasing depreciation in the value of money.

73. Whether, in addition to this precaution, provision might not also be made for a certain moderate participation, on the part of Government, with the landholders, in the profits which they may derive from the improvement of the land, is the question to which we would now draw your attention.

74. The propositions are in themselves very distinct; and though the former does not necessarily preclude the latter, the second, if acted upon, would in a great measure render the adoption of the first unnecessary.

75. To prevent all misapprehension, it may be proper to observe, in setting out, that the question, as we have here stated it, will, if decided either way, leave the measure of assigning the lands in perpetual property to the landholders equally unembarrassed. The point to be determined is simply this: whether, in the future settlements of the lands, we shall give an irrevocable pledge to the whole body of proprietors, that in no circumstances, and under no possible contingency, we shall increase our demand upon this fund of revenue, whether that demand be considered in the light of a tax or a quit rent.

76. True it is that an arrangement, under which the Government would reserve to itself a claim upon a share of the value of the increased produce of the land, or rather the right of augmenting the land-tax in proportion to the increased power of the land to pay it, does imply a departure from the principle of the permanent settlement in Bengal, which has secured to the proprietors of estates the whole advantage of a rise in their rental.

77. But it may, we think, admit of doubt, whether that principle has proved so beneficial in practice; or whether, notwithstanding the high and enlightened authorities by which it has been sanctioned, it be so indisputably just in theory, as to entitle it to an unreserved recognition in all settlements of the land in time to come.

78. That the hopes which were entertained, at the period of the introduction of the permanent settlement into Bengal, of Government being able to compensate itself for the sacrifice which it made in fixing to perpetuity the maximum of its claims upon the land by taxation on other objects, have not been realized, will be manifest, on comparing the amount of the public revenue at that time and the present, together with the sources from which, at the two epochs, that revenue was and is derived. And this comparison will, we think, warrant the inference, that it is to the territory of India which the Government must, for a considerable period to come, look for the means of its own support, and that, by declaring the land-tax unalterable, we are, in effect, affixing bounds to our resources, whilst the extent of our possible exigencies remains unlimited.

79. Indeed, it would not now be very difficult to account for a result, which by the framers of that settlement was probably either not foreseen or not duly appreciated; but whatever may be the causes to which it is ascribable, it would not only justify, but call for an investigation, whether, under a somewhat different mode of settlement, all the advantages of the other may not be obtained, in an equal or superior degree, while the great disadvantages attending it will not be felt.

80. We are not aware, that a settlement, in which Government should reserve to itself the right of raising the assessment upon the land, in proportion to to the growing wealth of the proprietors and its own increasing wants, would be found either very exceptionable in principle or difficult in practice.

81. Were a tax imposed which should be in proportion to the amount of the annual produce of the soil, or which should vary even with every variation of the rent, it might, besides being difficult of collection, prove in its operation fatal to improvement.

82. But a medium may be tried, between a land-tax varying from year to year, according to the produce or according to the rent, and a permanent land-tax never to be varied at all. Openings may be left at stated periods, too distant to retard improvement, both for regulating inequalities to which every land-tax, assessed according to a general survey and valuation, is liable in course of time (different parts of the country being susceptible of different degrees of improvement), and for recruiting the funds of the Government, when they are found inadequate to the demand of public exigencies.

83. In Europe, the duration of lives, one with another, is calculated at about fifteen years. If this calculation will apply to India, a settlement liable to revision on the succession of every new incumbent to an estate, would give life-security to the Zemindars, and at the same time establish a reservation sufficiently favourable to the interests of the Company.

84. We perceive, however, three objections to which a settlement of this description is liable:—First. Instead of preventing the inequalities to which every permanently fixed assessment is liable, it would probably rather multiply them in the course of any given period of time. The assessment on one estate might not be revised once in fifty years, whereas the assessment on another might have been increased five different times under the operation of the same rule.—Secondly. As instances of the demise of the proprietors of estates would be occurring every year, the duty of reassessing such estates would devolve upon the Collectors of Zillahs, and throw more power into their hands than it might be expedient that any individual, holding that situation in the service, should possess.—And, thirdly. In cases were estates were transferred by sale or otherwise, during the life-time of the proprietor, a difficulty would arise, whether they ought to be reassessed or not, and a decision either way would be attended with much inconvenience.

85. It is worth consideration, therefore, whether it would not be a more eligible plan, upon the whole, to fix a certain interval between each term of assessment, at the expiration of which a general revisal of the relative proportion of the existing tax to the increased, stationary, or decreased state of the improvement in the several provinces, should take place under the more immediate auspices of Government, and by a commission appointed expressly for that purpose.

86. It would be a point of some delicacy, to settle the period during which each assessment ought to last. Were this period too short, the proprietor would not have a sufficient inducement to improve his estate, and were the period too long, the object of Government, in adopting this limited mode of settlement, would be in some measure defeated. But lest it should, in any degree, tend to discourage improvement, the term should rather be too long than too short.

87. At the periods fixed for revising the assessments, there might be some difficulty in ascertaining, with precision, the progress of improvement; but we have no apprehension that this difficulty would be insurmountable.

88. Let it be recollected, also, that there is a greater facility in India, than perhaps in any other country of the world, of ascertaining the progress of improvement and the state of production, not only from the provincial surveys which have been executed under the auspices and by the servants of Government, but from the village accounts, where the cultivation and produce of every year are recorded, and which lie open to the inspection of the officers of revenue.

89. It may, indeed, be urged, that inspections of this nature into the concerns of individuals are troublesome and vexatious. But the natives of India have have been always accustomed to them, and they do, in fact, take place in certain circumstances, even under the permanent settlement.

90. We are fully sensible of the caution with which the best digested speculations ought to be received into any scheme of practical policy; but it is no demerit, at least in the plan now brought forward for discussion (we repeat that it is not prescribed for your implicit adoption), that the suffrage of one of the most enlightened writers on political economy may be quoted in its favour. "In all the variations of the state of society," says Dr. Adam Smith, "in "the improvement and in the declension of agriculture, in all the variations of "the value of silver, and in all those in the standard of the coin, a tax of this "kind would, of its own accord and without any attention of Government, "readily suit itself to the actual situation of things, and would be equally just "and equitable in all those different changes."*

91. When the term of the settlement is once fixed (suppose for ten, fifteen, or twenty yeats), it should be distinctly understood, that it will be renewed at its expiration for the same period, subject to an augmentation of assessment. This understanding, from the beginning, between Government and the proprietors, will, in the words of the author above quoted, "give to the rule of "settlement the character of a perpetual and unalterable regulation, or what "may be called a fundamental law of the common-wealth, rather than that of "a tax to be levied according to a certain valuation."

92. Dr. Smith further observes: "To draw the attention of the sovereign "towards the improvement of the land, from a regard to the increase of his "own revenue, is one of the principal advantages proposed by this species of "tax." This argument, which when generally put is unquestionably just, derives additional weight from a particular application of it to the state of India, and to the peculiar nature of some of those duties, on the part of the Government, which are consecrated by ancient usage, and in the performance of which, established custom, as well as a sound view of its own interests, forbids it to relax.

93. In a highly improved state of society, and for a people wealthy, prosperous, and far advanced in useful science, to provide the means of defence and protection is almost the sole duty of the Government. The grandest and most expensive undertakings may then with safety be left to individual enterprize or the excitement of public spirit; and the wisest policy of the sovereign is to allow his subjects to pursue their own interests in their own way, and according to their own judgment.

94. A different, and in some respects an opposite duty, belongs to the sovereign of a people, poor, indolent, and ignorant. Besides providing for their external and internal security, by arms, negociation, and salutary laws, it is necessary that his government, for the purpose of producing a happy change in the character and fortunes of the nation, shall occasionally aid individuals with advances of capital, and take upon itself the construction and maintenance of works of great public utility.

95. We find that the sovereigns of India have long been in the practice, not only of advancing money to the cultivators and weavers, with the view of promoting the agriculture and manufacture of the country, but of fencing the country against sudden and destructive inundations, and of supplying the land in the dry season with the means of artificial irrigation. The task of banking the rivers, of constructing and upholding tanks and reservoirs, has thus, by established usage, become a duty of the Government.

96. The advantages which must result to agriculture from such constructions are too obvious to require development; and as long as the revenue of Government consisted in a fixed proportion of the produce of the soil, it was clearly its interest to continue and extend that system of active vigilance and precaution, by which the productive powers of the land could be best protected and secured.

97. Under the permanent settlement, we have fixed to perpetuity our demand upon the land, without renouncing the obligation of continuing our care of what in Bengal is called the poolbundy, and in the southern parts of India, of the tanks and watercourses. The consequence of this arrangement is, either that the whole advantage of these mounds, reservoirs, and canals, is ceded to the Zemindars, while all the trouble and expense of upholding and keeping them in repair is defrayed by the Government; or that Government is exposed to the temptation of relaxing in its zeal, and moderating its disbursements on account of works of great public utility, but in the preservation and extension of which it has no direct nor immediate interest.

98. If, as has been shewn, a duty of this nature be imposed upon the Government of India, by ancient usage as well as by the total inability of the people to perform it with their own scanty means, it will, we think, be difficult to reject the conclusion, that the sovereign has a right to indemnity for the expense incurred in the undertaking; that the certainty of obtaining such indemnity can alone furnish security for the duty being performed as it ought to be; and therefore that a settlement of the land, under which this indemnity would always be within the reach of Government, is preferable to one under which all prospect of compensation is excluded.

99. To a Government taking an interest in the improvement of the country, with a view to the increase of its own revenue, it might be a farther subject of consideration, whether more could not be done than has hitherto been attempted towards bettering the system of Indian agriculture.

100. The rural economy of the Hindoos, we understand, generally speaking, to be wretched in the extreme. The rudeness of their implements, the slovenliness of their practice, and their total ignorance of the most simple principles of science, are said to be equally remarkable.*

101. It has, however, been stated in a late publication,† that the agriculture of some parts of the Mysore constitutes an exception to this remark, while it shews the Hindoo farmer in certain situations to be neither stupid nor indocile.

102. Whether the general system of cultivation be susceptible of improvement, and whether Government can successfully contribute to the accomplishment of so desirable an object, are questions, though of high moment, perhaps not easy of solution. But if an attempt at improvement is at all to be hazarded under the auspices of Government, it surely cannot be made, in any way, with such prospect of success, as when coupled with a plan for rendering it subservient to the increase of the Government revenue, as well as to the prosperity of its subjects.

103. The nature of this attempt, and the mode in which it ought to be directed, it would rest with those to point out, whom residence in the country, and an intimate acquaintance with the characters and manners of the natives, may have qualified for giving advice upon such topics.

104. It is, of all things, desirable to ascertain, whether the rude implements and accustomed processes of the Indian peasant could be advantageously supplanted by those of Europe; and whether the establishment of experimental farms in various parts of the country, under the superintendence of proper persons selected by Government for the purpose, might not be useful, in the way of example, as a corrective of some of the vices and defects of the prevailing system.

105. We are fully sensible that the poverty, prejudices, and indolence of the natives of India, strongly operate against improvement. These are, in fact, the most inveterate enemies to improvement in all countries; but they are no where invincible, when met with prudence, skill, and perseverance. We do not mean that we should vexatiously interfere with the usages of the inhabitants, or that we should attempt forcibly to change their habits: far from it. But, on the other hand, when their habits are bad, let us not plead their attachment to them, as an apology, perhaps, for our own indolence in not endeavouring vouring to correct them. Our efforts may for a long time be unavailing; but if judiciously directed, we do not despair of their eventual success.

106. The observations which we have been led to make upon the settlements of Cuttack and Agra* will inform you of the general views which we entertain, relative to the introduction of a permanent settlement of the territorial revenues of our more recently acquired possessions.

107. From these communications you will infer:—First, That supposing the permanent settlement, as established in Bengal, to be as perfect as any system of revenue administration can be made, both in relation to the provinces where it now obtains, and those provinces where it may be found expedient, at some future period, to extend its operation, all precipitation or haste in the completion of this arrangement are to be avoided, from a regard not only to fiscal advantage but to considerations of general policy.—Secondly, That in case of the farther extension of this system, sound discretion prescribes the adoption of some precaution, to prevent, in other instances, the recurrence of the inconvenience which is now felt, from the depreciation which has taken place in the value of the precious metals since the period of its first introduction into Bengal.—And, thirdly, That it is a question, the discussion of which we would not wish to be considered as foreclosed by any past decision, whether it may not be wise in Government to make provision, in the future settlements of the lands, not only against the loss which it may sustain from a depreciation of the medium in which its revenues are paid, but also for a moderate participation, at distant intervals, with the proprietors in the growing improvement of the country.

108. The subject you will yourselves feel to be of such importance, as to call for the most anxious inquiry and mature deliberation. It is, therefore, unnecessary for us now to say more, than that we expect to be furnished, at no very distant period, with a full and reasoned communication of your sentiments upon the different questions involved in the discussion.

Par. 15. On the proceedings noted in the margin† is recorded our correspondence with the late Commissioner in Cuttack and with the Board of Revenue, respecting the depending settlement of that district. The following is an abstract statement of the jumma, agreeably to the settlement now concluded:

1217 .... Rupees	13,64,700
1219, and provisionally in perpetuity, ...	14,54,502

16. On comparing the ultimate jumma with the jumma of the year 1216, it appears that, under the present settlement, an annual increase of Rupees 1,20,583 will be obtained in the land revenue of the district, supposing the settlement to remain fixed in perpetuity.

17. No particular circumstances have occurred, in the performance of the above-mentioned duty, to require explanation from us. All the reasons which can be assigned in favor of a permanent settlement in the western provinces, apply equally, or perhaps in a stronger degree, to Cuttack, in consequence of the poverty of the people; but, as intimated in our separate letter of the present date, we postpone any general reflections on this important question, until we shall be able to take a more comprehensive view of the effects of the depending settlements throughout the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

Par. 9. We cannot admit the policy of realizing the Government revenues by the means of farmers, who, as in the present instance, have no other interest in the soil than is derived from their contract. Our own opinion is, that the farming system is oppressive to the contributors, and must be ultimately injurious to the resources of the country; and we therefore give a decided preference to a detailed collection of the revenue for the cultivators of the land, by the native cutcherry servants, acting under the immediate authority and superintendence of the European collectors. This mode of administration is, no doubt, troublesome from its details in the early period of its operation; but the labour is considerably diminished, when the rents are once adjusted and the rights of all parties are defined. It also necessarily occasions some increase of expense, and is liable to some abuse, from the power which it lodges in the subordinate officers of Government; and we are aware, that it cannot be made to attain all the advantages of which it is susceptible, until a local survey, which ought ever to form the ground-work of this system of collection, can be completed. Still these objections do not appear to us, upon the whole, to have so much weight as those to which the farming system is liable. Experience has shewn, both in the extensive territories ceded to the Company by the Nizam in the Deccan, and also in the pergunnah of Broach, under the Presidency of Bombay, where the lands, since the period of their acquisition, have been under a ryotwar plan of management, that the difficulties attending that system may be surmounted by the intelligence, zeal, and integrity of the principal Collectors, and that, far from being incompatible with the improvement of the country and a punctual realization of the public revenue, it has been eminently conducive to both.

10. We are the more surprised at your having had recourse to the farming system in Cuttack, because we find, from your late advices, that in the Upper Provinces, where it seems to have been prevalent, you have considered the resumption of the farms to be so desirable in itself as to justify considerable sacrifices on the part of the Government for its attainment. In the 54th paragraph of Mr. Colebrooke's Minute, recorded on your Consultations of the 20th June 1808, he gives it as his opinion, that it would be for the interest of Government to grant the powerful Talookdars their entire estates in jaghire, in lieu of the more extensive farms held by them for an inadequate tribute. We know not whether an adequate tribute may have reconciled Mr. Colebrooke to the introduction or continuance of the system in another quarter; but that appears to us to be only one of the many considerations applicable to this important and delicate question.

11. On the expediency of declaring the present settlement of the revenues of Cuttack permanent at the conclusion of 1219 fusily, we refer you to paragraphs 15 to 40 of our dispatch dated the 1st February 1811, where a full exposition of our sentiments is given.

Par. 40. Having thus stated to your Honourable Court the manner in which the Commission* is now organized, we proceed to the consideration of the highly important arrangements intrusted to its superintendence.

41. In the 37th paragraph of our dispatch, dated 31st July 1807, we had the honour to observe as follows. On a reference to Section 5, Regulation X, 1807, your Honourable Court will observe, that a declaration has been made to the landholders, "that the jumma which may be assessed on their estates "in the last year of the settlement immediately ensuing the present settle- "ment, shall remain fixed for ever, in case the Zemindars shall now be wil- "ling to engage for the payment of the public revenue on those terms in per- "petuity,

"petuity, and the arrangement shall receive the sanction of the Honourable "the Court of Directors."

42. Had the considerations which dictated that important measure been in any respect new, it is probable that the late Governor-General, notwithstanding his extensive and accurate knowledge of the subject, would have hesitated in the adoption of it, or at all events, that he would have recorded more at large his sentiments upon it. The question, however, had received the most mature consideration and the most ample discussion, on the conclusion of the permanent settlement in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares. The arguments for and against the measure had been again fully canvassed, on the introduction of the permanent settlement into the territories dependent on the Presidency of Fort St. George. All the objections which had been advanced by the opponents to a permanent settlement, had been fully and ably answered on both those occasions. The measure had, in both instances, received the sanction of your Honourable Court. It was difficult to conceive an argument against the arrangement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, which had not been already urged against it in Bengal and at Fort St. George, and as already noticed, which had not been fully answered. But, above all, experience had justified all those conclusions; and the solid advantages which had arisen from the operation of the settlement in the provinces of Bengal, &c. did not appear to leave a doubt of its beneficial effects in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. It is further to be observed, that the establishment of a permanent settlement, at present, in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, is only the anticipation, by a very few years, of a measure which Government was at all events pledged, by Regulations formerly promulgated and long since submitted to your Honourable Court, to adopt, for the ease and welfare of the inhabitants of those provinces.

43. But notwithstanding all these considerations, the late Commissioners appear to have been early impressed with doubts of the expediency of the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement in the territories subject to their control; and after the occasional intimation of those doubts in different parts of their correspondence, they submitted their sentiments at large on the subject, in a report recorded on the 20th of June last.*

44. Allowing to Mr. Cox and Mr. Tucker all possible credit, for the motives by which they were influenced in the discussion of the subject, and for the ability with which they have treated it, their report has not occasioned any alteration in the sentiments which we before entertained, with respect to the immediate establishment of a permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, with the exception of a few particular places, in which, from local and peculiar circumstances, or from subsisting engagements with farmers, an over-ruling necessity will compel us to suspend the adoption of that measure.

45. We shall not attempt, in this place, to take any review of the reasons assigned by the late Commissioners in support of their opinion: the Report itself, from the importance of the question, will no doubt attract the particular attention of your Honourable Court. In like manner, we deem it equally unnecessary to state, in this dispatch, the arguments which may be opposed to the reasonings and conclusions of the Commissioners, as your Honourable Court will find them fully detailed in the Minutes recorded by Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Colebrooke, respectively, on that important subject.*

46. On this point, the Governor-General begs leave to add, that on a mature consideration of all the documents connected with the establishment of a permanent settlement in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares, and in the territories dependent on the Presidency of Fort St. George, and of all the reports and minutes respecting the proposed permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, he was entirely satisfied of the sound policy, or rather of the urgent necessity of that measure; and his Lordship has only been prevented from recording these sentiments in detail on the proceedings, with the other papers on the subject, by the severe pressure of other public business. The ample discussion which the subject has undergone, may possibly appear to his Lordship, on a review of the papers, to render any further observations vations on the subject from him unnecessary; but should circumstances appear to require it, the grounds on which he entertains the sentiments above stated will be recorded in the usual form of a minute, and hereafter submitted to your Honourable Court.

47. With the ample materials thus afforded to assist the judgment of your Honourable Court, and with the express reservation originally introduced into the Regulation, that the arrangement in question must be considered subject to your confirmation, we only deem it necessary to observe, that we have directed the present Commissioners to proceed, in the conclusion of the present settlement, on the prescribed principles;* having at the same time furnished them with such instructions as have appeared to be necessary, on other questions which had been brought under consideration with the discussion of the settlement.

48. Next to the permanency of the settlement, the most important question agitated in the documents above noticed is, the constitution of the office of Tehsildar in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. This office appears to us to have been constituted in those provinces and in the province of Benares, whence the plan was taken, entirely on erroneous principles. If the complete separation of the judicial and revenue officers was essential to a pure administration among the servants of the Company, who had every encouragement to the faithful discharge of their duty which the prospect of honours and rewards could afford, and if this principle be fully recognized and adopted in every well governed state, the separation of the officers of police and revenue was still more essential among a class of people, in whose minds the moral principle is confessedly weak. The mischiefs which have arisen from the abuses committed by the Tehsildars have been proportioned, both in the province of Benares and in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, to the deviation from the principles of true policy apparent in the constitution of the office.

49. Without enumerating the particular instances in which we have been compelled to dismiss the Tehsildars from their offices, on account of misconduct, the reports which we had the honour to submit to you, with our dispatches from the Judicial Department of the 31st of July, together with those transmitted by the present opportunity, will fully satisfy your Honourable Court of the means which the Tehsildars in Benares possessed of perverting the influence of their office to the worst of purposes. In like manner, the Reports from the Board of Commissioners, recorded with the other documents above noticed on our proceedings of the 20th of June last, will shew, that the greatest abuses have also been committed by the same description of officers in the districts of Allahabad and Goruckpore.

50. It was not, however, exclusively on these grounds, urgent and imperious as they were, that it was determined to effect an entire reform in the office of Tehsildar in the Upper Provinces, as noticed to your Honourable Court in our former dispatches. Considerations of public economy had likewise their weight in the adoption of that resolution. At present, the Tehsildars receive eleven and a half per cent. upon the amount realized by them, as a reward for their services, as officers of police and as subordinate collectors of the revenue, and nearly the whole of the revenue, amounting in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces to Rupees 2,46,71,928, and in the province of Benares to Rupees 38,88,372, is collected through that channel.

51. The late Commissioners appear to entertain doubts, whether the abuses charged against the Tehsildars have been carried to the extent supposed; and still more, whether the benefits expected, in point of public economy, will be realized. That individuals among them may be clear from all sort of malversation, we are willing to hope; but, in a case of this nature, it must be sufficient to shew, that the office is capable of being rendered an instrument of oppression, and that it has, in fact, been in many cases applied to that purpose, to render a reform of it not only expedient but indispensably necessary.

52. With respect to the saving of expense expected by these means, it is indeed highly probable, that among a class of people accustomed, under the Native Governments, to every species of misrule, balances will accrue, and that other temporary and partial difficulties may arise in carrying the proposed reform into into effect. Judging, however, from the operation of the plan in those places in which it has hitherto been carried into execution, in consequence of the removal, death, or resignation of some of the Tehsildars, we see no reason to doubt, that the expected saving will ultimately, if not immediately, be effected, as may be seen more particularly from the statement prepared by the Secretary, and recorded on the proceedings of the 20th June.

53. We should, however, deem the reform of this branch of the internal administration of the Upper Provinces very incomplete, if it terminated with the arrangements proposed to be immediately adopted; that is, the separation of the native officers of police and revenue, and the appointment of the latter on reduced allowances. Instead of terminating in that manner, we trust that the plan now adopted will gradually lead to the abolition of the office of Tehsildar in Benares and in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; and that the landholders, satisfied that their own interests are in unison with those of the Government, will be ready to pay their revenue directly into the treasury of Government, without the intervention of any native officer, as is now done (with very few exceptions) by the landholders, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa.

54. With respect to the other points discussed in the documents above noticed, we deem it unnecessary to enter into any particular examination of them in this dispatch. Many of them, indeed, are of high importance; such as the separation of the village Zemindars from the authority of the superior landholders, on the principle on which the Talookdars of a certain description were separated from the authority of the superior Zemindars, when the permanent settlement took place in the province of Bengal, &c, and the respective rights of Zemindars and farmers to a renewal of the settlement under the existing Regulations. But the fullest information on those points will be found in the documents to which we have above had the honor to refer your Honourable Court.

(Par. 40 to 55.) Permanent settlement of the territorial revenue, placed under the superintendence of the Commissioners, strongly recommended.—Expediency of reforming the tehsildarry establishments.

Par. 8. It is only necessary, at this time, to direct your attention to the different dispatches referred to in the margin,* in which we have conveyed to you our sentiments upon the important subjects brought before us in these paragraphs. You observe, in paragraph 46, that the Governor-General is entirely satisfied of the sound policy, or rather of the urgent necessity, of introducing the permanent settlement into the Upper Provinces, and that he will record his sentiments upon the question, should circumstances appear to require it. Upon a measure of so great moment, we shall be happy to receive a communication of Lord Minto's sentiments in detail, and to bestow upon them that deliberate attention to which his opinions are so well entitled: but we must again repeat our positive instructions, that the permanent settlement shall not be further extended, without our express concurrence and directions.

Letter to, 27th February 1810. (Par. 45 to 47.) On the subject declaring the settlement of the eded and Conquered Provinces permanent.

Par. 28. We deem it unnecessary, on the present occasion, to enter into any detailed discussion regarding the permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces: first, because the principal reasons which can be assigned, à priori, for that measure, have been already submitted to you; and secondly, secondly, because the reports and information which we are now receiving from time to time from the Board of Commissioners, respecting the progress made in the performance of that duty, will probably, when complete, establish the expediency and sound policy of the measure, beyond a question, to the entire satisfaction of your Honourable Court.

* Revenue Dispatch (department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces), 27th February 1810, par. 43 to 47; Revenue Dispatch, 1st February 1811, par. 15 to 42; Revenue Dispatch, 27th November 1811; Revenue Dispatch (department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces) 15th January 1812, par. 59 to 108.

29. We shall advert, in a subsequent part of this dispatch, to the reports received from the districts in which the settlement has been already provisionally concluded. It is only, however, by considering the whole question together (that is, by weighing, on the one hand, the considerable increase which will, in the aggregate, be obtained under that settlement, and the encouragement thus afforded to the agriculture and to the general improvement of the country; and, on the other, the embarrassments which would arise from the revival of any further inquiry respecting the resources of the lands, and the temptation which such inquiries uniformly hold forth to abuse and corruption), that a mature and sound judgment can be formed on the question. We trust that it will be in our power to furnish the general report here noticed, in a few months from the present period.

61. In the 90th to the 105th paragraphs of our dispatch of the 30th December last, we had the honour to notice briefly the settlements which had been concluded of the district of Agra, and of the lands which had heretofore been held in farm by certain persons possessing considerable power and influence in the district of Allighur, and of the lands still held by those persons under a mocurrary tenure.

62. We now beg leave to draw your attention to the reports furnished by the Board of Commissioners upon the settlements concluded in the district of Etawah, and of the remaining part of the district of Allighur.

63. We shall confine ourselves, on the present occasion, in both those cases, to an abstract statement of the jumma, reserving any general remarks or propositions, to which the execution of this important duty may give rise in our minds, until we shall be enabled to take a more comprehensive view of the effects of the settlement, with respect to the resources of Government and the condition and happiness of the people.

64. Comparing the foregoing abstract with the jumma of the year 1215, it will appear that, in the district of Etawah, the assessment of the year 1219 (provisionally fixed in perpetuity) exceeds that of the year 1215 by Rupees 3,51,392; and that, in the remaining portion of Allighur, the assessment of the year 1218 (provisionally fixed also in perpetuity) exceeds that of the year 1215 by Rupees 4,00,906.

65. It will likewise afford to your Honourable Court satisfaction to observe, that in the former district the expense of the tehsildarry establishments has been reduced to less than two per cent. upon the jumma, and in the latter district to Rupees 3. 3. 3 per cent. on the jumma.

66. The allowance granted to the Tehsildars, under the old and objectionable system, was eleven and a half per cent. on the jumma. Of that allowance, one half per cent. was ordinarily considered applicable to purposes of police, and the remaining ten per cent. was regarded as the charge of collection. The saving, however, effected by the present arrangements (large as it will ultimately appear in the aggregate to be) is not, in our contemplation, a source of greater satisfaction than the benefits which those arrangements are calculated to produce to the great body of the people, by relieving them from the overgrown power and influence of the Tehsildars.

Par. 20. In our dispatches of the annexed dates,* we had the honour to submit to you the settlements which had been concluded of the districts of Agra, Allighur, and Etawah. We at the same time stated the great reduction effected in the expense of the tehsildarry establishments in those districts, respectively.

21. On the proceedings noted in the margin† is recorded our correspondence with the Board of Commissioners, respecting the settlement and tehsildarry arrangements in the districts of Seharunpore, Cawnpore, and Gorruckpore.

22. Adhering to the form observed by us in submitting to you the settlements of the district of Agra and Allighur, we have the honour to lay before you the following abstracts of the settlements of the above-mentioned districts.

SEHARUNPORE.‡

...... 1217		17,62,535
...... 1218, and provisionally in perpetuity,		18,93,743

23. The assessment of this district in the year 1215 was Rupees 14,19,314.

24. The expense of the revised tehsildarry establishments maintained in Seharunpore amounts to Rupees 5,193. 8 per month, being at the rate of three and one-third per cent. on the jumma of the district.

...... 1218		27,26,686
...... 1219, and provisionally in perpetuity,		27,30,428

25. The jumma of the year 1215 was Rupees 26,99,324.

26. The expense of the revised tehsildarry establishments in this district is Rupees 6,047 per month, or two and two-thirds per cent. on the jumma.

...... 1217		16,71,405
...... 1218		16,84,909
...... 1219, and provisionally in perpetuity,		17,16,650

27. The jumma of the year 1215 was Rupees 15,85,885.

28. The expense of the revised tehsildarry establishments in this district amounts to Rupees 4,157. 8. being equal to two and a half per cent. on the jumma.

29. From the foregoing review it will appear, that a large increase has been obtained in the district of Seharunpore, and that the jumma of the two other districts (Cawnpore and Gorruckpore) has been enhanced, although in a much smaller degree.

30. The saving effected in the expense of the tehsildarry establishments is in each case very considerable, and will no doubt appear highly satisfactory to your Honourable Court, connected as it is with the relief of the people from oppression, as stated in the 66th paragraph of our dispatch from this department of the 31st August last, and on former occasions.

31. In these, as in all the other cases, your Honourable Court will have to determine upon the permanency of the settlement. We have already submitted to you all the information which appeared calculated to assist your judgment, in deciding generally on that important question: but in the districts of Seharunpore and Gorruckpore some local circumstances exist, to which it is incumbent upon us to draw the particular attention of your Honourable Court.

32. In both of those districts, but more especially in Gorruckpore, considerable tracts of waste lands exist, which, if excluded from the operation of the provisional permanent settlement, might, at a future, but most probably at a distant period, become a productive source of revenue to Government.

33. The limited extent to which we have considered ourselves competent to restrict the operation of that settlement, under the declaration made to the landholders in the fifth section of Regulation X, 1807, is stated in our orders to the Board of Commissioners of the 30th October and 29th November last. We in both instances, however, as indeed we had done on all other occasions, desired that it might be explained carefully to the Zemindars, that the question of the permanency of the settlement had been reserved specifically for the decision of your Honourable Court.

34. Entertaining the same sentiments which we have uniformly professed, respecting the substantial benefits which, in ordinary cases, must infallibly arise from the permanency of the assessment, and the fallacy of the arguments which have been adduced to show that, under a different system, the public revenue might be considerably and speedily augmented, we still think that the principle which we maintain may admit of exceptions in two instances: first, in cases in which improvements may be effected in the country, not by the exertions of individuals, but by the care and at the expense of Government itself; and secondly, in cases in which the land in an actual state of cultivation bears an inconsiderable proportion to that in an uncultivated state.

35. A case of the former description exists, or to speak with greater precision, may exist, in the district of Seharunpore, it having been long in contemplation to open a canal in that part of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, by which it is expected that considerable tracts of country, now nearly waste, may be cultivated and rendered productive There are evidently no reasons, founded either in policy or in justice, which should preclude the Government from deriving its due proportion of the increased produce of the country effected by these means.

36. Cases of the latter description (that is, of estates in which the land in an actual state of cultivation bears an inconsiderable proportion to that in an uncultivated state) may naturally be expected to exist in every district of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; but in none, as already intimated, to so great an extent as in the district of Gorruckpore.

37. In communicating our sentiments on this point to the Board of Commissioners, we observed as follows:—" The question, as far as depended on " the local government of this country, has been decided, with the exception " of those cases which may fairly and reasonably be supposed not to have fallen " within the contemplation of Government, when the Regulation cited in the " margin* was enacted. The villages which are entirely or nearly waste, and " which are more particularly noticed at the close of the eighth paragraph of " your letter, appear to his Lordship in Council to come within this description. He is, in consequence, of opinion, that they should be excluded from " the settlement accounts of the mehals which have been provisionally fixed " in perpetuity, and that they should be considered liable to be reinserted in " their accounts, subject to a proper assessment, whenever the improved state " of cultivation in those lands may render the settlement of them on the footing of the rest of the district expedient and proper." Again: " The Governor-General in Council does not perceive any sufficient reasons for " departing from the principle above stated, with respect to the district of " Gorruckpore; it consequently remains for you to apply that principle, according to the best information which you may possess, respecting the proportion which the cultivated bears to the uncultivated lands in the different " villages. With respect to such as are entirely waste, no difficulty can arise " on the subject."

38. The

* Section 5, Regulation X, 1807.—" The Governor-General in Council, however, hereby notifies to the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, " that the jumma which may be assessed on their estates, in the last year of the settlement immediately ensuing the present settlement, shall remain fixed for ever, in case the Zemindars shall " now be willing to engage for the payment of the public revenue on those terms in perpetuity, " and the arrangement shall receive the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors."

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 12 February 1811.

38. The foregoing are the only instances in which, with the sentiments which we entertain regarding the operation of permanent settlements, we can recommend any deviation from that principle, founded, as we are satisfied it is, in the stability of the public revenue and the punctual collection of it on the one side, and in the general improvement of the country and the amelioration of the condition of the people on the other. We may go still further, and observe that its influence is felt in branches of the administration, in which, at first sight, it may not appear to have any immediate connection; and we have little doubt of its tendency to divert numbers, in the different classes of society, from lawless pursuits, to the acquisition of the more safe and certain fruits of peaceful industry.

Par. 14. With the observations in paragraphs 28 and 29,* upon the introduction of the permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, we cannot coincide. The grounds on which our opinion upon this important question is founded, have been fully stated to you in our late dispatches; and the information which we have since received, respecting the state of the land revenue administration in those provinces, and to which we shall have occasion to advert in the course of this letter, has very materially served to confirm us in the sentiments we have conveyed to you on that subject.

Letter from, dated 31st August, 1810.

(Par. 61 to 66.) Settlements of Etawah and part of Allighur. Retrenchment, in the former district, of the tehsildarry establishment.

21. The terms, as noted in the margin,† on which a settlement has been concluded in the district of Etawah for four years, and in the remaining part of Allighur (not included in the arrangement communicated in your Revenue dispatch, dated 30th December 1809) for three years, are as favourable as we could expect. In Etawah, the assessment fixed for fusily 1219, the last year of the present settlement, exceeds the settlement of 1215, the concluding year of the preceding settlement, in the sum of Rupees 3,51,392; and in the remaining portion of Allighur, the increase in the last year of the present settlement upon the assessment in the corresponding year of the late settlement amounts to Rupees 4,00,906.

22. An arrangement holding forth the prospect of so large an accession of revenue within so short a period, will be matter of great satisfaction, provided that the collections in these provinces shall keep pace with the assessments.

23. We shall be happy to receive the review which you have promised in paragraph 63 to transmit, of the effects of the general settlement of these provinces upon the resources of Government, and upon the condition and happiness of the people.

24. A careful perusal of the reports of the Commissioners, dated the 22d June and 6th July 1810, has suggested to us the following remarks.

25. With the sentiments which you entertain of the expediency of declaring the assessment in the last years of the triennial and quadrennial settlements fixed in perpetuity, it was certainly an object to raise the demands of Government as high as it could be supposed the productive powers of the soil and the ability of the contributors were capable of realizing them. With this view and for this purpose, we presume, a russudee, or progressive jumma, was resorted to. We have considerable doubts, however, whether the revenue, in the short period of three and four years, will attain the expected level; and differing with you, as we do most decidedly, upon the question of fixing in perpetuity, at so early a period, the land revenue of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, we are inclined inclined to think that an equal moderate jumma, for the whole term of the lease, would have been preferable to an assessment rising progressively in each successive year. Under the latter arrangement, the profits of the landholders will be, in great measure if not wholly, absorbed by the rapidly increasing demands of Government; whereas, under the former, they would have operated as a spur to industry, and performed the functions of a reproductive capital.

26. We observe that the revenue of a considerable proportion of the lands, both in Etawah and Allighur, has been let in farm; a system which, wherever it has obtained, experience has shewn to be productive of fatal effects. It was this system which ruined the Carnatic under the late Nabobs; and we fear that all the modifications which may be applied to it under a British administration, will fail in preventing its pernicious effects. In the Carnatic, the farmers advanced money to the prince, and got assignments of land, as security for the interest of the loan and repayment of the principal. In the Upper Provinces, the Commissioners, acting under your authority, grant assignments of territory to farmers, having no other interest in the soil than what arises out of their contracts, on condition of their paying to your Collectors a certain annual revenue. When the contract is favourable to the speculator, he may be expected to make good his stipulated payments; but it is doubtful whether any regulations can be devised, sufficient to protect the cultivators from undue exactions, which the farmer generally practises, under pretence of fulfilling his obligations towards Government. When the contractor has either made an improvident bargain, or when, from accidental causes, he is unable to fulfil his engagement, he frequently absconds in arrear to Government;* and should his escape be prevented by the vigilance of the local authorities, the seizure and confinement of his person is generally unavailingt o the public as a measure of redress, whilst, as a punishment of the individual, it confounds the distinction between misfortune and fraud. Wherever the farmer fulfils his obligations, the risk which he runs and the trouble he takes, must be compensated by a suitable profit, considerably exceeding the expenses of collection. Where the risk more than counterbalances the profit of the speculation, the revenue of Government suffers from the insolvency of the farmer; and, in both cases, it is to be apprehended that the permanent resources of the country are impaired under his management.

27. In all cases where there are resident proprietors and tenants (we adopt, for the sake of simplicity, the European phraseology, though it may not be strictly applicable to the state of landed property in India), and where proprietors obstinately refuse to come under engagements to Government, it appears to us that it would be preferable, on all general principles, to make temporary settlements with the resident cultivators, or where that cannot be effected, with the heads of villages, for the revenue derivable from the lands of each village, instead of admitting the intervention of farmers of the revenue.

28. In lands where there are no resident Ryots, and where the ground is cultivated by Pykhoosts, or by hired labourers from the adjacent hills, it would be difficult perhaps for the Collectors to form an arrangement with persons of the latter description. It is desirable, however, in many points of view, that some inducement should be offered to these people to settle in the plains, and to relinquish their often lawless and predatory habits. By encouraging them to become fixed tenants of the soil, experience would soon teach them the advantages of such a change of situation, and the agriculture of the country could not fail to benefit from the exertions of resident industry, while the general tranquillity and good order of society would derive additional security from the same cause.

29. That the details connected with a settlement concluded with the cultivators would be more laborious to the Collectors, both Native and European, than the simple operation of assigning the collections to farmers, we are perfectly aware: but the objection, in order to be tenable, ought to prove, that the proposed arrangement is not only difficult but impracticable, which it is far from being, as we shall have occasion to show in the course of this dispatch; for where the object is important, corresponding exertions should be made for its attainment.

30. The

30. The most solid basis of public prosperity is private property in land; and nothing is further from our intention than to recommend any arrangement which would, in the least, interfere with the rights of resident proprietors, or which would obstruct the restitution of estates to their legitimate owners, even though they may have been for a time abandoned. Without, however, departing from this principle, cases are likely to occur in which the suggestions contained in the foregoing paragraphs may be found both applicable and useful.

31. The multitude of conflicting claims to deserted zemindarries which have been left for adjudication to the Adawluts, is itself a very serious evil; nor is the number of questions of this sort which have been referred to these courts, as having arisen from the original misconception of individual rights, or the want of sufficient inquiry at the time of forming the settlements, an inconvenience of less magnitude. Could any scheme of compromise, embracing an amicable partition of these estates among the claimants, be carried into effect, we consider it as very desirable, and likely to prove not less conducive, upon the whole, to the ends of substantial justice, than to the suppression of a spirit of litigation, and to the prevention of the various bad effects which result from that spirit to society.

32. We should have felt much hesitation in offering these remarks upon a subject, on which, of all others, extensive and accurate local information is requisite to guide the judgment, if experience had not furnished us with strong practical testimony in favour of a system, framed at least in perfect consistency with those considerations of expediency, to which we have thought proper to direct your attention. We allude to the principles of revenue administration that were acted upon by Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Munro in the territories ceded to the Company by his Highness the Nizam, and which, having been founded upon the ancient though long-neglected usage of India, were successfully continued and extended, by the other Collectors under the Government of Fort St. George, in that large portion of country obtained in the year 1792, and since that period. As explanatory of this system, we transmit, numbers in the packet, the instructions* issued by Lieutenant-Colonel Munro in the Ceded Districts, for their guidance in the first introduction of the system in question. In those instructions are pointed out the different modes in which it may be effected, and the advantages and disadvantages of each: the cases in which demands on the part of the cultivators for remissions usually originate, and the circumstances which ought to regulate a Collector's judgment in granting or refusing them, are also explained in them. We further transmit to you two reports to the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George,† from the same able and experienced revenue officer; in one of which he particularly explains the whole process of conducting the ryotwar settlement in the Ceded Districts, commencing with the annual settlement of the rents with each cultivator, and terminating with the collection of the revenue from them. In the other report, he furnishes an exposition of his sentiments respecting the comparative benefits and inconveniences of ryotwar and zemindarry settlements. We have likewise, in addition to these very useful documents, forwarded to you, in the same packet, a copy of the instructions of Mr. Ravenshaw, the Collector of the southern division of Arcot, to his Sub-collectors, on the advantages of the system which we have recommended to your adoption, and the leading principles and rules to be observed in carrying it into effect.‡ The following statement will show that this system has been acted upon with success in the Ceded Districts.

Fusily 1210 (A. D. 1800-1) the first year of the cession	10,06,543	10,78,096
In this year, the collections were made in part by the Nizam's and in part by the Company's officers: the latter concluded a settlement with the heads of villages.
Fusily 1211, the year in which a kulwar settlement was introduced by Colonel Munro	12,48,493	13,81,995
Fusily 1212	12,79,723	14,12,899
...... 1213	13,08,169	14,49,535
...... 1214	15,13,605	16,46,750
Exclusive, in this and three following years, of kurnoul, amounting to about 30,000 pagodas per annum.
Fusily 1215	16,41,986	17,58,435
...... 1216, a year of excessive drought,	13,91,110	15,01,537
...... 1217, a year of partial drought, and that in which Colonel Munro resigned his charge	15,17,272	16,06,421
...... 1218, including peishcush	16,69,908	18,02,570
...... 1219, an unfavourable season succeeding a year in which there had probably been an over assessment	15,48,537	17,04,147

Part of the decrease in Fusily 1219 may also be ascribed to the introduction of a system of village settlements on triennial lease, from which the natives seem to be averse, not from any dislike to a village settlement, but from a reluctance to engage, during any given term of years, for a stipulated revenue, at so high an amount as to render it unsafe for them to incur the risks of such a contract, with reference to the uncertainty of seasons, and other contingencies of an untoward kind, as affecting the produce of the soil.

33. Notwithstanding that Fusily 1219 was an unfavourable season, the balance on account of that year outstanding on the 31st December 1810 (five months and twenty days subsequent to the close of the Fusily) amounted only to Star Pagodas 19,929. In commonly favourable years, the arrears are a mere trifle; and the remissions, on an average, previous to the introduction of village settlements, did not exceed one fanam twenty-two cash per hundred star pagodas. The collections were made without the aid of a military force, and the inhabitants appear satisfied with their condition. The whole revenue charges in the Ceded Districts in the Deccan, ordinary and extraordinary, comprising under the latter description, repairs of tanks, revenue buildings, tent allowances, and survey expenses, do not amount to seven and a half per cent. upon the collections.

34. The quantity of land in cultivation, from which the revenue above stated is collected, amounts, according to Colonel Munro's survey report, to 3,253,859 acres, the uncultivated land belonging to the Sircar being 6,000,000 of acres, and the enam lands amounting to 2,599,747 acres. The assessment is calculated upon the supposed produce of the lands in cultivation, founded on the survey and on an average of the produce in former years, with such other information as could be collected from village and other accounts, from the natives themselves, and from the observation and particular inquiry of the Collector and his assistants, aided by the native revenue officers employed in their service. The inequalities and errors to which a scale of rents applied to the cultivation of each individual Ryot was, from the very nature of the work, unavoidably liable, were subsequently rectified and adjusted as they were discovered, or as they where brought to light on those occasions which annually occurred, of concluding the engagements with the Ryots. The rents for the lands the Ryots undertook to cultivate varied from two-fifths to three-fifths of the money-value of the supposed produce. This rate of assessment was too high to be adopted as a fixed unvarying standard, having been intended rather to ascertain the resources and capabilities of the country, than as a permanent settlement of the rents to be paid for the land in occupation. Hence it was that Colonel Munro, in his report of the 15th August 1807, already alluded to, proposed that a general reduction should be made in the assessment, in the event of its being declared permanent, should such a measure be deemed advisable. Hence it was also, that the survey rents in the Ceded Districts, and indeed in most of the other Collectorships in the Peninsula, where the ryotwaree system had been carried into effect, constituted the maximum of annual rent to which the cultivator was liable, and not the positive demand, which was not determined upon until the season was sufficiently advanced to enable the Collector, and those employed under him in the business of the revenues, to judge of the ability of the Ryots from the state of the crops. If nothing had occurred to impede the cultivation, the survey rent was declared to be the demand for which the Ryots were to be answerable, and engagements were entered into accordingly. If, on the other hand, from any causes of an untoward nature, such a diminished produce was to be expected, which, with reference to the existing substance of the Ryots, would render them unable to satisfy it, a proportionate abatement was allowed from that demand.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 January 1813.

35. A system of annual rents, regulated and fixed on this principle, naturally accommodated itself to the means of the cultivators. They not only knew the utmost limit of assessment to which they were subject, but they knew also that if that rate of demand should, from the effects of season, prove excessive, it would be lowered according to their ability to meet it, while, on the other hand, the advantages of all superabundant produce in a particularly prosperous year were all their own, without any participation on the part of Government; thus furnishing the Ryots with the means of augmenting their agricultural stock, and thereby enabling them to extend their engagements for cultivation, and at the same time affording to the state an increased revenue, arising not from an increased rate of assessment, but from the growing improvement of the internal condition of the country; for it has been found, that in proportion as the stock and substance of the Ryots enabled them to extend their speculations beyond the limits of their own lands, they applied for allotments of unappropriated land, which being always granted at a very low rate of assessment, furnished additional resources for the further extension of agricultural industry.

36. We are particularly desirous of impressing upon your minds, the importance of making yourselves thoroughly acquainted with the nature and principles of a ryotwar settlement, and with the right and proper course to be pursued in the first introduction of it into a district, before you proceed to the adoption of measures for that purpose, persuaded as we are, that the success of your endeavours, and the extent of the advantages to be derived from the gradual extension of the system, as far as local considerations will admit, to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, will greatly depend on the manner in which you set about this important, and to your revenue servants on the establishment, perfectly new undertaking.

37. We are equally convinced, that the best concerted arrangements will fall far short of the necessary objects in view, unless followed up, and invigorated in their operation, by an unabated zeal and activity on the part of the Collectors, in superintending with a watchful and pervading eye, and controlling with a firm and energetic hand, the conduct of the native servants employed under their authority, from those on the Huzzoor establishment, down to the Mocuddims and Putwarries of the villages, in clearly and specifically pointing out to each description of public functionary, engaged either in the business of assessment or collection, or in the keeping up of the village and other accounts, which the Putwarries and Canongoes are bound, by their offices, to enter into their registers.

38. In perusing the report of the Commissioners, dated the 22d June 1810, we have not overlooked their testimony to the merits of Mr. Batson as a revenue officer, nor the disapprobation there expressed of some part of the conduct of Mr. J. W. Laing, his successor. Mr. Laing, however, we observe, still remains Collector

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 January 1813.

Collector of Etawah, and Mr. Batson has been transferred to the judicial department, a department in which the information and knowledge he had acquired in the situation he before held can be but of little avail, while they are lost to that branch of the service from which he has been removed, and in which they might have continued to be very beneficially exerted.

39. The success of any system of revenue collection, however unexceptionable in itself, must, in a great measure, depend upon the zeal, ability, and integrity of those who superintend its execution. In that portion of our territories which are under temporary settlements, it is particularly important, as we have already observed in our Revenue Dispatch of the 15th January 1812, that great care shall be taken in the selection of those gentlemen who are nominated to the office of Collector, and that when fit persons are appointed, as few changes as possible should take place in this branch of the service. To this we must add, especially with reference to our recently acquired territories, that whenever incompetency shall appear in our revenue servants, they should be immediately removed from their respective situations.

40. The arrangement recommended by Lord Minto, and communicated to us in paragraphs 79 to 85 of your Judicial Letter, dated the 7th April 1809, for the purpose of keeping the judicial and revenue departments completely distinct, has our unqualified approbation; and we trust that, in its operation, it will promote an improved collection of the revenue, as well as a more enlightened and impartial administration of justice.

41. It may still be a fit question for consideration, whether the emoluments in the two lines of service ought not to be more nearly equalized than they are at present. You are hereby apprized, however, of our determination not to sanction any addition to the general public charge. Should it be thought expedient to increase the allowances of Collectors in the unsettled districts, as an incitement to men of talents or as a reward for zealous and distinguished exertion, this may be accomplished without any augmentation of expenditure, by proportionate reductions in the judicial department, or even by retrenchments, (as far as circumstances will admit of it without inconvenience to the public service) from the revenue establishment in the permanently settled provinces, where the duties of collection are simple and easy, compared with those which arise out of periodical settlements.

42. On the subject of the tehsildarry establishments, we have received comprehensive and satisfactory information in your subsequent dispatch, dated the 28th June 1811. It appears from the report of the Commissioners accompanying that letter, that the charges on account of the tehsildarry establishment in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, which in fusily 1215 amounted to Rupees 20,85,587, have been reduced, under the present settlement, to Rupees 7,61,916, or to about three per cent. on the jumma, by which an annual saving of Rupees 13,23,671 will be effected in the collection of the revenue.

43. The jumma of these provinces, in 1810-11, is stated in the Commissioner's report at Rupees 2,51,96,343; the balances outstanding at the close of the fusily at Rupees 5,22,327; and the total charge on the revenue, including the expense of collection and the arrears, at little more than five per cent., which it was expected would be further reduced one per cent. by the payment of arrears then in a train of liquidation.

44. We have pleasure in recording our approbation of the arrangement under which this reduction has been effected, which we consider as equally reputable to your Government, and to the Commissioners whose duty it has been to carry it into execution.

Letter from, dated 12th February 1811.

(Par. 20 to 38.) Settlements of Seharunpore, Cawnpore, and Goruckpore. Tehsildarry arrangements in these districts, and a permanent settlement of them recommended.

72. We approve and confirm the settlement which has been concluded of the lands of Seharunpore on the following terms:

...... 1217.................................. 17,62,535
...... 1218, and provisionally in perpetuity, 18,93,743

additional increase in the first year, of Rupees 2,53,288; in the last year of the present settlement a total increase upon the jumma of the last year of the preceding settlement, of Rupees 4,74,429; and an average increase in the three years of the present settlement, of Rupees 6,48,848 upon the average revenue of five years prior to the cession.*

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 January 1813.

73. The following abstract of the settlement of the district of Cawnpore for four years, communicated in the Commissioners' letter, dated the 28th September 1810, is much less favourable than that of Seharunpore:

...... 1217	27,22,231
...... 1218	27,26,686
...... 1219, and provisionally in perpetuity, ...	27,30,428

74. The average amount of the jumma† in the four years of the present settlement exceeds the average amount of the collections ‡ in the five years previous to the cession, by the sum of Rupees 1,61,521; and the jumma of 1216 exceeds that of the year immediately preceding, § by the sum of Rupees 17,801; but the average jumma of the four years falls short of the jumma under the first triennial settlement, || comprising the years 1210, 1211, and 1212, in the sum of Rupees 2,06,993, and it likewise falls short of the jumma under the second triennial settlement, ¶ comprising the years 1213, 1214, and 1215, in the sum of Rupees 96,451.

75. The causes which have led to the depression of the public revenue in this district, are explained in the first seven paragraphs of the Commissioners' report already referred to; and the regret we feel, on account of the unfavourable influence produced by an injudicious local administration upon the fiscal resources of this portion of our territory, is greatly aggravated by the consideration of the concomitant and unmerited sufferings of the community.

76. It appears that the settlement of Cawnpore, immediately subsequent to the cession, was formed upon mistaken principles; that ill-judged efforts were made to raise the jumma, in the first instance, beyond its natural level; and that, though considerable reductions were made in concluding the second triennial settlement, they were insufficient either to remedy or to arrest the progress of the mischief resulting from the original error. The consequence has been a permutation of property to a large amount, involving compulsory sales. No fewer than two hundred and eighty-nine estates are said to have been sold, evincing, in the opinion of the Commissioners, "that the original proprietors have "suffered the penalty of an engagement to which the lands were inadequate, "and from which, on a seasonable interposition in their favour, the justice of "Government would doubtless have relieved them."†† It also appears, that the Tehsildars have been, in different instances, indirectly the purchasers of confiscated estates; and there is too much reason to fear that this was the case in many others, and that lands had been sold to realize the arrears of defaulting farmers, when no balance was due from the contributors.

77. The existence of these evils is to be deeply lamented, on account not only of the great individual distress and the temporary derangement in the whole frame of society which they must have occasioned, but also of their impoverishing effects upon the future substantial resources of the country, and their tendency to alienate from our Government the affections of all within the sphere of their operation. We have, however, derived some consolation from the laudable efforts of the Commissioners to grant relief where relief was yet in time, and so to equalize and moderate the existing assessment, as to stop the further progress of a calamity which it was certainly not in their power to prevent, nor perhaps within their competency sooner to restrain. But even now, it is impossible for us not to feel considerable anxiety, lest in their endeavours to uphold the public revenue, sufficient attention may not have been paid, in fixing the actual rate of assessment, to the exhausted state of the district and the diminished means of the landholders.

78. We cannot apply to the present subject any observations more appropriate than those which were made, on the occasion of an over-assessment of the district of Midnapore, under the administration of the late venerated Lord Cornwallis, and which we have annexed in the magin.* Although, for reasons which have been stated elsewhere, and which we shall hereafter recapitulate, we cannot now accede to a further extension of the permanent settlement, we are the more earnest, on this very account, in inculcating moderation in forming the periodical assessments of the lands: and were we to add any thing to the reflections just quoted (the offspring of a noble and humane mind), it would be an admonition to use much circumspection in the choice of persons, to whom so important a duty is confided as that of settling the revenues of a country, on a judicious discharge of which the prosperity or ruin of its population immediately depends.

79. The pergunnahs comprised in the district of Goruckpore have been settled for four years, at the following jumma:

...... 1217	16,71,405
...... 1218	16,84,909
...... 1219, and provisionally in perpetuity,	17,16,650

80. The progressive increase on the jumma in the course of the four years of this settlement is Rupees 60,600.

81. The average jumma of the four years of the present settlement is Rupees 16,82,253, exceeding the average jumma of the five years prior to the cession, † by the sum of Rupees 6,85,256; and exceeding the jumma of the second triennial settlement, ‡ which terminated in 1215, by the sum of Rupees 1,96,368.

82. The average jumma of the present settlement falls short of the estimated jumma of the first triennial settlement § which terminated in 1212, in the sum of Rupees 201,542; but as remissions were granted in 1212, to the amount of Rupees 1,06,038, and the sum of Rupees 89,430 was written off the public accounts in 1212, as an irrecoverable balance, the defalcation under the present settlement from the actual jumma of 1212 will only be Rupees 1,12,112.  If, indeed, we adopt the statement of the Commissioners, contained in paragraphs 174 to 176 of their report, dated 16th November, 1810, the actual receipts in 1219 †† of the present settlement (which provides for the nankar of the Canongoes and Zemindars that were paid under the first triennial settlement from the public treasury) ought to exceed the actual receipts in 1212 by the sum of Rupees 56,952.

83. Upon the whole, therefore, we shall have no cause to be dissatisfied with the terms of the present settlement, supposing the opinion of the Commission, that there is no reason for doubting the realization of the whole ultimate jumma to be well founded. But when we compare this opinion with the sentiments contained contained in paragraph 173 of their report under the above-mentioned date, viz. that the injudicious attempt to raise the assessment of this district too rapidly at the cession had been evinced, not only by a reduction of Rupees 2,91,395 in the second triennial settlement, but by a large remission in 1211, and an almost corresponding relinquishment of balances in 1211, and when we consider what must have been the pernicious effect of the first over-assessment upon the general resources of the country, we cannot but feel some anxiety lest the present assessment, which falls short of the first nominal assessment only in the sum of Rupees 32,477, but which surpasses the first actual assessment by the sum of Rupees 56,952, may also turn out to be excessive, on reference to the contributive faculties of the landholders.

84. We approve of the division of the tehsildarry establishments in these districts, the expense of which has been reduced in Seharunpore to three and one-third, in Cawnpore to two and two-thirds, and in Goruckpore to two and a half per cent. upon the respective jummas.

85. In answer to paragraphs 31 to 38 of your letter, recommending to us to declare the jumma at which these districts have been assessed in the last year of the present settlements permanently fixed, it is perhaps sufficient for us to refer to our former dispatches, dated 1st February 1811,* 27th November 1811,† and 15th January 1812,‡ containing our sentiments and decision upon this most important question. The general considerations of expediency there stated, instead of being shaken, have, as we have already observed in this dispatch, been greatly confirmed; and an attentive perusal of the reports of the Commissioners, under the annexed dates,§ to which our attention has been drawn in the letter to which we are now replying, has necessarily strengthened this effect on our minds. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves, on the present occasion, to a short recapitulation of what appears to us to be the principal objections to the measure, corroborated as they are by the facts before us. —1st. To declare the amount of the land revenue (which, throughout India, must always be regarded as the chief resource of the Government) irrevocably fixed in perpetuity in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, would be giving a premature pledge to the landholders, not only contrary to general practice, but liable to great inconvenience without any equivalent advantage.—2dly. A vast extent of land in these provinces, now waste but susceptible of cultivation, and which it may reasonably be expected will, in course of time, be rendered productive, under the auspices of a mild, equitable, and stable Government, would, if the present settlement were declared permanent, be for ever exempted from assessment. In the pergunnahs composing the district of Goruckpore, the land in cultivation is stated at only 7,13,962 begahs, whereas the land fit for cultivation, but now unproductive, amounts to 10,31,275 begahs, and the land denominated waste to 12,49,555 begahs: and in the same district, eighteen pergunnahs which, according to the Commissioners' report dated 16th November 1810, paragraph 11, yielded at no great distance of time fifty lacks, are now assessed at only eight lacks of rupees.—3dly. It appears from the Commissioners' reports, that the assessments under the two first triennial settlements were not only very unequal, but in numerous instances formed upon mistaken principles; and although, under the existing settlement, reductions have taken place in some districts, while in others the jumma has been increased, it is strongly to be presumed that it will still require much modification at the period of its expiration.

86. It is impossible, for example, to judge, without the aid of experience, whether the over-assessment of Cawnpore in the two first settlements has been properly rectified under the last assessment; and in the district of Goruckpore it is confessed by the Commissioners, that the pergunnahs south of the Gograh, in some cases, pay double and treble the rent of pergunnahs of equal extent situated to the north of that river.‖

87. These, and various other circumstances, which the perusal of the documents before us have brought under our view, convince us, that the settlements which have been hitherto formed in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces have pro-

proceeded on imperfect data as to the real circumstances of the country, and that our knowledge of its interior concerns is yet incomplete and defective. Much certainly remains to be done in the ascertainment of territorial rights, as either belonging to the state or those living under its protection, in exploring and obtaining correct and circumstantial information respecting the value and capacities of the lands, and in establishing, as far as may be practicable, that close communication and intercourse between the European authorities in the different districts and the inhabitants, which is the only effectual means of making known to the latter the genius and principles upon which we are desirous to conduct the business of our Government, and of enabling you, and those employed under your authority, to become acquainted with their necessities, opinions, feelings, wants, and interests; a knowledge which it is of the first importance that you should possess, before you can, on sure and satisfactory grounds, decide on the system of revenue administration that would be best suited to the country.

88. The accomplishment of these great objects has, since our acquisition of the Ceded and Conquered Territories, advanced with a very slow progress; and until they be substantially effected, all expectations of establishing a plan of revenue management that shall be permanent in principle, and that shall, on the one hand, be compatible with the interests of Government, and on the other, be calculated to uphold and promote the welfare and prosperity of the people, would be delusive.

89. It is with a view to the attainment of the ends which we have described, that we have, in this dispatch, pressed upon your serious consideration the expediency of resorting, wherever it shall be found practicable, to that detailed system of collecting the revenues, which has been practised with so much success in our territories on the Coast, and which, in every part of the country where it has been introduced, has led to a development of the public resources, and to an insight into the internal affairs of the revenue, far more full and particular than had ever before been obtained with respect to any other portion of our Indian possessions, or than it is probable to obtain by any other means.

90. 4thly. But were we even prepared, upon a sound and comprehensive view of the interests of our Government, to forego all claims to any future increase of land revenue from these territories, the reluctance manifested by a considerable proportion of resident landholders to enter into engagements for the payment of a fixed assessment during a term of years, and which, at the formation of the present settlement in Goruckpore, manifested itself in a combined, systematic, and turbulent opposition to the measures of Government,* seems fully to justify the inference that the Zemindars are neither competent to appretiate the boon of a permanent settlement of their estates, nor prepared to receive those advantages which it is proposed, through such an arrangement, to convey.

91. Lastly. The foregoing objections derive no small weight from the opinions of the gentlemen composing the former and the present Commission in the Upper Provinces. The former Commissioners, in their report dated the 13th April 1808, expressed themselves decidedly adverse to a general application of the principles of the permanent settlement to these territories, and on grounds which we deem to be indisputable and conclusive. The actual Commissioners recommend so many exceptions to the system, in their reports, as to lead us to infer, that they do not differ materially in sentiment from their predecessors.

vidence of the Ryots;—4th. Bad crops and other accidents;—5th. Over-assessment.

2. The Aumildar's peculations arise, either from the public revenue, or from a private assessment. The Aumildar usually wishes that rents should be low, because the lower they are, the higher he can make his private assessment, and the less probability there is of its being soon discovered; because the Potail and Ryots, partaking in the benefit, are averse to informing against him. While he confines himself to his private assessment, he may carry on the public collections without leaving any balance outstanding; but whenever he appropriates any part of them to his own use, he raises a proportionate balance against the district; and the cause of it will very soon be discovered, unless the division servants are concerned with him, and the Collector is himself very indolent. If he is pressed for payment, and attempts to raise the money by an extra assessment, the transaction will certainly be brought to light by some of the inhabitants, either by complaining, or by talking so much of it, that it becomes known every where, and is carried to the Collector's cutcherry by some person who wishes to recommend himself for employment. The Aumildar, sensible of the danger of an extra assessment, seldom ventures upon it, but usually prefers the safer mode of fabricating stories of loss of crops and other accidents, and of the inability of the inhabitants to discharge the balances. When such excuses are received, it ought invariably to be concluded, unless the facts are very fully established, that there is something wrong in his conduct, and his removal from office ought to follow without delay. His successor will find no difficulty in ascertaining the real state of balances; for on pressing the villages by which they are reported to be due, the inhabitants, if they have already paid them, will, in order to save themselves, inform against the late Aumildar.

3. The Potails and Curnums, when they know that the Aumildar diverts a part of the public revenue to his own emolument, always follow his example, and thereby augment the outstanding balance. They frequently go farther, and levy additional sums from the more substantial cultivators, because they are conscious that the Aumildar, being himself guilty of malversation, will not dare to bring them to punishment. These last impositions, though they do not affect the balance of the current year, will most likely increase that of the next, or, what is the same thing, diminish the settlement. The Potails and Curnums can hardly ever make away with any of the public money, without the knowledge of the Aumildar. If, in any case, they do, it is a proof that he is either very careless or very ignorant, and that he is unfit for his situation. Their influence, particularly when they have obtained by their exertions a favourable assessment for their village, is usually sufficient to make the cultivators conceal the demand for a small private assessment, which is always, on such occasions, made upon them, provided that, together with the public one, it does not exceed what their rent ought to have been; but when they attempt to make an extra assessment, to supply any deficiency of the public revenue which they may have embezzled, the cultivators never pay it without opposition: and they will always complain of it to the Aumildar, unless they suppose that he is a party himself, and will not hear them.

4. The mismanagement of the cultivators is not so frequent a cause of failure as might at first sight be imagined. When they have money to pay their rents, but do not apply it to that purpose, it is usually expended upon a marriage, or in discharging a debt: but as the Ryots, when left to themselves, always pay their rent in preference to every other debt, it may generally be suspected, when they act otherwise, that the district or village servants are concerned in the transaction. Many Potails and Curnums having, under the late government, embezzled a part of the revenues of their villages, and been forced to make it good, by borrowing money from Soucars, upon bonds running in the names of themselves and their villages, they frequently employ the money collected as revenue in paying these bonds, on pretence that all the Ryots were answerable, as well as themselves, for the debt. They call upon them again for the rent, which they have already paid; but as some of them are unable to comply, an outstanding balance appears against the village. Besides the general debts of the village, the Ryots are often so much pressed for their own private private debts, as to be rendered incapable of discharging their rents. These debts are frequently nothing but the accumulation of exorbitant interest, which the Ryots would never pay, if they were not afraid of being compelled. When private creditors are permitted to seize the property of the Ryots before their rents are paid, it is always to be inferred that they have bribed the Aumildar; when the Potails are allowed to assess them on account of general bonds, it may be concluded that the Aumildar has been guilty of peculation, and that he cannot support the cultivators, lest the Potail should inform againt him.

5. Bad crops are the chief cause of failures, and consequently of remissions; and they are also frequently brought forward as a plea for obtaining remissions, without any absolute necessity. All complaints regarding them should therefore be received with very great caution. Were an investigation to be ordered, whenever a cultivator thought proper to solicit an indulgence for his loss, claims would soon become so numerous, that all the revenue servants in the country would not be able to examine one-half of them. The cultivators would likewise have no difficulty, even in a favourable year, of showing a real loss of eight or ten per cent. of the whole revenue; because in every village, in every season, there are a few fields whose produce is not equal to their rent: and these fields only would be mentioned as the cause of distress and failure; while those whose crops had been more abundant, having probably been already reaped, there would be no means of determining how far the deficiency of produce, in the one case, was counterbalanced by the excess on the other. Were it even possible to estimate exactly the actual loss in every year, it would not follow that it ought to be remitted; for the same cultivators who have lost this year, may have gained last, and as no extra assessment was then laid upon their profit, no remission can now fairly be claimed for their loss. Whatever may have been the crop, should it have been even less than the seed, they should always be made to pay the full rent, if they can; because good and bad seasons being supposed to be equal in the long run, the loss is merely temporary, and the making of it good, is only applying to the deficiency of a year of scarcity, the funds which have arisen from one of abundance. Though there is no rule by which a positive judgment can be formed, whether or not a Ryot who asks a remission can pay his rents, it may in most cases be discovered, by ordering the amount of his failure to be assessed upon the village; for, as the other inhabitants are usually well acquainted with his circumstances, if he has any means of answering the demand against him, they will point them out, in order to exempt themselves from being burthened with it. In the same manner, when a village fails, if the balance upon it is assessed upon the neighbouring villages, the desire of saving themselves from additional taxation will induce the Ryots of those villages to find out and give information, how far the failing village may be able to pay the whole, or a part of its balance. When individual balances are to be levied upon the village by which they are due, great care should be taken, lest the rigorous exaction of them should so much distress the inhabitants, as to disable them from cultivating their usual quantity of land the ensuing year. The amount of this second assessment ought seldom or ever to exceed ten per cent. of the rent of the Ryots of the muzera, or inferior village, on which it is imposed. If a balance still remains, it should be assessed upon all the muzeras which constitute the mouza, but not in a greater proportion than ten per cent of the rent. Should a part of the balance yet remain unextinguished, it ought to be remitted; because the inhabitants are extremely averse to contributing to the losses of any village but their own, and because, if more than an additional ten per cent. is raised upon the mouza in whose muzera the failure has arisen, there is a great danger of its occasioning a considerable decrease of cultivation the following season. When individuals are pressed for balances, the extent of the consequent loss can never exceed the sum of their particular rents; but when a whole village is laid under a greater second assessment than it can bear, it may hereafter cause a very serious diminution of revenue. Whenever the failure of the crop gives reason to apprehend that there will be a balance against any village, the Aumildar ought to repair to the spot without delay, ascertain, with the assistance of the inhabitants of it and the neighbouring villages, what sum it will be necessary to raise by a second assessment, and after making known to every Ryot the the additional amount he is to pay, take measures for its being collected with the last or two last two kists. When the loss, however, appears in a village whose inhabitants are able to make it good, the Aumildar ought to take no notice of it, but proceed with his collections in the same manner as if there had been a plentiful crop; for the necessity of making remissions is much lessened by giving the Ryots no encouragement to expect them.

6. When over-assessment is the cause of an outstanding balance, it ought to be remitted; for it would be unjust to exact more from the cultivators than their lands can possibly yield. Cases of failure from over-assessment alone are, however, very rare; because the Potails, at the time of the settlement always refuse to take their puttas if it is too high, and always obtain a reduction, when they show clearly that it is over-rated. Their own enmities are the most common source of over-assessment; for one Potail often exaggerates the produce of the village of another, or offers more for it than it is really worth, with the intention of supplanting his rival, and making the Ryots pay the loss. He ought to be obliged to pay it himself, as far as his means go; and if they are not sufficient, the difference ought to be remitted. If, by any mistake or false information, one muzera in a mouza is rated too high, and another too low, a second assessment ought to be laid upon the underrated muzera, and applied to the discharge of the balance.

No. 2. Letter from the Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts, dated 30th September 1802, on the modes of conducting a Ryotwar Settlement.

To the Collectors of the Ceded Districts.

Gentlemen:

Par. 1. In making the annual revenue settlements, there are three ways which are usually followed, and which have each, according to particular circumstances, their claim to preference. The first is, to make the mouzawar, or village settlement, of a whole district at once, and then to proceed to the kulwar, or individual settlement, with every inhabitant of each village. The second is, to make the village settlement of one village, and then the individual settlement of it before beginning with another; and the third is, to begin by settling with each individual of one village separately, and then by adding their rents together, to make the village settlement.

2. The first mode, that of beginning with a general village settlement of a whole district, is that which I always observe myself; not only because it has in itself many advantages, but because no other would answer, in a division so extensive as mine. It is much more expeditious, and is also frequently as correct as the others. By assembling all the Potails and Curnums of a district in one place, there is a better chance of obtaining speedy and even accurate knowledge of its actual state of cultivation, than there is by meeting them in their respective villages; because besides the usual information to be derived from the Curnums' accounts, there is always a great deal obtained from discharged Curnums who wish to be restored, and from persons without employment residing in the different villages, who are desirous of renting them. By drawing intelligence from so many different sources, it usually happens, that the produce of some villages is more fully brought forward than that of others. But as the Potails and Curnums of such villages are averse to being higher assessed than their neighbours, they seldom fail to disclose whatever they know of their concealed resources; and, in this manner, the total actual produce of the district is soon known: and after the gross amount of the assessment is once fixed, should it still fall too heavy on any particular villages, it is easily equalized by the Potails themselves, with the assistance of the cutcherry. When neither the accounts of the Curnums, nor any other information, raise the revenue so high as there is reason to think that it ought to be; and when it is therefore thought advisable to try the dangerous experiment experiment of increasing the assessment, not from the accounts of the current year, but from the presumption that the produce, being known from authentic documents to have been much greater some years ago, cannot possibly be now so much diminished as it is represented to be, the additional rent which may be imposed upon the district on such an occasion, is, in general, very readily partitioned by the Potails and Curnums among their respective villages. It is however very hazardous to attempt to raise the revenue upon such uncertain foundations; for there is often more mischief done by one year of over-assessment, than can be remedied by seven of moderation. Revenue servants who have had much experience, can easily ascertain, from the manner in which the Potails and Curnums proceed in distributing the extra assessment, whether or not there be really a corresponding extra produce. When they divide the extra assessment in a certain proportion among all the villages, it is usually a proof that the first assessment had been to the produce, nearly in the same rates, in them all; but it is no proof that it is too low. When they divide the extra asesssment unequally, it is a strong indication that at least those villages in which the greatest additional weight is thrown had before been under-rated. The chief objections to making a settlement of all the villages of a district at once are, that it is sometimes detrimental to cultivation, by keeping the Potails and Curnums away from their villages when their presence is wanted to promote it, and that by bringing the heads of villages together, it enables them to form combinations to prevent the raising of the assessment, which they would not otherwise have thought of. Their being assembled is, however, much more frequently attended by a contrary effect; for private quarrels, and their jealousy of any of their neighbours obtaining more favourable terms than themselves, most commonly urge them, rather to exaggerate the value of each others villages, than to form any concert for their mutual benefit. In my division, the settlement of all the villages composing a district is always made at once, and the kulwar, or individual settlement, is afterwards made by the Aumildar; but as few Aumildars, who have not before been in the Company's service, have ever seen a kulwar settlement, people are sent from the cutcherry to carry it into execution in all those districts, where it is thought that it cannot be safely entrusted to the Aumildar.

3. The second mode, that of making the settlement of each village separately, is a very common one. It is less liable to be either too high, or too low, than the district settlement; because the state of a tank, or of the cultivation of particular fields, about which there may be a dispute, can be readily ascertained, by sending some person to the spot; because those who are to make the settlements have also an opportunity of observing the general state of agriculture among the lands of the village; because it can be easily discovered, whether those Ryots who are reported by the Curnums to have emigrated, are present or not, and because the amount of the mohterfa, or taxes on trades, can be more accurately determined at the village itself, than any where else. When the village settlement is once fixed, that of the different cultivators is greatly facilitated; because the Potail and Curnum, knowing that a certain sum must be levied, give every assistance, except perhaps in the case of a few of their own relations, to make a fair distribution of it; and because the cultivators, for the same reason, agree without much difficulty to their several proportions; and as the discovery of every unauthorized enaum or cultivated sircar field, not brought to account, lightens their particular assessment, a regard for their own interest encourages them to give information of many frauds of this nature, which could not otherwise have been so readily detected. Though an Aumildar may visit and settle every village separately, a Collector who has the management of five or six districts, must settle two, three, or more villages in one place; for were he not to do so, the season would be over before he could finish his settlement. He has, in this way, more people to give him information of the state of these villages, than he could have had by going to each of them separately.

4. The third kind of settlement (the kulwar or individual settlement), if the Curnums' accounts could be depended upon, would naturally be the best, because the stock of cattle, and the quantity and quality of land belonging to each cultivator, being known, it would be easy to fix his rent; and that of all the cultivators cultivators added together, would form the land-rent of the village. But as the Curnums' accounts are always false, to begin with fixing the rents of the cultivators, would not only be the most tedious, but the most unequal of all settlements. Every single cultivator objects to his own assessment. When the cutcherry servants, by stating the quantity of his land, and the rent that had been drawn from it in preceding years, endeavour to convince him that the assessment is moderate, and that he ought to agree to it, he urges all the excuses commonly brought forward by that class of men; that grain is now very cheap; that some of his cattle are dead; that he is poor, and cannot cultivate his land without an abatement of rent. He is privately encouraged by the Potail and principal farmers to give as much opposition as possible; because they all, in their turns, intend to do the same, in the hope that, if he can obtain a reduction of his rent, they may also, under the same pretences, expect the same indulgence. Every Ryot is usually sufficiently careful of his own interest to dispute about his rent, whether it is high or low; but should there even be some among them who, being satisfied with it, have no thoughts of starting objections, the fear of the Potail's displeasure, and of the reproaches of the other Ryots for deserting the common cause, induces them to raise as many difficulties as any of the rest. Much time is consumed in thus debating upon the rent of every individual; and if the revenue servants, either believing their representations of their distress, or wishing to expedite the settlement, allow some abatement of rent to those who are reckoned the poorest, they find that the aggregate of these remissions not only causes a considerable loss of rent, but increases the difficulty of settling other villages, by encouraging the Ryots to insist on a similar or perhaps a greater reduction. The Ryots who dispute the most obstinately, even though their rents are already too low, are the most likely to get a further abatement; and those who are less noisy and litigious, are most liable to have their rents, perhaps already too high, raised still higher. It may be thought that the Ryots being collected together in one place, no one would allow the land of another to be more favourably rated than his own, without complaining. This usually takes place in villages where none of the Ryots are very poor, where there are few in number and nearly on a footing with regard to property. In such cases, they generally insist upon a fair division of the assessment; but in most other villages, in which both the poorest and the most substantial Ryots are found, the assessment is, for the most part, unequal, and is always most favourable to the relations of the Potail, and to such other Ryots as hold out the most stubbornly.

5. When a country has been surveyed, the individual supersedes both the village and district settlement, because it is then no longer necessary to waste time, in endeavouring to persuade the cultivators to accede to the assessment. The rent of every field being fixed, each cultivator takes or rejects what he pleases, and the rents of all the fields occupied in the course of the year in any one village, form what is called the settlement of that village. But where no survey has been made, either the settlement with all the villages of a district at once, or that with three or four at a time in succession, must always be adopted. Besides the reasons already mentioned, the various accidents that affect the crop, render it convenient to make the village precede the kulwar settlement; because, though the general state of cultivation in a village may be known early in the season, the particular lands on which the crop may thrive or fail, can never be ascertained until it is pretty far advanced: and as the assessment of individuals must, in some manner, be regulated by the produce, the more advanced the harvest season is when their rents are fixed, the more likely are they to be proportioned to their means of discharging them. This system operates, no doubt, in many cases, as a tax upon industry and an encouragement to idleness; but as there is at present no other method of securing the realization of the public revenue, it must be continued until the country is surveyed, when every man will be made to pay, not according to the quantity of his crop, but of his land.

6. Though the crop should be considerably advanced before the individual settlement is begun, yet it ought not to be delayed beyond this period; and the sooner it is then finished, the better. If it were possible, it would be of great benefit to the inhabitants, that it could be effected by the time the first kist becomes due; because every cultivator knowing the full amount of his rent, and having the whole of his crop on hand, would see at once how far it was likely to answer the demand upon him, and would thereby be the more enabled to turn it to the greatest advantage. If it was more than sufficient, he would lay up a part to sell late in the year, when the price had risen to its highest pitch. If it was inadequate, he would still endeavour, by selling it only by degrees in proportion to his kists, and by curtailing his expenses, to pay his rent. But when his rent is not settled till after most of the kists have been collected, it is sometimes higher than he expected. He has probably not been so careful or economical as he would have been, had he known the amount of it earlier; and he is, therefore, unable to make it good. On the other hand, while he remains in this state of uncertainty, he sometimes suspects, without cause, that his rent will be raised higher than is actually intended. He perceives that his grain will not equal the demand against him; and he sells it off in a hurry at a low price, and absconds with the produce. It is, therefore, of importance, that the individual settlement should never be longer delayed than is absolutely necessary; for the same bad consequences often ensue from uncertainty, as from a higher assessment.

7. Whenever the individual settlement of a district is completed, pottahs for every Ryot paying rent to Government should be made out by the Curnums, according to the form prescribed in my letter of the 30th of August, and transmitted to the cutcherry, to be signed by you, after having been compared. You should give them yourself to the inhabitants of the villages near the spot where you happen to be at the time; in all other places they may be delivered by the Aumildar. It is proper that every pottah should have your signature, because the inhabitants have more confidence in it than in that of the Aumildar or Potail. They know it is intended to guard them against extra demands; and they will be more likely to refuse compliance with them, when they have such a voucher in their possession. It likewise teaches them to look up to you, instead of the native servants; and, though they may not have courage to resist the demand in the village, to come forward afterwards with the complaint. They have always been so much accustomed to arbitrary exactions, that it is very difficult to prevail upon them, at least upon the poorer classes, to oppose them. But nothing tends sooner to convince them that there is a limit to assessment, and to encourage them to reject all extra impositions, than the general distribution of pottahs by the Collector.

I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,

Collector.

No. 3.—Letter from the Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts, to the Board of Revenue, dated the 30th November, 1806.*

Gentlemen:

Par. 1. I HAD, some time ago, the honour to receive your letter of the 9th September last, with a copy of an extract from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated the 6th November 1805, and of the minutes of Government thereon, dated the 1st August 1806; and I shall now, agreeably to the orders of the Board, give as circumstantial an explanation of the manner in which the kulwar, or individual settlement is made, as the subject seems to require.

2. This kind of settlement, though it appears intricate and laborious, is so greatly facilitated by a variety of causes, as to render the execution of it easy to any person of common attention. It is the ancient and universal practice under all the native governments; and hence the Collector has no trouble of introducing a new system, but has only to follow that which he finds already established.

Districts are divided into villages, under the management of Potails, or head farmers, who are, from long habit, perfectly capable of making the settlement of their respective villages; and the Ryots, from having been long accustomed to be guided by them, readily agree to what they fix or propose, as it is usually what they themselves know to be the proper rent.

In

* Extract Proceedings of Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, 5th January 1807.

Reports, &c. from Collectors, on a Ryotwar Settlement.

In all villages, the Ryots are in the habit of meeting and debating upon the subject of rent; but there are many villages in which they settle among themselves the exact proportion of the whole rent that each individual is to pay. These are called Veespuddi, or sixteenth villages, from the land and rent being divided into sixteenth shares; and they compose a considerable part of the Cuddapah province, which is about one-third of the Ceded Districts, besides being scattered, though more thinly, over other parts of the country. When the season of cultivation draws near, all the Ryots of the veespuddi village assemble to regulate their several rents for the year. The pagoda is the place usually chosen for this purpose, from the idea that its sanctity will render their engagements with each other the more binding. They ascertain the amount of the agricultural stock of each individual and of the whole body, the quantity of land to the culture of which it is adequate; and they divide it accordingly, giving to each man the portion which he has the means of cultivating, and fixing his share of the rent; and whether his share be one or two sixteenths, he pays this proportion, whether the whole rent of the village be higher or lower than last year.

Every village is, in fact, a small collectorate; and where the Potail does his duty, the Collector has only to confirm what he has already done. From all these circumstances, together with the aid which is derived from the Tehsildars and their cutcheries, the kulwar settlement, which on the first view might appear to be an endless task, is so much simplified, that it may be accomplished by any person of ordinary talents and exertion.

3. The chief obstacles in the way of it arise from false accounts, from doubts concerning the rate of assessment, and from the difficulty of ascertaining the condition of the poorer Ryots. There is perhaps no Curnum, who in any one year ever gives a perfectly true statement of the cultivation of his village; and it is only the fear of removal or suspension, that can make him give such accounts as are tolerably accurate. The proper rate of assessment is found, either by reference to the accounts of former years, or by comparison with the rent of lands of the same quality which have long been nearly stationary; and the condition of the poorer Ryots is learned from the concurring testimony of their neighbours, who at the same time will not exaggerate their poverty, lest the remissions which may in consequence be granted should fall upon themselves. A short explanation of what takes place in the kulwar settlement of a single district or tehsildarry, will equally apply to the whole number of districts forming a collectorate. I shall here speak of a district in its ordinary state of prosperity, not of one that has been reduced below it, by war or any other calamity.

4. A district paying a revenue of fifty thousand pagodas, usually contains about a hundred villages, differing greatly in extent and produce; some of them not paying more than a hundred pagodas, and others as much as five thousand annual rent. Every village has within itself a complete establishment of hereditary revenue servants: a Potail to direct the cultivation, realize the rent, and manage its affairs in general; a Curnum to keep the accounts; and a certain number of Peons to act under the Potail, in collecting the kists from the Ryots. When the ploughing season begins, the Potail ascertains what land each Ryot can cultivate; he permits those who may have met with losses to relinquish a part of their land, which he distributes to others who may be willing to take it; and to such as require none, he continues their former lands. He does not fix their rents, because this is done by the Collector, when the season is so far advanced that a judgment can be formed of the crop; but he assures them that their respective rents will continue the same as last year, only making allowance for such alterations as may become unavoidable, from the total revenue of the village being somewhat raised or lowered by the Collector: they are satisfied with this promise, receive betel from him as a confirmation of it, and yoke their ploughs. Specific written engagements cannot be made with them at this early period of the year, because, as in annual settlements, where the failure of the crop is great, remissions must be allowed; so where the produce is uncommonly abundant, increase must be taken to balance such failures, because the Potail having relations and friends in the village to whom he would be partial, could not safely be entrusted with the power of fixing rents, and because the Ryots themselves will not in this year agree to pay the same rent in the ensuing one, lest they should meet with losses, which would be aggravated by a rent which they might then be unable to bear. The Tehsildar goes round his district in the early early part of the season. His business is chiefly to regulate cultivation in those villages where it is mismanaged from the incapacity of the Potail, or impeded by disputes among the principal Ryots, and to make advances to the poorer sort for the purchase of seed, ploughs, or cattle. He also ascertains what land each Ryot has already cultivated, or engaged to cultivate during the year, which he does, by assembling the Ryots in their respective villages, and examining them in the presence of the Potails and Curnums; and accounts of the lands occupied and unoccupied are taken by his cutcherry, which accompanies him. He goes round again when the crops are ripening, to see their condition, and to ascertain whether the quantity of land actally cultivated is more or less than that which the Ryots had engaged to take.

5. The Collector sets out on his circuit in September or October, when the early crops begin to be reaped, and the late ones to be down. On arriving in a district he assembles all the Ryots of the four or five nearest villages. The first business is, to learn how far the cultivation of the present year is more or less than that of the last. This is soon done, by the help of the Tehsildars' and Curnums' accounts, compared with the reports of the Potails and Ryots. Where there is a decrease, it is commonly owing to deaths, emigrations, or loss of cattle. Where there is an increase, it is usually derived from new settlers, or additional lands being occupied by the old ones. In the case of decrease, the rent of the lands thrown up is deducted from the settlement of last year: in that of increase, the rent of the land newly occupied is added; and in both cases, the rent of the remaining lands remains the same as before. The rent of the land newly occupied is determined by the accounts of what it was in former times; or, if such accounts cannot be procured, by the opinions of the most intelligent Ryots: but the full rent of waste land is not exacted, until it has been in cultivation from two to seven years. The number of years, and the gradational rise in each year, depend upon the nature of the land and the custom of the village. They are known to all parties; and all doubts are removed, by their being detailed in a proclamation, or cowle namah, under the Collector's seal, circulated to every village.

If the cultivation is the same as last year's, and no failures occur among the Ryots, the rents remain unaltered. If the crops are bad, and it appears that some of the poor Ryots must have a remission, the loss, or a part of it, is assessed upon the lands of the rest, where it can be done without causing any material inconvenience. This assessment never exceeds ten or twelve per cent., and is much oftener relinquished than carried into effect. In cases where it can be easily borne, it is frequently agreed to without difficulty; and if opposition is made, it is generally soon got over, by the mediation of the Ryots of the neighbouring villages present. These discuss the point in question with the Ryots of the objecting village, tell them that it is the custom of the country, use such other arguments as may be applicable to the subject, and never fail in persuading them to accede to the demand, unless it is really too high, in which event it is lowered. Wherever individuals or villages object to their rent, it is always the most expeditious and satisfactory way of settling the dispute, to refer it to the Ryots of other villages, who do more on such occasions in half an hour, than a Collector and his cutcherry in a whole year.

6. The great number of Ryots assembled, and the publicity of every operation, are of great use in expediting the settlement. If failures of crops are to be remitted to needy Ryots, those who claim indulgence on insufficient grounds cannot succeed, because their neighbours who are present object to it; for they will not allow a remission to be given in which they do not themselves partake, unless it is absolutely necessary; and in the same manner, if rent is any where raised too high, the parties on whom it falls, by appealing to the judgment of the Ryots of other villages, get an abatement; so that, as much aid is derived from the Ryots themselves as from accounts, in making the settlement.

7. When the land in cultivation and its rent has been ascertained, the Collector gives every Ryot a pottah with his signature, in which every field he holds, and its rent for the year, are inserted. In most villages, the greatest part of the Ryots hold the same fields several years, so that among fifty individuals there are not perhaps ten whose rights require alteration. When the Collector has finished the first four or five villages, he moves on a few miles, assembles the Ryots of the adjacent villages, and having settled their rents, proceeds in the same manner until he has finished the whole district, which usually requires a month or five weeks. The Sub-collectors, who have only four or five districts each, make the whole kulwar settlement personally. My own division is too extensive to be annually settled in detail by one person; and I therefore leave what I cannot accomplish myself to the district servants. I make the village settlements of every district, and also the kulwar settlement of one district, in some years, and of one village in each district, in others, and direct the rest to be done by the Tehsildars. The Tehsildar having one village as a model, is easily enabled to settle the rest in the same way. The rent of each village having been settled by me, he can only add to it, by including lands which may have been suppressed by the Curnums; and he can only lower it, where some of the Ryots may have met with great losses. If he lowers it without cause, the Ryots who do not share in the remission object to it and complain; or if, without altering the rent of the village, he lowers that of one Ryot and raises that of another unjustly, the Ryot on whom the extra rent is thrown complains. Even where the Ryots neglect to bring the grievance forward immediately, they hardly ever omit to state it when assembled for the settlement of the ensuing year; and the Tehsildar, knowing that gross negligence or partiality will be attended with the loss of his place, seldom ventures to make an unfair settlement. There are, however, cases in which he does so, either from ignorance or corrupt motives; but where the Collector is vigilant, they are not frequent. There is, indeed, no possibility of preventing them altogether; for the Collector, when he makes the settlement in person, may be deceived occasionally by the servants of his own cutcherry, who may be dishonest as well as the Tehsildar. The business of a Collector is not properly so much to labour through all the details of the settlement, as to make those do it who can do it best. The Potails and Curnums of villages are the persons most capable of making the settlement correctly; but they cannot be trusted, because they are cultivators themselves, and have always friends and enemies among the Ryots. It therefore becomes necessary to employ a Tehsildar, who, not being a native of the district, is not so liable to be influenced by partialities. As his attention, too, is confined to a single district, he will consequently know the state of its cultivation better than the Collector or his cutcherry, and will be better qualified than them to make the settlements properly; and hence I have found that the settlements of Tehsildars have usually been better adapted than my own to the circumstances of the Ryots.

8. I have described the kulwar settlement, as it is made in a country in its ordinary state of cultivation; but in one which has suffered from invasion or internal disturbances, and in which a part of the land formerly cultivated is waste, and the remainder held at a rent considerably below the ancient standard, the process is more tedious and difficult, because it is requisite not only to increase or diminish the rents of such individuals as occupy or throw up land, but to raise the rent of every Ryot, by raising the rent of all land gradually to its former level, following cautiously the improving condition of the Ryots. This was done throughout the Ceded Districts for some years; but they have all now, with a very few exceptions, reached their standard assessments. The same mode is followed, in raising the general rent of whole villages and districts, as the particular rent of a few individuals. It is effected by the means of accounts; of the opinions of intelligent revenue servants; and more than all, by the assistance derived from the Ryots of one village in assessing those of another.

9. When a district has been surveyed and the rent of every field permanently fixed, the kulwar settlement becomes extremely simple; for all that is required is to ascertain what fields are occupied by each Ryot, and to enter them, with the fixed rents attached to them, in his pottah; their aggregate constitutes his rent for the year. He cannot be called upon for more; but he may obtain an abatement, in case of poverty or extraordinary losses. He has the advantage of knowing in the beginning of the season, when he ploughs his land, the exact amount of what he is to pay; he knows the fixed rents of the different fields which he cultivates, and that the demand upon him cannot exceed their total amount; he knows the utmost limit of his rent, not only for the present, but for every succeeding year; for it cannot be raised, unless he takes additional land; and he is thereby the better enabled to provide for the regular discharge of his kists, and against the losses of bad, by the profits of good seasons.

10. The kulwar settlement, though it may appear tedious, when compared to the village one, is however not only better calculated to realize the revenue, but is, on the whole, a saving of time, because when it is once made there is no further trouble; but in the village settlement there is so much room for malversation, so many disputes between the Potails and Ryots about extra collections, on the one hand, and the withholding of rents on the other, that more time is consumed in inquiring into those matters than in the original settlement.

11. The Honourable Court of Directors seem to be apprehensive that too much must be left in the kulwar settlement to the agency of native servants; but it does not appear to me that such agency can be dispensed with, or that, when properly controlled, any serious evil can result from its employment. Without it, the Company's servants could do little or nothing. The most experienced Collector could hardly make the settlement of ten villages in a whole year; and after all, it would most likely be done very indifferently. The native servants are restrained, as far as men with inadequate allowances can be restrained, by the same considerations as the public servants in other countries; by the fear of detection, of losing their situations, and of punishment. In all provinces that have been permanently settled, their agency has been used, and it had then a much wider field for abuse than in the kulwar settlements; because such provinces having been previously settled for some years by villages, talooks, or other large tracts, without descending lower into detail, and being then disposed of for ever, all inquiry was at an end: so that, if the revenue of villages or talooks could be undervalued and concealed for a short period, till the permanent settlement took place, the danger of discovery was over; whereas, under the ryotwar system, the minute process that is gone through every year, renders the most trifling abuse liable every moment to detection. When the rent of evey field has been fixed by survey, there is little room for abuse: it cannot be against the Ryot, but may be in his favour; because it can be effected only by reporting cultivated land as waste, or by obtaining remission on false pretences of poverty: but it has already been shewn, that from the public manner in which the kulwar settlement is conducted, and the contending interests of the Ryots, either of those modes of injuring the revenue can never reach to any extent or be long concealed. There can be no doubt that the kulwar settlement is better calculated than any other, to bring to view the whole resources of the country; but whether it is equally well adapted to improve them, can perhaps never be certainly known, but by a long trial of its effects in an extensive district.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient and humble Servant,

No. 4.—Report of the Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts to the Board of Revenue, dated 15*th August*, 1807, *proposing a Plan for permanently settling those Districts on the Ryotwar principle, and on the Advantages of that mode of Settlement compared with Zemindary Assessments.

Gentlemen:

Par. 1. The survey of the Ceded Districts having been completed, it now only remains to consider how they are to be permanently settled, what remission of the present assessment will be required for that purpose, and whether the immediate tenants of Government ought to be Ryots or Zemindars.

2. There is some difficulty in ascertaining what proportion of the gross or net produce of the soil ought to be left to the landholder, in order to render the land private property and saleable, so as to be security for the rent of Government. Had the public revenue in India ever been paid by the private trade trade land-owners, the share of the produce which was then received by the sovereign might now have served as a standard to regulate the demand. But nothing can be plainer, than that private landed property has never existed in India, excepting on the Malabar coast, and that therefore, in all other districts, the share of the produce which ought to constitute the rent to Government, must be determined rather by opinion than by experience. If Menu and Abul Fazel are to be believed, the shares received as rent by the Hindoo princes and Mogul emperors were very low; but their assertions are altogether unsupported by facts. Menu is very vague in his statement of shares: but one-sixth is that which he mentions most frequently as the government rent. He says that the prince may take one-eighth, one-sixth, or one-twelfth of grain, according to the soil. He observes, that Ryots sometimes rented their lands to under-tenants: but still it seems that it was necessary to urge the Ryot, by public authority, to cultivate his farm; for Menu adds, "if land be injured by "the farmer himself, or if he fails to sow it in due time, he shall be fined "ten times as much as the King's share of the crop that might otherwise "have been raised." Had the King's rent been only one-sixth of the gross produce, there would have been no occasion to fine the farmer to deter him from the neglecting to sow, any more than there is to fine the proprietor in England. The farmer's own interest would have been a sufficient incitement to his industry; and as, from the lowness of the rent, he could have paid it, even if the land had by accident remained unsown, the King could have no motive for compelling him to cultivate. But as it appears that penalties were deemed necessary, it is pretty clear that land was not saleable, that the farmer could not pay when it was not sown, and consequently that the rent to Government absorbed almost all private rent, and left him, as now, very little beyond the charges of cultivation.

3. The assessment of Akber is estimated by Abul-Fazel at one-third, and by other authorities at one-fourth of the gross produce. But it was undoubtedly higher than either of these rates; for had it not been so, enough would have remained to the Ryot after defraying all expenses, to render the land private property; and as this did not take place, we may be certain that the nominal one-fourth or one-third was nearly one-half. This seems to have been the opinion of Aurungzebe, for he directs that not more than one-half of the crop shall be taken from the Ryot; that where the crop has suffered injury, such remission shall be made as may leave him one-half of what the crop might have been; and that where one Ryot dies and another occupies his land, the rent should be reduced, if more than one-half of the produce, and raised if less than a third. It is evident, therefore, that Aurungzebe thought that one-half was in general enough for the Ryot, and that he ought in no case to have above two-thirds. The mode of assessment, in the Ceded Districts and the Decan, still limits the share of the Ryot to those proportions, but makes it commonly much nearer to one-half than two-thirds of the produce. If, by fixing the Government rent at one-third, he were allowed to enjoy the remainder, and all such future increase as might arise from his industry, he would never relinquish his farm, and all cultivated land would soon become private landed property. If more than one-third is demanded as rent, there can be no private property; for it is found that when land, which has formerly been enam, is assessed, that as long as the rate is not more than one-third of the produce, the land is regarded as a private estate, and can generally be sold; but that whenever the rate exceeds one-third, the land is scarcely ever saleable, is no longer reckoned private property, and is often abandoned. It is also found by experience, that one-third of the produce is the rate of assessment at which persons, who are not themselves cultivators, can rent land from Government without loss; for it enables them, after paying the public demand, and being reimbursed for all expenses and stock employed, to obtain a small portion of land-rent. As one-third of the produce is therefore the highest point to which assessment can in general be carried, without destroying private landed property, and as it is also the point to which it must be lowered, before persons who are not cultivators can occupy sirkar land without loss, it is obvious that unless the assessment is reduced to this rate, land can neither be occupied by all classes of the inhabitants, nor ever become private property; nor can any permanent settlement be made, calculated to improve the condition condition of the Ryots or of the public revenue. I am therefore of opinion, that in a permanent settlement of the Ceded Districts, the rent of Government should be about one-third of the gross produce. The present assessment is about forty-five per cent. To bring it to the proposed level, would require a remission of twenty-five per cent., as may be seen from the following example:

Total gross produce, say	100
Government share, by the present assessment	45
Deduct twenty-five per cent. of assessment	$11\frac{1}{4}$
Government share, by proposed permanent assessment	$33\frac{3}{4}$

4. Supposing that this remission is allowed, its being granted to Zemindars or to Ryots would make a very material difference to the country. I have stated fully, in former letters, what appeared to me to be the respective advantages and disadvantages of the zemindary or mootadary and ryotwary system; and all that I have now to offer on the subject is little more than a recapitulation of arguments already adduced at different times. It may be said, in favour of the Zemindar or Mootahdar, that he becomes at once a great proprietor, and relieves Government from the trouble of making settlements with the Ryots. That having a deeper interest in the cultivation of the country than the revenue officer, he is better qualified to direct it: that being more intimately acquainted with the circumstances of the Ryots, and having greater inducement to prevent their failure or desertion, he is more likely to grant them such remissions as may occasionally be necessary: that he will grow rich himself, and by granting favourable terms to his tenants will gradually raise up a body of substantial land-owners: that he will require no remissions in his rent to Goverment, as he will be able to make up for his loss in one place by his gain in another: that he will stand between Government and the cultivator; and finally, that by conducting most of the details formerly intrusted to the revenue officer, he will greatly lessen the number of accounts and the charges of collection.

5. Against the zemindary system it may be urged, that the Mootahdar will endeavour to secure all advantages to himself, by giving only short leases, and making the Ryots pay the full rent according to custom: that if he fails in this, and is obliged to lower their rents to induce them to remain on his estate, he lessens his own means of discharging the public dues; and if he is constrained to give up the whole advantage usually allowed to himself by Government, or fifteen per cent. remission to them, his estate becomes in fact ryotwary: that by being restricted from raising his rents he loses one essential quality of ownership, and by being hindered from alienating his estate in smaller portions than 500 pagodas rent, he loses another: that if he cannot raise the rent or turn out Ryots, he has not the advantage which is sometimes ascribed to the adoption of large farms, for he will not, even if he has the means, attempt to improve where he cannot raise the rent: that the great Zemindar defies all authority, and will keep the Ryots as poor as they have always been; and the small one, or Mootahdar, will endeavour to imitate him in his state and armed followers: that though most of the mootahs will finally resolve into ryotwary farms, many of the greater ones will assume the character of zemindaries of poligarships: that the country will be filled with petty armed chiefs, who may hereafter combine to disturb the public tranquillity; and that the system is, on the whole, detrimental to the country and dangerous to Government.

6. In favour of the ryotwary system it may be observed, that it is the system which has always prevailed in India; that no other can be permanent, and that however different any new one may be, it must resolve itself into it at last, because the duration of great property in any family is opposed by early and universal marriage, by the equal division among all the sons, and by adoption where there are none: that it is more simple than the mootahdary plan, because it requires no artificial restraints, contrary to custom and the laws of inheritance, to prevent the division of estates; because it admits of all gradations of large and and small farms, as there are Ryots who pay from one to one thousand pagodas; because the owner of the land, where he has tenants, may raise or lower the rent at pleasure, which cannot be done by the Mootahdar: that it is better adapted to preserve simplicity of manner and good order; because every Ryot will, on his own estate, be at once proprietor, farmer, and labourer; because the division of property, by engaging men in labour for their maintenance, is favourable to quiet; because a great body of small proprietors, instead of a few Zemindars or Mootahdars, will be interested in supporting Government; and because it facilitates the establishment of the authority of the courts of justice, which can seldom reach Zemindars, particularly armed ones. It may be also said, that it is better calculated to promote industry and to augment the produce of the country, because it makes more proprietors and farmers, and fewer common labourers than the zemindarry or mootahdarry scheme; because the Ryot would be more likely to improve his land as a proprietor than as the tenant of a Zemindar; and as he would enjoy the whole remission instead of a small part or perhaps none, he would be more able to do it; and because the small proprietor being a better manager and farmer, and more immediately interested than the great one in the cultivation of his land, would bestow more pains upon it, and make it yield a more abundant crop: that supposing the amount of property to be the same, it would be better that it should be in the hands of forty or fifty thousand small proprietors, than of four or five hundred great ones: that by the remission going at once to the Ryots, it would improve the circumstances of the class of men from whom the revenue is principally drawn, and would enable them to raise a greater quantity of food, and thus to favour the increase of population: that by allowing the revenue to increase or diminish, according to the extent of land in cultivation, it eases the farmer, without occasioning, on an average of years, any loss to Government: that this fluctuation would lessen every day, as the Ryots became more wealthy, and would at last be confined to tank lands; and that the ryotwary system, by retaining in the hands of Government all unoccupied land, gives it the power of gradually augmenting the revenue, without imposing any fresh burden upon the Ryots, as long as there is an acre of waste in the country.

7. The chief arguments against the ryotwary system are, the great detail of accounts and the consequent difficulty of management, the interference of revenue officers in cultivation, the expense of collection, and the fluctuation in the annual amount of the public revenue. But there seems to be nothing very serious in these objections. When a country is surveyed and the rent of every field fixed, the accounts become perfectly simple; they are nothing more than a list of Ryots and fields, and if the Ryots do not next year take new or throw up old land, the same register will serve again; and as Curnums must always be kept, there is no more difficulty in getting from them an account of a hundred Ryots than of one Mootahdar. The accounts of the customs, which yield so small a portion of revenue, are infinitely more intricate and troublesome than those of the land rent. If such a remission is granted as will leave the Ryots a private rent, after discharging the public one, the interference of revenue servants will be unnecessary: their own interest will stimulate them to cultivate, as in Canara, where no revenue officer ever thinks of calling upon the owner to plough or sow his fields. The additional expense of collection in the ryotwary settlement would be gradually compensated by the rent of waste lands brought into cultivation, and the fluctuation in the annual amount of the revenue would be gradually lessened, as the Ryots became attached to their farms by the benefits of a low assessment, and retained them as a lasting possession, instead of changing them, partly or wholly, almost every year.

8. The only matters of real importance, in a comparison of the ryotwary and zemindarry systems, are the amount of the remission to be granted and the mode of its distribution. If the sum is in both cases equal, the direct loss to revenue is also the same. But, in the one case, the whole remission goes immediately to the Ryots, by whom all land-rent is produced; while, in the other, it may never reach them: the Zemindars will keep it from them for ever, and the Mootahdars for a long period of years. In the one case, the whole of it will be immediately applied to the improvement of the country; in the other, either none, or only a small portion, will be allotted to that purpose. It seems extraordinary, that it should ever have been conceived that a country could be as much much benefitted by giving up a share of the public rent to a small class of Zemindars or Mootahdars, who do not yet actually exist, as by giving it to the Ryots, from whom all rent is derived. When the settlement of a great province is in view, the prosperity of the body of the people should be the grand object to which every thing else should be made to yield; and as it is plain that the Ryots must reap infinitely more advantage from a remission granted to themselves, than from a similar one to Zemindars and Mootahdars, the ryotwary system, with all its supposed inconveniences, ought undoubtedly to be adopted in preference to every other. The Zemindar is a kind of contractor, who undertakes to get a greater fixed rent for Government from the Ryots than can be done in any other way. He engages, for fifteen or twenty per cent. to make the Ryots always pay what they now do: he can remit nothing to them without loss to himself, and he will therefore keep their rents as high as ever, as long as he can. The advantages of this system may be comprehended in a few words. The Zemindar undertakes to pay every year exactly the same amount of revenue, to relieve the public servants from the fatigue of thinking about it, and to settle with the Ryots in such a manner that Government shall never hear any thing about them.

9. It has been objected to the ryotwary system, that it leaves no person between the cultivator and the revenue officer. But this objection is made from not understanding the condition of Indian husbandmen; for, in this country, the landlord and cultivator can never be permanently separated, as in England: the minute division of property will always render them the same persons, with a very few exceptions. The landlord must always cultivate his own fields, and hence the collections must always be made directly from the cultivator, in his quality of landlord; and hence there can be no person between the cultivator and the revenue officer, without a creation of Zemindars, who must themselves, in time, become either petty princes or cultivators. If the whole system of English and of Indian collection is examined, it will perhaps appear that the interference of revenue officers is greater and more vexatious in England than in this country. The land-tax of England is so light, and is so small a portion of the public revenue, that the landlord cannot be supposed to suffer any vexation from its collection; but then there is the excise, for which every house is entered, and the property of every person subjected to as much inspection and interference as the land of the Indian Ryot. Were there no excise in England, it would be necessary to draw a greater revenue from the land, and to investigate its produce more narrowly. Land-rent is to the Indian, what the excise and customs are to English revenue; and hence it becomes necessary to give particular attention to it, and to employ a large establishment of servants, to secure every part of it that is justly due to Government.

10. The annual fluctuation in the amount of revenue has likewise been brought as an argument against the ryotwary system: but this fluctuation will never be so great as to cause any serious inconvenience. It would never, in any one year, exceed ten per cent. in an aggregate of six or eight collectorates, though it might be more in a single one. It would gradually diminish as the Ryots became proprietors, and would, in ten or twelve years, scarcely ever be above five per cent. As the inequality, too, would arise as often from an increase as a decrease of revenue, Government would lose nothing by it; and the deficiency, when it occurred, might always be provided for, either by reserving the surplus of former years, or by a loan.

11. I shall now proceed to state the manner in which I think a permanent ryotwary settlement in the Ceded Districts may be made. I shall then endeavour to shew, that it will yield as much revenue, on an average of years, as the zemindary system; and that, as it will also be more beneficial to the great body of the inhabitants, it ought to be adopted. The following articles contain the principles on which the settlement should be formed.—1st. The settlement shall be ryotwary.—2d. The amount of the settlement shall increase and decrease annually, according to the extent of the land in cultivation.—3d. A reduction of twenty-five per cent. on all land shall be made in the survey rate of assessment.—4th. An additional reduction in the assessment of eight per cent., or thirty-three per cent. in all, shall be allowed on all lands watered by wells, or by water raised by machinery from rivers and nullahs, provided the cultivators cultivators keep the wells or embankments (dirroas) in repair at their own expense. A similar reduction shall be allowed on the lands watered by small tanks, wherever the cultivators agree to bear the expense of repairs.—5th. Every Ryot shall be at liberty, at the end of every year, either to throw up a part of his land, or to occupy more, according to his circumstances; but whether he throw up or occupy, shall not be permitted to select, but shall take or reject proportional shares of the good and bad together.—6th. Every Ryot, as long as he pays the rent of his land, shall be considered as the complete owner of the soil, and shall be at liberty to let it to a tenant without any hesitation as to rent, and to sell it as he pleases.—7th. No remisssion shall bo made, on ordinary occasions, for bad crops or other accidents. Should failures occur, which cannot be made good from the property or land of the defaulters, the village in which they happen shall be liable for them, to the extent of ten per cent. additional on the rent of the remaining Ryots, but no farther.—8th. All unoccupied land shall remain in the hands of Government, and the rent of whatever part of it may be hereafter cultivated shall be added to the public revenue. —9th. All taxes on houses, shops, and professions, all duties, licenses, &c. shall belong exclusively to Government. The Ryot on whose land houses or shops may be built, shall not be entitled to receive a higher rent from them than the equivalent of the survey rent of the ground which they occupy.—10th. The repairs of all tanks, which are not rendered private property by an extra remission, or duswundum enam, shall be made at the expense of Government.—11th. Tuckavy shall be gradually discontinued.—12th. Potails, Curnums, and all other village servants, shall remain as heretofore under the Collector.—13th. Private creditors, who may distrain the property of Ryots, shall discharge the rent which may be due from such Ryots to Government, and shall give security for it before they begin the distraint.

12. It may appear, at first sight, that a reduction of twenty-five per cent. will occasion a heavy loss of revenue; but I imagine that it will not be greater than what has been suffered in all districts, where a permanent settlement has been effected. It is to be considered, that the decrease of revenue will not be proportionate to the reduction of twenty-five per cent., because that reduction is not to be made on the average of former collections, but on the survey assessment, which never has been, nor ever can be completely realized, as long as there are bad crops and poor Ryots. In the Board's letter of the 27th of December 1804, the average profit to the owners of estates in settled districts is estimated at fifteen and a quarter per cent., but it is not explained whether the profit is upon the land-rent only, or upon the land-rent and village taxes. I shall suppose, however, that it is restricted to the land-rent, and calculated upon an average of preceding years, and examine whether the reduction of twenty-five per cent. upon the survey assessment will cause a greater diminution of revenue than a remission of fifteen and a quarter per cent. upon the average of former collections.

13. This is the amount that would probably be in favour of the ryotwary system during the first two or three years: from the third to the fifth year the increase from new cultivation and low rented lands would be a lack of pagodas; from the fifth to the seventh year it would be a lack more; and by the tenth it would have amounted in all to about three lacks. It may be said, that such calculations calculations are uncertain. I am confident, however, that the estimate is not too high; because, as the cultivation increased nearly one half from 1810 to 1815, notwithstanding the gradual raising of the rent by the survey, there can be no doubt that when the rent is lowered twenty-five per cent., that cultivation will still continue to extend rapidly, though perhaps, from the inadequacy of the population, not in the same extraordinary degree as before; because there are now actually in cultivation lands lately taken from the waste, paying sixty thousand pagodas less than the fixed assessment, which sum will be added to the jumma in the course of four or five years, but could not without the proposed remission, as in that case the Ryots would, whenever the new land came to the full rent, throw up an equal quantity of the old, from want of the means of paying for both; and because the reduction of rent would facilitate the employment of many additional hands in agriculture. If a permanent zemindarry or mootahdarry settlement of the land-rent is now made, it will amount, as has already been stated, to....................Star Pagodas 10,21,050.

If a ryotwarry one is made, by remitting twenty-five per cent. it will amount to 11,15,608

If it is even allowed, that the net revenue from both these sums will be nearly the same, in consequence of the superior expense of the ryotwarry system, yet the zemindarry rent will be no more ten years hence that it is now, while the ryotwarry will in that time have risen about three lacks of pagodas, and there will be a difference in its favour equal to nearly a third of the whole land-rent. As the object is great, and as no mischief can arise from making the experiment, it ought certainly to be tried. The result would most likely shew, that one-fourth or one third more land-rent might have been derived from all the districts permanently settled, and that a similar increase may be expected from all those which are yet unsettled. This increase would take place with the present population; but it would, of course, become still greater as the population augmented. The highness of the land-rent is in this country the chief obstacle to the increase of population. A remission of rent in favour of a few Zemindars or Mootahdars would be no remedy for the evil; but a remission to the Ryots, by enabling them to extend their cultivation and augment the produce of food for their families, would in a great measure do it away. Were it not for the pressure of the land-rent, population ought to advance more rapidly in India than in America; because the climate is more favourable, and because there are every where great tracts of good land uncultivated, which may be ploughed at once, without the labour and expense of clearing away forests. As there are above three millions of acres of this description in the Ceded Districts, it cannot be doubted that a very considerable addition will be made, in twenty or twenty-five years, to the population, and also to the land-rent, beyond the highest estimate which has been made of it.

14. The profit to the land-owners in the Salem Districts is sixteen and one-third per cent., which is one and one-third per cent. more than I have deducted from the average collections of the Ceded Districts. As the assessment is, perhaps, higher in them than even in Salem, I might in the preceding comparison have deducted sixteen and one-third in place of fifteen per cent. from the average, and shewn an additional amount of one and one-third per cent. in favour of ryotwarry. This difference may, however, be left to counterbalance any error into which I may have fallen, in estimating the charges collection of settled districts, from not having any statement of them for my guidance.

15. Though the revenue at first should be the same, or should be even greater, under the mootahdarry than under the ryotwarry system, yet the mootahdarry has this advantage, that the revenue is limited at once, and cannot grow with the resources of the country; whereas, in the ryotwarry, it keeps exact pace with them, rising or falling as there is more or less cultivation. It is no loss on the whole to Government, and must be much easier for the Ryots, while they have so little property, that this fluctuation should continue; for they cultivate most when the season is favourable, and Government thus draws from the country the greatest revenue in those years when the gross produce is the greatest: and the land-rent of India may be said to resemble, in this respect, the principal sources of British revenue, the excise and customs, which increase or diminish yearly with the commerce of the nation, the fund from which they are derived. The public ought certainly to be regulated, in some degree, by the private revenue of the country: but nothing can be more contrary to this principle than the mootahdarry system; for it fixes the public demand now, which must remain the same thirty or forty years hence, whatever addition may have been made to private property in that time. It does not accommodate itself to the circumstances of the country; and because it cannot raise the revenue hereafter, it makes it too high at first, as in the Baramahl and other districts, whose whole resources have been brought to light by survey, and in order to realize this revenue it is obliged to authorize the Mootahdars, or middle men, to exact the former high rents from the Ryots. On the other hand, the ryotwarry system enables the public to advance with the private revenue, as long as there is any waste land in the country: and in doing this it adapts itself perfectly to the means of the inhabitants; for there can be no juster measure of their means than the decrease or increase of cultivation. It also, by making the remission upon the assessment of the land, gives the whole of it at once to the Ryots; and by enabling them to raise more food for the maintenance of their families, facilitates the increase of population, the occupancy of waste for its subsistence, and the augmentation of revenue. The assessment of lands formerly cultivated, and of waste never cultivated, amounts to Star Pagodas 10,10,842. It would be idle to imagine that the whole can ever be brought into cultivation; but I am persuaded that nearly all the land formerly cultivated, amounting to Star Pagodas 5,55,962, together with a considerable portion of the waste, will be occupied in the course of twenty-five years.

16. The increase of cultivation will, however, have no sensible effect in augmenting the size of farms, and thereby lessening the detail of collection. The farms will probably always remain as at present, comprehending all sizes, from five acres to fifteen hundred, and paying from one to a thousand pagodas. Their enlargement is prevented at present by the want of property, and will be prevented hereafter by its division. In the Ceded Districts and throughout the Deccan, the Ryot has little or no property in land: he has no possessory right, he does not even claim it. He is so far from asserting either a proprietary or a possessory right, that he is always ready to relinquish his land and take some other, which he supposes is lighter assessed. All land is supposed to revert to Government at the end of every year, to be distributed as it may think proper, and land is accordingly sometimes taken from one Ryot and given to another who is willing to pay a higher rent. If this power is exercised with caution, it is not from the fear of violating any possessory right, but of losing revenue; for the assessment is generally so high, that if the Ryot is dispossessed, the same rent can seldom be got from a new one. The only assessed land that is not annually at the disposal of Government is that which pays a quit-rent, and is either enams that were formerly free, or ground belonging to tanks and wells, constructed at the expense of individuals, who are on that account allowed a remission from one-fifth to one-half of the rent. Even in this case, however, private property in land has always been viewed with so much jealousy, that instead of a permanent quit-rent, it has been much more usual to allow the person who digs the tank or well to hold the land-rent free, until he is reimbursed for all his expenses and labour, and then to regard it as Government land, and assess it at the full rate. The Ryot of India unites in his own person the characters of labourer, farmer, and landlord. He receives the wages of the labourer, the profit of the farmer on his stock, and a small surplus, from one to twenty per cent. of the gross produce as rent, but on an average not more than five or six per cent. The smallness of this surplus prevents him from letting his land to an under-tenant, because the rent would not be equal to his subsistence, and also because no tenant would give him even this rent; for as there is every where plenty of good land lying uncultivated, which any person may occupy on paying the sirkar rent, it is evident that no Ryot will hold land of another, and pay an addition of five or six per cent. upon the sirkar rent, when he may get land of the same kind without paying any such increase. As long, therefore, as Government have uncultivated land of a tolerably good quality to dispose of, Ryots can have no tenants; and hence there never has been in India, with the exception of a very few districts, any class of land-owners receiving their rents from tenants. The tendency of the Indian system of casts, and laws of inheritance, always has been, and must be, to keep land divided into small portions among the Ryots, and to make the same person labourer, farmer, and landlord. Why then attempt to subvert an ancient system, which places the great body of the Ryots above want, renders them industrious, frugal, and comfortable, and preserves the simplicity of their manners and their respect for public authority? But it has been said, that there can be no proper subordination without just gradations of rank in society, and that Zemindars are required in Indian society to accomplish this desirable end. But, this opinion is completely contradicted by experience; for there is no people on earth among whom there is greater subordination than among the Hindoos, who never saw proprietary Zemindars until they were created by the Company's Government.

Indian

17. The plan which I have proposed for forming a permanent ryotwarry settlement is so plain, that it can require no further elucidation, except with regard to house-rent, which ought undoubtedly to remain under the immediate direction of the Collector, as a source of increasing revenue. The tax which is generally denominated house-rent is more properly a tax upon income. In the case of labourers and other poorer orders of the inhabitants, where it does not exceed one or two rupees, it may be called house-rent; but even here it is rather a tax upon income, equal to the produce of a certain number of days' labour, for the house or hut itself is probably not worth more than five or ten rupees. In the case of weavers and other tradesmen, it is usually termed a professional tax; but as the weaver is rated according to the estimated produce of his loom and the number that he employs, the tax is evidently upon his income: and in the case of merchants, who often pay a tax of fifty pagodas for a house which would not sell for so much, the tax is clearly an income one, and is so considered by themselves. There is no difficulty in fixing the amount of the tax with regard to labourers and tradesmen: but it is not so easy to ascertain it with respect to merchants, who though they are supposed to be assessed in some places at fifteen or twenty per cent. of their income, in others pay little or nothing. Under the native governments there were many reasons for this indulgence. The merchants usually supplied, without payment, the demands of the revenue servants for clothes and other articles: they were also obliged to furnish at a low rate whatever articles were required for the public service, and to take the sirkar share of the crops, damaged stores, &c. at ten per cent. above the market price; and also, in times of exigency, to pay occasional contributions. These demands having ceased under the Company's Government, there can be no reason for the merchants being more favoured in one place than another, or for their not being every where assessed in the same proportion as the other classes of the inhabitants. It would be vexatious to attempt to discover the income of individuals: but a tolerable estimate of the aggregate income of the merchants of a district may be made from accounts of the exports and imports, the population, the produce and consumption, and the usual profits of trades; and fifteen per cent. upon the sum resulting from these calculations might be imposed upon the merchants, leaving them to distribute it in detail, according to the income of the several individuals. In the district of Roydroog, where the house-tax is higher than in other parts of the Ceded Provinces, and where it is supposed to be about fifteen per cent. upon income, a new distribution was made last year by the merchants and shopkeepers themselves. The total sum was not increased, because it was already sufficiently high; but the shares of many individuals were reduced one half, and those of others doubled and quadrupled. A few of the principal merchants from all the chief trading towns of the Ceded Provinces were at the same time assembled: they were informed that the house or income tax would be raised, and were directed to state, not what their income was, but what the rate of the tax upon it was in their respective districts compared to Roydroog. They debated among themselves for several weeks, and at last produced a statement, to which they all agreed, as containing the fair rates of their districts. The Roydroog merchants, who were present, took care to see that the neighbouring districts were rated as high as their own, in order to prevent any additional assessment from falling upon themselves. The tax might by the same process be extended to every place where it is not yet established, and make a considerable addition to the public revenue. An idea of this increase may be formed from comparing the house-rent of the Ceded Provinces with that of the richer provinces below the Ghauts.

Where merchants are exempted from this income tax, they contribute little more to revenue than common labourers: they pay no direct taxes, and those which they pay indirectly on betel, tobacco, cloth, &c. are very trifling. It is contrary to every just principle of taxation, that the richer should be more lightly assessed than the poorer classes of the people; and as no additional demand can be made upon them, if the house-tax is permanently included in the land-rent, it ought certainly to be kept separate, in order that it may yield an increasing revenue as the circumstances of the country improve.

18. I have proposed that villages shall, in ordinary cases of failure, be liable to an extra assessment of ten per cent. This will, I am convinced, on all common occasions be sufficient. There is also in many places another source from which deficiencies may be made up. In many villages the enams of the Potails and Curnums are equal to a fifth, a fourth, and even to a third of the sirkar revenue. By far the greater part of these enams has unquestionably never been authorized; for where there are sunnuds the enam scarcely ever exceeds five per cent., and where it is more, it was always under the native governments made liable for deficiencies in the village. I would recommend, that the same principle shall still be adopted to a certain extent: that in villages not exceeding 250 pagodas rent, the enams of the Potail and Curnum respectively shall be free, as far as ten per cent. of the village rent, and that the whole of their excess above this rate shall be liable for deficiencies: that in villages from 250 to 500 pagodas rent, the enams shall be free as far as seven and a half per cent., and their excess above this rate be liable for failures; and that in villages above 500 pagodas, the enams shall be free as far as five per cent., and the excess liable for losses. Though the revenue under a ryotwarry system must annually fluctuate with the extent of cultivation, yet it is not necessary that any abatement should be allowed for losses upon the actual cultivation; for all such losses easily may, and ought to be made good, in the first instance, by the excess in the Potail's and Curnum's enams above the usual standard, and where this excess does not exist, by an extra assessment upon the Ryots. This extra assessment is limited to ten per cent.; but it will scarcely ever amount to half so much, and it will seldom be requisite to have recourse to it at all.

At the end of four years, the land-rent would have risen at least a lack of pagodas, and the revenue would then be 15,50,000; and at the end of ten or fifteen years the land-rent would probably have increased to such a degree as to make up for the original remission, and the revenue would then be from seventeen and a half to eighteen lacks of pagodas. It is one advantage of the ryotwarry system, that it leaves room for the land-rent to increase with the population and wealth of the country; and it is another, that by making the remission every where equal, it will fix the Ryots to their several farms as proprietors, instead of keeping them, as hitherto, for ever unsettled, without attachment to their lands, without any wish to improve them, and wandering from one zemindarry or mootah to another in quest of more favourable terms. As long as the public exigencies require a high revenue, the present assessment may be realized, after making the usual allowances for bad seasons, &c. When Government is in a situation to relinquish a part of its demand, the proposed remission is that which would place the Ceded Districts on an equality with those provinces where the permanent settlement has already been established. It would, in the mean time, however, be advisable to grant the remission without delay to wells, in order to induce the Ryots to repair them, for it is chiefly by the cultivation of well-lands that the country is secured against scarcity.

20. But whatever mode of settlement may be finally adopted, the inhabitants, but particularly the Ryots, must suffer great inconvenience, and even distress, from the judicial regulations as they now stand. The evils which they are likely to increase rather than to diminish, are delay, vexation, bribery, wrong decisions. The delay will necessarily arise from the forms which not only the judge but the native Commissioners must adhere to in their proceedings, and from all the principal, and a great part of even the petty suits being brought before the judge. This delay is not to be estimated by the number of causes which may, at any period, remain undecided; because there may be a still greater number kept back and never brought into court at all, from the parties despairing of ever getting them adjusted there. In petty suits, the judge may dispense with the making the depositions of witnesses a matter of record; but it does not appear that this power is extended to Commissioners. It would, perhaps, be better that it should be so, in order to expedite decisions; for justice can hardly be said to be administered, when it proceeds so slowly as not to keep pace, in any degree, with the demands of the country.

21. All classes of the inhabitants will be exposed to great vexations, from being liable to be summoned to the Zillah Court stations in every trifling suit, and to be detained there a long time. But the Ryots will be the greatest sufferers; because, by being called away to a great distance from their villages during the season of cultivation, they will often be exposed to a heavy loss in their crops, from the seed not being sown at the proper time. Many of them would rather pay a small sum, even though it were not justly due, than be obliged to leave their farms at so important a period. It would be a great relief to them to obtain an interval, from the middle of May to the beginning of October, during which they should not be compellable to attend the Zillah Court, or to be absent more than two days from home upon the summons of any commissioners. This would, no doubt, retard the business of the court at its principal station; but the court, instead of remaining fixed, might at this time of the year be at least as well employed in making a circuit of the zillah, by which the judge would be enabled to learn the conduct of the Commissioners, and to hear and settle appeals from their decisions upon the spot.

22. Bribery will be more general than formerly; because the distribution of justice being in the hands of fewer persons, concealment will be easier; and because those persons being worse paid, will be more open to corruption. The native Commissioners will not have allowances equal to those of Tehsildars, their procedings will be more private as they will not be watched by the numerous servants of a district cutcherry, and they will therefore have both a stronger inducement to betray their trust, and a greater facility in eluding detection.

 Erroneous

Reports, &c. from Collectors, on a Ryotwar Settlement.

23. Erroneous decisions will be more frequent; because almost every suit, instead of being determined, as heretofore, by a punchayet, will come before the judge, who however intelligent he may be, cannot be half so well qualified as a native jury to appreciate the characters of parties and witnesses, and to distinguish between true and false evidence. There is such a strange mixture of fraud and honesty in the natives of India, and even in the same individual in different circumstances, that none but a native can, on many occasions, penetrate the motives from which such opposite conduct arises. The numerous petty dealings constantly going on with comparatively very few disputes, the frequency of depositing money and valuable articles without any kind of voucher, and the general practice of lending money without any receipt or document but the accounts of the parties, manifest a high degree of mutual confidence, which can originate only in a conviction of the probity of each other. But, on the other hand, every native will perjure himself in every litigation respecting water, boundaries of villages, and privileges of cast. In all these cases he never speaks the truth; unless from the accident of its being on the side which he conceives himself bound to espouse. He will also perjure himself (not uniformly indeed, yet with little hesitation) in favour of a relation, a friend, or an inhabitant of the same village, and even of persons in whose welfare he has apparently no concern. These causes added to bribery, render perjury so common, that scarcely any dependence can be placed upon evidence unless where it is supported by collateral proofs. The number of witnesses, and even their general character, is therefore of less consequence than an acquaintance with those particular customs and prejudices by which their evidence is likely to be biassed. The judge must always be inferior to a native in knowledge of this kind; he will likewise be deficient in language. He never can be so much master of it as to follow and detect the minute points by which truth and falsehood are often separated. The voice of a witness, the manner, the mode of expression, the use of words of a less positive though often similar sense,—all these must be beyond the reach of an European, whose knowledge of an Indian language can never extend to such niceties. The judge must, therefore, often require explanation from the officers of the court, and trust to their opinion. Where he forms a wrong one, there is little hope of his being enabled to correct it from any arguments that may be adduced by the pleaders; for these men will most probably agree among themselves and divide all fees, and care very little which of the parties in a suit is successful.

24. It is to be feared, that no complete remedy for these evils can be found; but the most effectual one would be to resort to the trial by jury, termed by the inhabitants punchayet, or subba, according to their respective languages. The judicial code in civil cases authorizes trial by referees, arbitrators, and munsifs; but it says nothing of trial by punchayet. It seems strange that this code, which has been framed expressly for the benefit of the natives, should omit entirely the only mode of trial which is general and popular among them, and regarded as fair and legal; for there can be no doubt that the trial by punchayet is as much the common law of India in civil matters, as that by jury is of England. No native thinks that justice is done where it is not adopted; and in appeals of causes formerly settled, whether under a native government or under that of the Company, previous to the establishment of the courts, the reason assigned in almost every instance was, that the decision was not given by a punchayet but by a public officer, or by persons acting under his influence or sitting in his presence. The native who has a good cause, always applies for a punchayet; while he who has a bad one seeks the decision of a Collector or a Judge, because he knows that it is easier to deceive them. It may be objected, that a punchayet has no fixed constitution; that the number of its members may vary from five to fifty, or even more; and that its verdicts are often capricious. But all these objections formerly lay against juries, and they might unquestionably be removed from punchayets by future improvements. The native Commissioners are so much restricted, and their proceedings so little to be suspended or reversed, that the whole administration of civil justice may be said to center in the person of a zillah judge, who though he may be endowed with the greatest talents and application, must ever remain but imperfectly acquainted with the language and customs of the people on whose rights he decides. A punchayet has greatly the advantage of the judge in those matters, and being less exposed to intrigue and bribery than the judge, of ascertaining

ascertaining the truth, and more willing than his officers to support it. It would be idle to expect that justice could be administered personally, by a single European, to a whole province or zillah. In every populous country, justice can be properly distributed only by means of the natives. If it is supposed that they cannot be made to dispense it to each other, it is still more unlikely that this can be accomplished by a stranger. The code has, however, imposed this task upon the zillah judge, evidently from the idea that the natives are not to be trusted. There is certainly no situation, in which a native can receive bribes with greater facility and less risk of discovery than in that of a commissioner; but the evil might be prevented, in a great measure, by obliging him to try all suits by a punchayet, where either of the parties required it. The natives surely cannot, with any foundation, be said to be judged by their own laws, while the trial by punchayet, to which they have always been accustomed, is done away. The code provides referees and arbitrators; but these are not what the native wants: he has, most probably, had recourse to them already, and when he comes forward to complain publicly he expects a punchayet. The rapacity of many of the native governments and their officers compelled the inhabitants, for their own sakes, to settle all disputes concerning property as secretly as possible, by the help of referees or arbitrators; but where these means failed, they were constrained to make the suit public, merely because a punchayet could not be assembled without the interposition of authority. They still proceed in this manner; and where the parties can agree about referees or arbitrators, they can generally obtain them without application to a court of justice. Punchayets will, no doubt, be occasionally influenced by corrupt motives, as well as the officers of a court of justice: but when this happens, it is better that the disgrace should fall on the punchayet than the court; for, in the one case, the inhabitants can only lament the depravity of their own morals, but in the other, the courts and the government by which they have been introduced will be rendered unpopular.

25. In the Ceded Districts, unless there is some modification of the process of recovering debts from the Ryots, it will be productive of great distress to them, and of considerable detriment to the public revenue. Almost every Ryot has an account with a bazar-man and a balance against him: this account often runs through two or three generations, and is rarely paid off entirely. It usually originates in a small advance by the bazar-man, who probably gives seventy or eighty rupees and takes a bond for a hundred, with interest at two and a half per cent. monthly: the Ryot, in return, makes payments in grain, cotton, and other articles, which are usually valued against him, and he receives occasionally from the bazar-man small sums for the discharge of his kists. After going on in this way for a number of years, the Ryot finds that, though he is continually paying, he is only getting deeper into debt. He is satisfied that he has paid as much, or more than he ought to have done, though from his ignorance of accounts he cannot exactly explain the particulars, because he does not know how to calculate interest upon his own repayments in kind; he therefore stops payment and begins to deal with another bazar-man. He is protected against distraint of his cattle and grain by the officers of the native government, for the sake of revenue; but if he carries any part of the produce of his land to a neighbouring village for sale, he is detained by his creditor, and he then applies for a punchayet. The punchayet goes back, as far as possible, into the dealings of the parties, values the Ryot's commodities at a fair price, allows him interest upon the amount, and should a balance still remain against him, directs him to pay it, but if none, cancels the bond or other vouchers of the creditor. It does not consider a claim as valid, merely because it is founded upon a recent bond; because it knows that a Ryot who is in immediate want of a small advance of cash, will come to a settlement of accounts and acknowledge a balance, of which not one-tenth is fairly due. This was the process which usually took place between the Ryot and his creditor in the Ceded Districts, under both the native and Company's Government, before the introduction of the judicial system: but now the creditor has only to produce a recent bond, or an old one that has been in a train of payment; an order for distraint instantly follows, and a Ryot who has always paid, and would all his life pay a rent of one or two hundred rupees, is at once stripped of his cattle, grain, and implements of husbandry, and will most likely never again rise above the rank of common labourer. The judicial code, in this instance, supports the most most artful against the most simple class of the inhabitants; for it gives to the creditor a power of distraint, which he neither had nor looked for at the time the debt was contracted. I am aware that fraudulent debtors can be compelled to pay only by distraint; but yet it does not seem to be altogether just, that the regulation should have a retrospective effect, and place the creditor on a better, and the debtor on a worse footing than they respectively were before. I would therefore propose, that in all claims for debts of an earlier date than that of the introduction of the Zillah Courts, distraints shall never be permitted to extend to seed, grain, or to the implements or cattle employed in husbandry; and that in all distraints for debts, whether contracted before or after that period, the rent of Government shall always be discharged, before the private creditor can receive any part of the proceeds. Wherever an individual distrains the property of a Ryot who has not paid his rent, the debt is in fact paid by Government; for no rent is ever recovered from a Ryot who has suffered distraint. As the Ryot does not pay his first kist to Government until the sixth month of the fusily year, by which time he has often realized the whole or the greatest part of the crop, it is obvious that the private creditor, by distraining at this period, may always seize for his own use the produce destined for the payment of the public revenue.

26. Some regulation appears to be necessary for annulling all claims derived from tunkhas, or assignments, granted by the native governments upon the revenue. It was the practice of the officers of the Nizam and other native powers, to keep their troops and sebundy in arrears, and grant them tunkhas on the country for the amount, and also to issue them to their private creditors: but only a very small part of these claims was ever paid; for the revenue assigned was either already collected, or orders were dispatched to reject the tunkha entirely, or to pay only a trifling portion of it. If the Tunkhadars became clamorous and turbulent, they were discharged from the service; and if they submitted patiently, and were satisfied with such small sums as they occasionally recovered in the villages, this resource seldom lasted long, for a new set of officers usually arrived the following year, who instantly did away all the tunkhas of their predecessors, because they knew that the money for which they were issued was charged as disbursed in their accounts. In 1800, when the Ceded Districts were delivered over by the Nizam's officers to my charge, the same rule was followed, of stopping all payments on account of tunkhas. It may be thought that no judge will give a decree in favour of a tunkha holder, and that interference is therefore unnecessary. If tunkhas were produced in support of claims, the matter might safely be left to the discretion of the judge; but it is not tunkhas but bonds which are brought forward; and as these bonds are in the same form as those commonly given for private debts, and are of a recent date, and have in some cases been in a train of payment, they are by the regulations perfectly valid, though the sums for which they were granted were long ago collected by the officers of Government. When a person having a tunkha applied to the Aumildar to whom it was directed, the Aumildar sent for one or two more Potails of villages, divided the amount of the tunkha upon them, and made them give to the holder their separate bonds for their respective shares. If the tunkha was upon a Potail, he sent for a number of Ryots, and directed them to give bonds for different sums, according to their rent, to the tunkha holder; but as the rent nominally destined for the discharge of the bonds was usually collected by the public officers, and as the bonds increased in number every year, the amount of those unpaid when the country was ceded was probably equal to several lacks of pagodas. If these bonds are allowed to be good by the courts of justice, it is evidently the same thing as if Government were to discharge the arrears of the Nizam's troops. I have reason to believe, that some payments have lately been made on account of such bonds; and I know, from the representations of several Ryots, that they have been threatened by the holders with prosecution, and that a considerable degree of alarm has in consequence been excited. It would, therefore, be advisable, that all bonds given by Potails and Ryots, by order of their superiors, should be annulled by authority, and that this act should be made known to the inhabitants by proclamation.

I have, &c.

Reports, &c. from Collectors, on a Ryotwar Settlement.

No. 5.—Instructions of Collector of Southern Division of Arcot to his Sub-Collectors, on the Mode of conducting a Ryotwar Settlement; enclosed in his Report, dated 1st July 1806.

Gentlemen:

Par. 1. You were some time since furnished for your general guidance with my instructions to Tehsildars, relative to repairs of tanks, the distribution of tuccavy, and the jummabundy of the current fusily. On the two former subjects, I have already offered such remarks as appear to me most necessary: my present object is to furnish you with a few on the latter, and some other points.

2. From all I can learn, which is corroborated by all I have seen, no doubt remains in my mind but that the assessment in this soubah is, in most cases, far too high; and that the revenue realized from the country, since it was ceded to the honourable Company, has very materially injured its permanent resources, and reduced the lesser inhabitants to a state of poverty, very much to be deplored.

3. The lamentable influence of the Gramatans of villages over the lesser Ryots, from whom they have always been in the habit of extorting considerable sums above the circar demand, was a ruinous evil under the late Government; and the continuance of it in this has certainly contributed to reduce the Ryots to their present state.

4. The great difficulty of collection; the desertion of villages in part, and wholly; the artifices practised by the inhabitants, to avoid payment of their rents and conceal the public revenue; the miserable appearance of most villages, a great portion of the inhabited houses of which are without roofs, and of the inhabitants, a great number of whom are clothed in the garb of extreme misery, with many other marks which strike the eye of a traveller, and must touch the heart of one who has any spark of sensibility or feeling for his fellow creatures; are sufficient proofs of the opinion before urged on the state of the country.

5. That many inhabitants of comparatively affluent circumstances have seceded, and others have joined in the frauds lately committed, merely with the view of profiting by the confusion created thereby, and avoiding the payment of their rents, I have no doubt; and where is the country in which there are not such people, always ready to support a popular cause of complaint, in the hope of aggrandizing themselves? The lesser inhabitants, as is always the case, have profited less than their leaders: but that they have profited is equally certain; and it is only thereby, that many of them have found means to pay the revenue that has been realized from them.

6. Wherever a tax is such, that the thing or property it is levied on will not yield a sufficiency, after paying the tax, to recompence the owner for all expenses incurred in taking care of it, and yield him a fair remuneration for his trouble, he must either give it up altogether, or supply the deficiency by fraud.

7. The mode of making the settlement last year (and nearly the same has, I believe, been observed in all former ones) is not calculated, in my opinion, to correct existing evils, to ascertain the actual resources of the country, the circumstances of the inhabitants, or to do justice to the lesser Ryots who are so much in need of it.

8. In a new unsettled country, the assembling the Curnums of four or five talooks at one place, for the purpose of drawing out the jummabundy accounts, even if they are superintended by the Collector, cannot prevent the exercise of many abuses, which might otherwise be checked; but when the superintendence is left to a native, in whom little or no confidence can be placed, the plan will rather tend to perpetuate than extirpate existing evils. The recurrences of last year sufficiently prove the latter position.

9. The corrupt and fraudulent conduct of the Curnums is well known; and yet it is on the word of these people only, that the settlements have hitherto been grounded. It is true, surveyors have been employed to check their accounts; but it is equally true, that where they have proved false, in the proportion tion of more than one hundred and fifty per cent., the surveyors have not discovered one per cent.

10. The plan is equally injurious to many of the Ryots; for as the Curnums' accounts of cultivation are too frequently written from memory, instead of on the spot, I have found, in numerous instances, many more cawnies entered than were actually cultivated, many as reaped that never were, many as nunjee that have turned out punjee, and many totacal which have turned out nunjee.

11. The Tehsildars, with their cutcherries, instead of being a check on the Curnums; instead of being caused to make regular circuits of their villages, to excite the Ryots to extend their cultivation, to ascertain their circumstances, to alleviate them, to learn the resources of their districts, and how they can best be improved; instead of causing the Curnums to accompany them on their village tour, and take the cultivation accounts on the spot, the correctness of which the Tehsildars would then have the best opportunity of ascertaining, by inquiry among the Ryots, or by ocular demonstration if necessary, have hitherto been confined to the mere business of collection.

12. Hence arises that want of energy, that deplorable negligence, shameful ignorance, and in some cases, corruption, for which the generality of the Tehsildars and other native servants are so remarkable in this soubah. I have met with very few who know any other village than their cusbah, who know any thing of the resources of their districts, or who can give a satisfactory answer to any question relative thereto.

13. Till the survey and valuation of all the lands in the country are finished, we must content ourselves with correcting the most prominent evils, by such means as are afforded us.

14. The instructions lately sent to the Tehsildars have been framed with this view. They are thereby, you will perceive, strictly enjoined to do every thing I have remarked in the eleventh paragraph that they have hitherto neglected to do. They ought now, therefore, to be on a circuit, distributing tuccavy according to the wants of the Ryots, taking engagements from them to cultivate to the full extent of their means, and performing such other duties as are enjoined them; before the huzzoor cutcherry proceeds on circuit, they are directed to make a second circuit, in order to see how far the Ryots have fulfilled their engagements.

15. When they have thus prepared their accounts, I propose (and wish you to do the same) to make a circuit of every talook under my immediate management, and conclude the settlement myself. I mean not to ground it on the village accounts only, however diligently they may have been superintended by the Tehsildars; but I mean to check them by the presence of every cultivator in the talook, who will be examined as to the quantity of land he has agreed to take, and who will be told at the time what he is to pay; therefore, if he has then any fair objections to make, they will be attended to, but not afterwards.

16. Such is the present indolence, as well as ignorance of the generality of Tehsildars, that I have little hope of their executing the orders sent them with any degree of vigour, unless they are stimulated thereto by your presence in the talooks. I wish you, therefore, with that view, to make a tour of your districts without loss of time; and when you have finished it, to report the progress the Tehsildars are making, with any other remarks you may deem worthy of communicating.

17. The plan of making a distinct settlement with every individual cultivating land, appears, at first, a most arduous undertaking. It is so on its introduction; but the benefits arising from it are so numerous, that in the end you will find it save much trouble. I speak of it from experience, having practised it for five years.

18. It tends, more than any thing, to give the lesser Ryots a confidence in those who govern them, and to render them independent of the Curnums and heads of villages, at whose mercy they have hitherto lived. It gives them an opportunity

opportunity of stating any injustice which may have been practised towards them by those people, either in the classing or assessing their lands, the truth or otherwise of which can be ascertained immediately, by confronting the parties and examining the accounts. It gives the fairest opportunity of proving the zeal and other merits of the Tehsildars; and what is by no means the least material benefit, it gives us, as Collectors, a greater insight into the actual state of the country and circumstances of the inhabitants, than can be obtained in any other way.

19. The lesser Ryot, by learning at the time what he is to pay to Government, will soon learn to resist any extra demand made on him; and by knowing that a settlement will be made with him in the Collector's presence, when he will have an opportunity of stating any fair objections thereto, will enter on the labours of cultivation with a degree of confidence and pleasure, he has never yet experienced in this soubah.

20. The frauds hitherto practised by the Curnums will be in a great degree prevented. They will, in the first place, be checked by the Tehsildar, who, if he does his duty (which it is our business to cause him to do) will be able to detect most abuses on the spot; but such as escape him will most probably be discovered by the Collector's cutcherry, with the assistance of a few examiners, who should be sent to every suspected village. Persons discovered, in consequence, to have committed frauds, should meet with instantaneous punishment, which will tend, more than any thing, to prevent their repetition.

21. By the cowle namah circulated through the country, the teerwa on all cultivated land, at present so highly assessed, will be reduced to a standard that will at least give the Ryot a trifling interest in the cultivation of it, though not so great a one as he ought to have. The terms, however, on which he will thereby be permitted to cultivate waste land, will render his interest, on the whole, better than it has ever yet been; and will, I have no doubt, tend to cause a very considerable increase of cultivation in this at present desert country.

22. The satisfaction this cowle appears already to have afforded, satisfies me that the effects of it will be extremely beneficial to Government as well as its subjects. The latter, seeing our attention to their circumstances, and our wish to render the country prosperous, will have reason to rejoice in the change of government; and finding they can exist without it, will cease, in a great measure, from resorting to those artifices lately practised by them.

23. The cowle namah is meant for your general, rather than your particular guidance: many instances will probably occur, in which you may see reason to deviate from it. In any trifling case, I beg you will exercise your own discretion; but I desire the general principles of it may not be materially altered without a reference to me.

24. I most particularly exhort you to let moderation be your guide in the whole progress of your settlement. In a case of doubt, as to what ought to be a Ryot's assessment, your decision should incline, if any thing, in his favour. The numerous arguments to be urged in favour of a moderate assessment are, to my judgment, incontrovertible. The flourishing state of those few districts that are blessed with one sufficiently prove its benefits.

25. The effects of our inclining to moderation will be beneficial to the circumstances of the Ryot; and which are better, he will increase his cultivation, and thence the revenue of Government. There can never be any difficulty in drawing any exuberance of wealth from him, should he ever be so fortunate as to possess it; on the contrary, by being too hard on him, we may most materially injure the resources of the country: by over-assessing him one year, we may prevent his contributing to Government for many afterwards. How frequently this has been the case already in this soubah you must well know. Increase of revenue, from increase of cultivation, not from an enhanced assessment, and increase of happiness and prosperity to the inhabitants and the country, should go hand in hand. If the former is obtained by a sacrifice of the latter, we defeat our aim, and prove ourselves most unworthy labourers in the field we toil in.

Reports, &c. from Collectors, on a Ryotwar Settlement.

26. At the same time I wish you to incline to moderation, I cannot sufficiently warn you against the artifices practised to deceive us. I am satisfied that frauds will decrease as the circumstances of the people improve. But wherever they do happen, it will be our business to discover them; and not to punish the whole on account of the misconduct of a few.

27. In concluding these remarks, I must remind you, that success depends more on our vigilant superintendance than any thing else. The most unexceptionable orders that can be framed will have little effect without it. The native officers in this soubah, in particular, either cannot or will not act under them, with any degree of activity, unless they know they are diligently watched, and that their continuing to hold their situation depends on their success, and the consequent approbation of their superiors. Much is expected of us. The result of our exertions will shew how far we are worthy of the trust reposed in us. The facility, or otherwise, with which we realize our jummabundy, and the improvement, or otherwise, which at the same time takes place in the revenues of the country, and its general prosperity, will prove with what degree of ability we have made it.

I am, &c. &c.

No. 6.—Report from the Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts to the Board of Revenue, on the Survey of that Country, dated the 26th of July 1807.*

Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

Gentlemen:

Par. 1. The survey of the Ceded Districts being now completed, it becomes my duty to report to the Board the manner in which it has been conducted; the result of it, in exhibiting the extent and assessment of all the various descriptions of land in the country, whether cultivated or waste; and the expense with which it has been attended, from its beginning to its conclusion.

2. It was begun in June 1802, by four Gomastahs of my cutcherry, who were, at that time, the only persons in the Ceded Districts who understood land-measuring. It proceeded very slowly at first, from the want of hands; but several of the inhabitants being instructed every month, the number of surveyors, by the end of the year, amounted to fifty, and was, in the course of the following one, augmented to a hundred. The surveyors were, at first, formed into parties of six, but afterwards of ten, to each of which a head surveyor or inspector was appointed. With the exception of hills and rocks, all land, of whatever kind, was measured. All roads, sites of towns and villages, beds of tanks and rivers, wastes and jungles, were included in the survey. Ancient wastes were usually measured in extensive lots, to be subdivided hereafter as they may be occupied; but when it could be conveniently done, they were also frequently divided into fields of the ordinary size. As all fields that have ever been cultivated have names, they were distinguished in the survey registers by these names, and also by a particular number affixed to each, in the order in which it was measured. The surveyors used every where the same standard measure, a chain of thirty-three feet, forty of which made an acre. They were paid by the acre, at such a rate as it was supposed would enable them, with diligence, to earn about six pagodas monthly. They were encouraged to be expeditious, by the hope of gain; and deterred, at the same time, from being inaccurate through haste, by the fear of dismission: for no false measurement beyond ten per cent. in dry land, and five per cent. in wet, whether proceeding from negligence, from haste or design, was ever excused; and the frequent instances of loss of employment on this account, that occurred during the early part of the survey, soon rendered the surveyors so cautious, that their measurement was afterwards in general sufficiently correct. The vacancies that were continually happening among them from dismission, and more frequently from sickness, were at all times easily filled up from among a number of persons who always attended them, with the view of being instructed and employed; but these persons, on being appointed, were, in order to guard against 'against partiality, sent to the party of a head surveyor, different from that by whom they had been reported as qualified.

3. The head surveyors, or inspectors, examined the measurement of the surveyors placed under their charge. They were paid by the month. To have paid them by the acre, would have defeated the end of their appointment, by preventing them from examining, carefully and deliberately, the operations of the under surveyors. But to guard against remissness, and to leave them at the same time sufficient leisure for investigation, they were required to measure monthly one-tenth of the quantity of land fixed for a surveyor. They were not permitted to make this measurement all at once, in the course of a few days; but were obliged to make it gradually and uniformly, throughout the month, by taking a few fields every day. The whole of the inspectors were frequently removed from one party to another, because by remaining too long with one party, they were apt to entertain partialities and enmities, and to pass over the false measurement of some surveyors, while they exaggerated the trifling errors of others; and for these causes, many inspectors were at different times dismissed. Both inspectors and surveyors were at first allowed a share of the produce of all extra collections and unauthorized enams which they brought to light; but as they often earned more in this way than by the survey, and with less labour, it was soon found that the survey was impeded by these investigations, and it therefore became necessary to confine them to the single object of measuring the land.

4. The surveyors were followed by assessors, two of whom were allotted for the assessment of the land measured by each party of ten surveyors. The assessor, on arriving in a village, went over the land with the Potail, Curnum, and Ryots, and arranged it in different classes, according to its quality. In all villages, the land, both wet and dry, had from ancient custom been divided into first, second, and third sorts, agreeably to their supposed respective produce; but these divisions not being sufficiently minute for a permanent assessment, the classes of wet land in a village were often increased to five or six, and those of dry to eight or ten. The classification was made rather by the Potail, Curnum, and Ryots than by the assessor; for he adopted their opinion, unless he saw evident cause to believe that it was wrong, when a reference was made to the head Ryots of any of the neighbouring villages, who fixed the class to which the land in dispute should belong. The quality of the land, where all other circumstances were equal, determined its class; but allowance was made for distance from the village, and every other incident by which the expense of cultivation was augmented. The Ryots were directed to be careful in classing the land, as the whole of any one class would be assessed at the same rate; but they were not told what that rate would be, because it was apprehended they would be induced, by such information, to enter a great deal of the better sort of land in the inferior classes. It was discovered, however, after a trial of a few months, that by following this mode, the Potails and Ryots, not seeing immediately the effects of classification, were not sufficiently impressed with its importance, and sometimes by entering too much land in the higher classes, and sometimes in the lower, the assessment of some villages became more than they could possibly pay, and that of others much less than they had ever paid before. To obviate this mischief, the lands were both classed and assessed at the same time, by which means the Ryots, perceiving at once the effect of classification in raising or lowering their own individual rents, felt the necessity of making it with care. After this principle was adopted, the classification was in general sufficiently accurate; except that, in some instances, the lands of Potails, Curnums, and a few head Ryots, were inserted in too low a class. These irregularities, however, were usually corrected, either on the spot by the assessor, with the advice of the Ryots of the adjacent villages, or afterwards, by persons appointed to revise his assessment.

5. As the assessors did not always rectify fraudulent classification, but sometimes remained ignorant of it from negligence, or connived at it from bribery, and as it was impossible to ensure from so many individuals a punctual observance of the same method of proceeding, it was thought advisable, for the sake of preserving uniformity and of checking abuses, to appoint five head assessors selected from the most intelligent of the ordinary assessors. Each head head assessor had four ordinary ones under him; his business was to review their classification and assessment, and to correct them when wrong. He looked particularly to the classification of the lands of such persons as he suspected might have been favoured by the assessors; and where he was convinced, both from his own opinion and that of the principal Ryots of the neighbouring villages, that partiality had been shewn, he transferred such lands to higher classes; and in the same manner, when he found that the lands of any Ryots were classed too high, he removed them to their proper classes. If he saw no occasion for changing land from one class to another, he examined whether whole classes were not assessed too high or low, and raised or depressed them to different rates, wherever it appeared that an alteration was necessary; but he was not permitted to make any alterations in the accounts of the ordinary assessor. Such alterations as he thought requisite were entered into those accounts, in columns left for that purpose; so that when the settlement came to be finally made in the Collector's cutcherry, all alterations might be seen, and the reasons examined upon which they were grounded. As an interval of one or two months usually elapsed between the investigation of the ordinary assessor and that of the head one, there was full time for every Ryot to ascertain whether his own land was properly classed: and if he thought that it was not, he had an opportunity of stating his objections to him on his arrival in the village; and as the Ryots of all the neighbouring villages were assembled, the head assessor, by means of arbitrators from among them, easily determined all complaints of this nature.

6. If entire dependence could have been placed on the judgment and impartiality of the head assessors, nothing more would have been required in fixing the assessment than to have adopted their estimates; but as these estimates were sometimes incorrect, and as they would have been still more so, had the assessors been relieved from the fear of a future examination, the whole of the classification and assessment underwent a complete investigation in the Collector's cutcherry. On this occasion, all the Potails, Curnums, and principal Ryots of every village in the district to be settled, were assembled at the cutcherry. The business was begun by fixing the sum which was to be the total revenue of the district. This was usually effected by the Collector in a few days, by comparing the collections under the native princes, under the Company's Government from its commencement, the estimates of the ordinary and head assessors, and the opinions of the most intelligent natives; and after a due consideration of the whole, adopting such a sum as it was thought would be the fair assessment of the district, in its present state, or what the inhabitants, in similar circumstances under a native government, would have regarded as somewhat below the usual standard. The amount fixed by the Collector was usually from five to fifteen per cent. lower than the estimates of the assessors; for it is the nature of assessment, proceeding from single fields to whole districts, and taking each field at its supposed average produce, to make the aggregate sum greater than what can be easily realized. After fixing a certain sum for the districts, it next remained to determine what share of this sum was to be imposed on each village. Had the detailed assessment been perfectly correct, it might have been done at once, by an uniform remission of five or ten per cent. to every field; but as this was always objected to by many of the inhabitants, who thought their lands were not so favourably assessed as those of their neighbours, either in the same or other villages, it therefore became necessary to examine again the assessment of every village. Such villages as claimed more than the average remission, were investigated by the principal Ryots of other villages; and each claim was admitted either fully, or with such modification as both parties agreed upon. The extra remission thus granted to one set of villages was to be deducted from another; and it was effected in the same manner, by employing the Ryots of other villages. After settling what proportion of the whole remission was to be allowed to each village, it still was necessary to ascertain whether, or not, any alteration was requisite in the classification of lands. In some villages, where none appeared to be necessary, and where no objections were made, the classification of the head assessor was confirmed, and the rent of each class, and consequently of each field, determined at once, by lowering their assessment by the rate of remission granted to the village. In those villages where complaints were made of the classification, the objections were examined; and if they were allowed allowed to be just by Ryots not interested in the matter, the necessary alterations were made. Complaints of whole classes being rated too high or too low, were much more frequent than those of particular fields being entered in a wrong class; because each Ryot, knowing the produce of his own and his neighbours' lands, took care to see, where their qualities were equal, that his own were not placed in a higher class by the assessors; but he was not so anxious about the rate at which the class was assessed, as he considered, that whatever it was, it would be as favourable to him as to others. Where some classes were rated too high or too low, it was usually owing to the Potail and Curnum of the village contriving to make the assessor under-rate the class which contained most of their own land, and over-rate some other one, composed principally of the land of the inferior Ryots. But as the Collector's cutcherry always inquired minutely into the assessment of the lands of the leading men in each village, and as the whole district was present at the discussion, and every man ready to prevent another from obtaining an advantage in which he did not himself share, no fraudulent assessment of any consequence could possibly be concealed.

7. The classification and assessment of the land having undergone three several investigations, by the assessor, head assessor, and Collector's cutcherry, and all objections having been heard, and admitted when well founded, nothing remained but to ascertain and register the rent of every field. This was an easy operation; for as each class of land had been already rated according to its quality, it was only to calculate the number of acres in the field by two, three, or four fanams, as the rate of the class might happen to be, to which it belonged. As this was a mere arithmetical process, it was performed by persons hired for the purpose, who were paid at the rate of one and a half cantary fanams for a hundred fields. They were superintended by two Gomastahs from the cutcherry; and when they had made out two copies of the register of fields, one for the Collector and the other for the Tehsildar, the survey of the district was closed for the time. It still, however, remained to ascertain by experiment, whether the assessment might not be too high in some cases. In the course of collecting the first year's survey rent, a list was made of such fields as were asserted by the cultivators to be over-rated. Their rent was, at the end of one year, again examined in the presence of the principal inhabitants, and either lowered or confirmed, as circumstances appeared to require. This was the last operation of the survey; and it usually occasioned a reduction of from one-half, to one and a half per cent. on the assessment. The equivalent might easily have been made up from lands which had been under-rated, for the assessment was as often below as above the proper point; but it was thought better, in this case, to make no alterations, lest it should weaken the confidence with which it was wished to impress the inhabitants in the permanency of the survey rent. The final correction above-mentioned has been made in all the districts which were settled by the survey rent in 1215; but in those districts where the survey rent was not established till 1216, and in those where it will not be introduced till 1217, the correction cannot be effected until 1217 in the one case, or until 1218 in the other. It will occasion a decrease of about 10,000 pagodas in the total assessment of the land inserted in the statement. The mode of measuring and assessing the land has been explained at so much length, that it can hardly be necessary to say more upon the subject; but should any further information be required, it will be more easily gathered from the accompanying copies (Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4) of instructions to surveyors and assessors, than from any description whatever.

8. The accompanying statement, No. 5,* contains an abstract of every thing that seems to be necessary in an agricultural survey. It shows the population, the number of cattle and sheep, and the extent and value of all land, cultivated and waste, and though unavoidably somewhat long, it is so plain that it may be easily understood from the slightest inspection; and I shall, therefore, have occasion to make only a few remarks upon the principal heads.

9. When I transmitted to the Board, on the 24th August 1802, an abstract of the population of the country, I was convinced that it was greatly underrated: but I took no immediate measures to ascertain the fact; because I was aware aware that the inhabitants, at that time, would have suspected that the inquiry was instituted merely with the view of introducing a general capitation tax, and would have endeavoured, as much as possible, to suppress information. But as I knew that whatever apprehensions they might formerly have entertained on this point had been dispelled by the abolition of many old taxes within the last four or five years, and by the limitation of the land-rent by the survey, I thought the conclusion of the survey a proper time for obtaining a more accurate account of the population than had hitherto been done. Instructions were therefore circulated in August last, to make out new returns of the number of inhabitants in every village, founded, as far as it might be practicable, upon actual muster, except in the case of those casts who seclude their women from public view The returns were prepared by the Curnums of the different villages, assisted by the Potails, from muster where that mode could be adopted; and where it could not, as among Mussulmen, as well as several casts of Hindoos, from the information of the heads of families or of their neighbours. The paper, No. 7, has been drawn up from these returns, and probably exhibits as accurate a statement of the population of an extensive province, as can in general be procured in any other part of the world. The total number of inhabitants is 1,917,376, which is 689,203 more than the return of 1802. A part of this excess, perhaps one-fourth, arises from the increase of population during a period of five years of tranquillity, a small part is also owing to the return of inhabitants who had emigrated under the Nizam's government; but the remainder must be attributed to the falsity of the former returns. There is every reason to believe that the total is rather below than above the actual population, for the number of females ought to be greater. It is, according to the statement, one-tenth less than that of males: but if the same proportions exist here as in Europe, the difference cannot be more than one in a hundred; and the whole number of inhabitants would, upon this principle, be 2,014,294. It should, however, be observed, that it is a general opinion among the inhabitants, that the number of males is actually one-tenth greater than that of the females. I was at first inclined to believe, that the difference might have arisen from the seclusion of females; but it is not particularly great among those casts who follow this practice, but extends to every cast and every district I examined the details of several villages in different parts of the country, and though in one village the females were more numerous than the males, and in a few others nearly equal in number to them, yet the average result was the same as in whole districts. The coincidence of so many unconnected accounts is certainly a strong argument in favour of the popular notion, of males being one-tenth more numerous than females.

* The papers Nos. 5 to 8, above referred to, are not inserted, as they consist of voluminous tables.

Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

10. Accounts were also taken, in the course of the last fusily, of the number of cattle and sheep in the country: but they cannot be expected to be so accurate as those of the population; not only because the owners are averse to giving true reports, but because herds and flocks move frequently from one part of the country to another for the sake of pasture, and many herds are almost wild, and their numbers must therefore be taken upon the word of their keepers After making allowance, however, for these obstacles, the actual does not, I imagine, exceed the estimated numbers of cattle and sheep above one-tenth, or at most one-eighth. The number of black cattle is 1,198,613; and that of buffaloes, 493,906: although a considerable portion of both perished during the severe droughts of 1212 and 1213, the stock of both has increased within the last five years.

11. The number of sheep, according to the returns, is 1,147,492, and of goats 694,633. The actual number of both is probably one-eighth more; because from their being kept chiefly in the fields or jungle, and from the owners having a superstitious prejudice against their being counted by others, or even by themselves, it is more difficult to obtain a correct statement of sheep and goats than of black cattle and buffaloes.

12. The quantity of sirkar land in cultivation, according to the survey, is 3,203,859 acres; of which the assessment or fixed rent is Star Pagodas 17,08,115; and the quit and extra rent Star Pagodas 1,44,840; in all, Star Pagodas 18,52,955. (No. 5.) The cultivation in the statement is not that of any one year, but of several. That of each district is entered for the year in which which its survey was made, from 1213 to 1216; but as the best cultivated districts were first surveyed, and afterwards those in which the greatest increase has taken place, the total may be considered as the average cultivation of ordinary years. It is exceeded only by the cultivation of fusily 1215. The various products from which the land-rent is drawn, and the proportions of each, are shown in the statement No. 8. It was made out in 1211, since which period the proportions of some of the more valuable articles, as indigo and sugar, have greatly augmented. Indigo, to the value of Star Pagodas 1,05,000, paid duty in 1215; and it is supposed that the export to the Carnatic, for which no duty was paid, was equal to Star Pagodas 20,000. The quantity would have been nearly doubled in 1216, had not the crops been destroyed by the drought. The coarse sugar, or jaggery, manufactured in 1216, was double the quantity of any preceding year. The increase of these articles is occasioned by the addition of an extra land-rent, amounting to twice or three times the ordinary rate to which all land employed in their culture was subjected; and this increase is likely to go on progressively, as the demand for them is great. Cotton, one of the chief products of the Ceded Districts, has not increased in a similar degree, because the demand for it is not greater than usual, and because, from its being a common article of cultivation, and never having paid more than the ordinary land-rent, it has obtained no advantage from the equalization of rent by the survey. Its estimated produce in fusily 1215 is shown in the statement No. 9, which was last year transmitted to the Board of Trade. This produce is not likely to increase in a greater rate than the general cultivation of the country, because cotton is hardly more profitable than grain to the Ryots. But should any considerable supply be required for the Company's investment, the rise in the price which must in consequence take place, will occasion a greater quantity to be grown upon the land now occupied. The augmentation, however, will not be so great as might be expected; because it will be limited by the more substantial Ryots being unable to raise cotton without a succession of other crops, and from the poorer Ryots seldom being able to raise it at all. This does not proceed from any particular difficulty or expense attending the cultivation, but from the necessity of raising, in the first place, grain for themselves and straw for their cattle; and from their rarely, after providing these articles, having the means of raising any thing else, so that not one-fifth of the cotton land now in cultivation is employed in rearing that article.

13. The waste land is the great source from which an additional supply of cotton may be obtained; but this can only be effected by lowering the present assessment. A reduction of twenty-five per cent. would, in the course of ten or fifteen years, bring into cultivation from a million to a million and a quarter of acres; and cotton could be grown to any extent that could possibly be required. The price would rise at first, by the purchase for the investment; but it would fall again to the ordinary standard, whenever the increased produce bore the same proportion to the increased demand as the present produce to the present demand. The time which might be required for the price to fall, would depend upon the quantity of cotton which might be wanted for the investment; but it could hardly exceed eight or ten years, because more additional cotton might be raised within that period than the investment could demand. The waste which has been in cultivation within the last twenty years amounts to 2,133,363 acres; and that which has either not been cultivated within that time, or never, amounts to 4,129,953 acres; making in all above six millions of acres, of which about one-sixth is fit for cotton.

14. The total enaum land in the Ceded Districts contains 2,599,747 acres, of which the estimated rent is Star Pagodas 12,35,458: about six-tenths of the whole is waste. The land held by Bramins, under the denomination of dhirmadey (statement No. 6), is chiefly cultivated by Ryots, who seldom pay the Enaumdar more than a fourth or fifth of the rent. In many villages these enaums are divided among the Ryots, who allow the Enaumdar only a small quit rent, and regard the rest as their own, from long possession. The enaums of Potails and Curnums amount to 64,701,138 acres, of which the estimated rent is Star Pagodas 3,02,587. 21. 33: about four-fifths of the whole are cultivated. These enaums are in many villages thirty or forty per cent. of the revenue, but in others not more than two or three per cent. In general, all above five per cent. may be regarded as unauthorized. The frequent changes of government, government, and the loss, or rather concealment of accounts, have during a long course of years facilitated the fraudulent extension of these enaums, at the expense of the sirkar lands. Many additions have, in this manner, been made to them under the Company's Government; and even at the moment of the survey, as it was feared that no opportunity might afterwards offer for such practices. In some cases, a portion of these extra enaums arises from grants for building small forts or digging wells for public use; in others, they pay a quitrent; but they ought all to be examined hereafter, and be subjected, where excessive, to resumption or assessment. The whole of the sirkar and enaum land capable of cultivation amounts to 12,066,923 acres, of which the rent, as fixed by the survey, is Star Pagodas 39,54,417. Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

15. The last description of land in the statement is what is called purrampoke. It comprehends all land that is utterly unproductive; sites of towns and villages; beds of rivers; and in some cases of tanks, roads, and extensive tracts of rocky and stoney ground where no plough can ever go.

16. I reckoned, at the commencement of the survey, that it might be finished in four years, and that the expense would be about four per cent. of the revenue of one year. The average revenue has been about sixteen lacks of pagodas, which at four per cent. gives 64,000 pagodas. But the survey has already cost 80,000 pagodas, and will cost about 3,000 more. This increase is occasioned by its having occupied nearly five years instead of four, owing to my attention having been partly diverted from it to the business of supplies, while the army was in the field, and to its having been necessary to survey, a second time, a great part of the lands on the banks of rivers, in order to ascertain how much of them had been carried away by the inundation in October 1801.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient and humble servant,

Anantpoor, (Signed) THOS. MUNRO,
26th July, 1807. Principal Collector.

(No. 1.)—Instructions to Surveyors.

1. ALL your measurements, of every description of land, wet and dry, are to be made with a chain of thirty-three feet. Enclosure.

2. Your accounts are to be kept in acres, goontas, and anas. One square chain is one goonta, and forty such goontas are one acre.

3. When you arrive in a village, you will, previously to beginning the measurement, take a muchulka from the Potail and Curnum, according to the form which has been delivered to you.—N. B. This form states, that the Curnum's account of circar and enaum land, house and shop tax, and every article of revenue, is true; and that if it is found to be false in any point he will forfeit his office.

4. The Curnum and Potail of the village must attend you during the measurement; and you must give timely notice to the Ryots, in order that they may be present at the measurement of their own fields.

5. In measuring a village, you will begin at one side, and proceed regularly on, marking the field first measured No 1, the next No. 2, &c. These numbers will serve to distinguish fields, when there are several of the same name in one village. After measuring the dry, you will measure the wet land, and number the fields in the same manner, beginning again at No. 1, 2, &c.; and the same rule must be observed with respect to baghayet or garden land.

6. The name of every field must be entered in your accounts. Where fields, whether cultivated, uncultivated, or waste, have a name, you will insert that name; where they have none, you will, in concert with the Potail and Curnum, give them one.

7. In the account of the measurement of every field, whether wet or dry, you will always specify the names and numbers of the fields by which it is bounded.

 8. In

Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

8. In dividing fields of red land, you will mark the division by a bank of earth or stones: but in black land you will always mark the division by setting up boundary-stones; because the polli, or bank of earth, would injure the black land, by over-running it with long rooted grass.

9. You will pay the hire of the coolies employed in marking boundaries, either by stones or banks of earth.

10. If a field, not being larger than may be cultivated by one plough, is ploughed in part only, and the rest waste, you will not divide it, but measure it as one field.

11. If a field is too large to be cultivated by one plough, you will divide it into two or three fields, as may be necessary. As the extent of land cultivable by one plough depends upon the nature of the soil, you will be guided by the custom of the village, and the opinion of the Potail, Curnum, and principal Ryots, in regulating the size of fields. As the subdivision of a large cultivated field is ordered to be made solely upon the supposition, that if thrown up by the present occupant it may be left waste, from there being few Ryots in the village who have the means of cultivating it; yet if, from the state of agriculture in the village, there is no danger of its being left uncultivated, it will not be necessary to divide it, even though it should be too large for one plough.

12. In the measurement of dry land, you will class black and red land separately.

13. If a quarter only of a field is cultivated, enter the whole field as waste. If half only is cultivated, enter half as cultivated and half as waste; and if three-quarters are cultivated and one quarter waste, enter the whole as cultivated.

14. In measuring uncultivated land, you will divide it according to the old marks or bounds: should you meet with waste (anadi) having no such marks, you will direct them to be made. You will class uncultivated lands into fallow of one, two, three, four, and five years; waste from five to ten, ten to fifteen, and fifteen to twenty years; and anadi, or waste, which has either never been cultivated, or not been cultivated within twenty years. It is only when waste is divided into fields, or found in small pieces, that it is to be measured by separate fields; when lying in large undistinguished tracts, it is to be measured in the gross: but whether found in small fields, or in extensive commons, it is to be named and numbered. If, after measuring twenty cultivated fields, numbered 1, 2, 3, to 20, a piece of waste follows, it will be numbered 21, and the cultivated field which comes after it 22, and so on, as often as waste intervenes; but as the largest piece of waste is usually surveyed after all the rest of the village is finished, it will, of course, be the last number Suppose that this number is 50, then, if at any future period it should, from the extension of cultivation, become necessary to divide it into fields, these fields will be numbered in succession, No. 51, 52, &c. But this cannot be done in the case of the waste No. 21, because it is already followed by No. 22; when, therefore, No. 21 comes to be divided into fields, these new fields must be numbered No. 1 in 21, 2 in 21, &c.

15. When a field contains a few tamarind, kikar, or other productive trees, you will make no deduction for the land under their shade, because the Ryot derives a profit from them; but where there is a bher-tree, or several other unproductive trees together, forming a shade, you will measure the land occupied by it, and deduct it from the field.

16. In measuring purrimpoke, or land that cannot be cultivated, you will specify the extent of forts, of pettahs, of open villages, of the court-yards of houses, with the number and kinds of trees in such yards; of the banks of tanks, rivers, nullahs, ravines, hillocks, roads, kullar or barren land, wells, salt-mounds, and of topes; stating the numbers and species of trees. You will also specify the purrimpoke in the fields of Ryots, and deduct it from their lands.

17. In tarbunds, or palmirah topes, you will insert the number of trees, and class them into male and emale, young, productive, and old or past bearing. You

You will also measure separately, the divisions or parts of the tope occupied by different Ryots.

18. You are not to measure hills or beds of rivers.

19. You will consider as garden or baghayet, all lands, in whatever manner they may be watered, that do not yield rice, but produce raggy, jeware, tobacco, red pepper, &c. and you will enter as garden so much land only as can be watered.

20. In measuring wet land, you will specify whether it is watered by large tanks, by great nullahs, such as those of the Toombaddea and Penuah, by kumpli, or draw-wells, or by kushems or nullahs, proceeding from springs.

21. You will enter as wet land all gardens having a constant supply of water, and containing cocoa-nut and other fruit-trees. You will specify the quantity of waste land between the rows of trees of land cultivated, where the trees are thinly scattered, and of cultivated land where there are no trees. You will note the number of plants of young trees, of productive, and of old or unproductive trees, and specify whether they are cocoa-nut, soopari, tamarind, jamoon, lime or orange, &c. You will also enter as wet land, plantations of betel and sugar-cane; and likewise land producing tobacco and red pepper, &c. provided there is water enough for rice.

22. In wells and river kumplis, where there is a constant supply of water, and where the land, having formerly produced rice, is now, from some cause or other, cultivated with dry grain, you will enter as wet land. All that land which is marked out as atchkutt, or rice-fields, and which can be watered; but if, from the scarcity of water, such land is, in particular years only, cultivated as wet, you will measure it as dry.

23. When fields of garden or wet land are too large, they must be subdivided in the same manner as those of dry.

24. You will measure the beds of tanks, and class the lands included in them according to the nature of the soil.

25. You are to enter as cultivated land, the cultivation of the last fusily only; that is to say, of the year previous to that in which the survey takes place; for if lands cultivated in former years but waste last year, or cultivated in the last but not in the present year, are entered in the survey cultivation, the account will not exhibit a true statement of the cultivation of any one year.

26. You are to measure only such lands as are allotted to you. If you measure the lands of another surveyor, you will not be paid for them, but fined.

27. When boundaries are disputed, if the lands in dispute are cultivated, and have been annexed to one village since the year Kelah, or the establishment of the ahkam namah, enter them in that village; if the lands are anadi, or old waste, enter them in the village which agrees to walk along the boundary.

28. To prevent the survey from being retarded by indolence, you must measure daily, whether cirkar or enam land, as follows:

Dry:	If cultivated..........................	5,000 goontahs or chains.
......	If sayer bunjer, or uncultivated land divided into fields	6,500.........do.
......	If anad bunjer, or undivided waste or common	25,000.........do.
Wet:	If cultivated..........................	1,500.........do.
......	If uncultivated	2,500.........do.

29. You will receive at the above rates six pagodas monthly; but your pay being regulated by your measurement, will be increased or diminished, in the proportion that your measurement, during the month, may be greater or less than the quantity prescribed. In order to ascertain the amount of your pay, you will send an abstract of your measurement monthly, through the examiner, to the treasury, in the following form:

Cultivated

30. In your abstract, it is not necessary to particularize the dates of measurement; the name of the month only is wanted.

31. As the chain is frequently broken, and some of its links lost, you will compare it, from time to time, with the standard which you have received for that purpose.

32. If, on trial by the examiner, your measurement is found to be false, you will be dismissed, if it has proceeded from negligence; and punished, if from design.

33. You will inquire into unauthorized new enaums and concealed lands. If you discover any not entered in the accounts of the Curnum, you will receive, on proof, one-half the amount; and the person through whose information you make the discovery, one-quarter of your half.

34. You will be allowed two chain-bearers, and one-quarter of a canteray fanam for each, daily. You will pay them, and also the cooleys employed in making the boundary marks, daily, in presence of the Potail and Curnum, and take their receipts.

35. You will receive half a pagoda monthly for oil and stationary.

36. You will let the Curnums enter the account of the measurement, and you will compare your abstract with theirs, daily.

37. You will deliver both your rough and fair accounts of measurement to the examiner.

38. You will pay the bazar price for all articles received in the villages. If you do not pay, or if you receive batta, you will be dismissed.

Principal Collector

Enclosure. (No. 2.)—Instructions to Azmayesh Gomastahs, or Examiners of the Survey.

1. As you are appointed to the superintendence of a party of ten surveyors, you will regulate their survey as follows:

2. When

2. When a village has eight or ten large mujerahs, you will send two surveyors to each; but if the mujerahs are small, only one.

3. When there is a large mouzah, without any mujerah, you will mark out by flags the portions to be surveyed by each surveyor; and let them compare their account of boundaries with each other, so as to prevent any land from being omitted in their respective limits.

4. When a mouzah is small, and you think that the survey will be accelerated by employing only a part of the surveyors in it, and sending the rest to another mouzah, you will do so.

5. If the mujerahs of a mouzah have old boundaries, you will adopt them; if they have no visible boundaries, you will set up stones in order to distinguish them.

6. You will take care that no land is omitted between the respective limits of your own surveyors, or between their limits and those of other parties of surveyors.

7. You will take the rough accounts (the kham chitah or.........) from the surveyors, and make by them all your comparisons of measurement.

8. In your examinations of measurement, you will attend particularly to the fields of Potails, Curnums, and khoobash inhabitants.

9. You will examine by re-measurement daily, as follows:

Dry .... 500 goontahs or chains.
Or wet .... 150............do.

and transmit the account of the examination in the following form:

No. 1. Margoza-tree field of Rungah Reddy, cirkar land, to the north of Goind Gaurus yetmannee field, measured by Bhum Row .... 4 acres $18\frac{1}{4}$ goontahs;
viz. East to west........................ $11\frac{1}{2}$ chains
North to south.................. $15\frac{1}{2}$ chains.

Total......... $178\frac{1}{4}$......or 4...... $18\frac{1}{4}$

Azmayesh or trial..5...... 1 chain;
viz. East to west........................ 12 chains.
North to south.................. $16\frac{3}{4}$

Total......... 201 ......or 5...... 1

10. You will transmit your trials, with the rough accounts, to the cutcherry, and give the fair ones to the accountants (Awurdah nowis.)

11. In examining the measurement, if the excess of the land on trial is above twelve and a half per cent. in dry, or ten per cent. in wet, you will add the difference to the field. If the deficiency is more than ten per cent. in dry, or five per cent. in wet, you will deduct it.

12. If in any village you find the measurement of the whole, or the greater part of the fields incorrect, and that a new survey is required, you will state the circumstance, and obtain leave before you begin.

13. If any Ryot complains that the measurement of his field is not fair, you will measure it again.

14. You will inquire into new unauthorized enaums, extra collections, land, and articles of the village taxes suppressed in the accounts; of all such discoveries you will receive one-half as a reward, and one-quarter of your half will be paid to the person from whom you may have received your information.

15. As the chains are frequently broken, you will compare them occasionally with the standard measure.

16. You will get two chain-bearers from the Totties or Tallaries of the village. You will pay them one-quarter of a cantaray fanam each daily, in the presence of

of the Potail and Curnum, and take their receipt; and you will send a statement of the expense with your monthly account.

17. You will divide all the villages that fall to your share according to the number of surveyors. Write the different shares on an equal number of papers, and let the surveyors draw lots, and measure the villages which their respective lots contain.

18. Your party is to measure only such villages as may be allotted to it. If in the hope of getting more pay from black land, your surveyors measure the land allotted to another party, they will receive no pay from them, and be fined.

19. After finishing the measurement of the villages allotted to your party in any district, if there is any party which has not begun its measurement in that district, you will measure its villages; but if there is no party which has not commenced, you will proceed to the next district.

20. You are not to measure in four or five days the number of acres prescribed to you for the month, but to measure daily, except on those days when you are on your way to another district. The measurement may be more in some days and less in others; but the prescribed quantity for the month must be completed.

21. You are not to try the measurement of a part of the surveyors in one month, and that of the rest in another; but you are, in each month, to try the measurement of all the surveyors.

22. You are not to remain behind the surveyors; because, unless you are with them, you cannot compare with them the false measurement which you may discover. If you are not always in the same district with them, you will be dismissed.

23. With your monthly abstracts you will send a list of the surveyors and peons present and absent. You will give your rough accounts of measurement examined to the Aumildar, who will forward them to the Collector's cutcherry, and you will take the Aumildar's receipts for the accounts.

24. You will receive a monthly allowance of twenty-two and a half fanams for sader wared.

25. You will pay for all articles at the bazar price.

(Signed) THOMAS MUNRO,
Principal Collector.

(No. 3.)—To Assessors or Terrim Muttaseddies.

Enclosure.

1. You are to class the surveyed by ten surveyors, according to their rate or terrim. In setting the terrim, you are to assemble the Potail, Curnum, and Ryots of the village, and also the heads of the neighbouring villages, and do it with their advice.

2. You are to class the lands of the whole mouza into first, second, third, &c. according to their rates. If the best land is in the cusbah, you will enter it in the first rate. If the first land of any of the mujerahs is only equal to the second of the cusbah, you will enter it on the second rate. If, on the contrary, the first land of the cusbah is equal only to the second of the mujerah, you will enter it in the second rate; for the rates are to be for the whole village generally, and not for each mujerah separately.

3. In fixing the rates, the Ryot who occupies the land must be present. You are to consider the condition of the land, and not of the Ryot; for the one is permanent, but the other is not: and you are to be careful not to enter the first rate as second, or the second as first, &c.

4. You are to mention the colour of the land, in order that in fixing the rent, the class to which it belongs may be the better known. The colours are as follows:

The above is given as an example, for your information; you are not, however, to enter the money rates, but only to take care that the lands are correctly classed. The classes may be as numerous as the different kinds of land are; but in one mouza you are not to make more than ten classes of dry, six of garden, and eight of wet.

7. In regulating the proportions of the decrease of rent between each class, you will be guided by the quality of the land; and make it, in some villages, for dry, half a canteray fanam; and in other villages, where the rent is low, one fourth of a canteray fanam;

For garden... 5 and $2\frac{1}{2}$ canteray fanams;
For wet ...... 5 and $2\frac{1}{2}$ ditto.

If in a village you find that the difference between any two classes of land should be half a canteray fanam, you will make the same difference between every other class: and, in the same manner, if the difference between any two is one-fourth canteray fanam, you will continue that difference through all the other classes; and in garden and wet, if the difference between two classes is two and a half or five canteray fanams, you will make one of these rates the difference between all the other classes; but you must not have both rates of difference in the same village.

N. B. The rent of dry land in some of the western districts was found to be so low, that the rate of decrease (oottar) could not be restricted to one-fourth of a canteray fanam without great inconvenience; it was therefore extended to one-eight of a canteray fanam, or two anas; and the following additional articles were inserted in the instructions:

8. Though you were formerly directed to restrict the rate of decrease (ootar) in dry land to one-fourth of a canteray fanam; yet as the accounts must be regulated by the land, and not the land be made to suit the accounts, and as the usual rent is in some places only from one-fourth to one canteray fanam per acre, if there are seven or eight classes rising one-fourth of a canteray fanam each, it will make the rent too high: you will, therefore, if there are only three or four classes, keep the ootar at one-fourth fanam; but if there are more, you will make the ootar two or three anas of a canteray fanam, according to the custom of the village.

9. In writing the abstract of the village, you will state, at the head of the columns of dry, wet, and garden, the ootar, or rate of decrease between the different classes: if dry, one-eighth, one-fourth, or one-half canteray fanam; if garden or wet, two and a half, or five canteray fanams.

Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

10. In classing the land, you will consider both the nature of the soil and the expense of labour; for instance, if one field is near the village, and another of the same quality at a distance from it, the distant field must be rated lower, because it requires more labour to watch and also to plough it. You will make allowance for the additional expense, and lower the rate accordingly; so that it may be cultivated with the same ease as the land of the same kind near the village. You will also, in garden and wet land, make allowance for the deficiency of water; and where there are nullahs and wells, for the extra labour, and reduce the class.

11. You are to class the land not merely by its intrinsic quality, but also by its actual state of cultivation. Thus, if two adjoining fields, of the same quality with respect to soil, are held, the one by a poor, and the other by a substantial Ryot, you will not enter them in the same class; but you will place the field of the poor Ryot in such lower one as its unimproved state may render necessary.

12. If in one field, whether dry, wet, or garden, there are two or three different kinds of soil, you will not class the kinds separately, but take the average of the whole, and make one class.

13. In classing wet and garden, observe the following detail. Divide the lands of tanks and nullahs into one-crop and two-crop land. In well-land, consider whether the well has water for one or two crops, and make the class higher or lower accordingly.

14. In classing betel and cocoa-nut, &c. gardens, you will enter the land in the same class as land of the same kind on which there are no fruit-trees, without making it either higher or lower, on account of the trees.

15. In garden, you will enter as garden only what is now cultivated; and you are not to add to it any of the neighbouring dry land, on the supposition that there is water enough to convert it hereafter into garden.

16. In garden which is now waste (anadi) you will examine whether, when last cultivated, the crop was a dry or a wet one. If dry, you will class the land as dry; and if wet, as garden.

17. In classing dry waste (anadi) you will proceed as follows: if it is divided into fields by old boundaries, and has been so measured, you will class each field separately: if there are no old boundaries or land-marks, you will class it by the divisions into which the surveyors may have formed it.

18. In classing the lands, you will take the rough account of the survey, and class according to the order of the numbers in that account; after which you will separate the cirkar and enam, and the cirkar cultivated and uncultivated, and waste land, and class the whole according to their respective rates. You will not add up the fields ryotwar, for it is not necessary to show what each Ryot occupies; but in enam lands, you will add up the fields both in their classes, and under the name of the person to whom they belong.

19. You are to class the lands, dry, garden, and wet, as they are distinguished by the surveyors. You are not to alter their classification, but you may note where you think it is wrong.

20. You are to class, monthly, 3,000 canteray pagodas of land cultivated, by the rent of the preceding year, for which you will receive ten star pagodas monthly. If you class a smaller quantity, your pay will be reduced in the same proportion, viz.

For Canteray Pagodas	2,750	pay Star Pagodas	9
	2,000		6

If you class a smaller quantity than 2,000, you will be dismissed; but you will receive no increase above ten pagodas pay, whatever quantity you may class. If, however, in the course of the year, you class more in one month and less in another, the difference will be allowed, provided it does not on the whole exceed ten pagodas monthly.

21. You

Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

21. You are to examine if fields have been concealed, or articles in the village taxes suppressed; but you are not to inquire into differences of rent or extra collections.

22. You will not enter the land forming the beds of tanks, and barren or useless purimpoke; but you will inquire how it is cultivated when the tank is dry, and class it accordingly.

23. You are to compare your accounts with the Curnum daily, and let him take them on the spot. You may carry him and the Potail to the neighbouring villages, to give their opinion on classing the lands of them, but not to write the accounts of their own village. If you make out your accounts without letting the Curnum take a copy, your pay will be stopt every month in which this is done.

24. In making out your abstract of the land in classes (kessemwar goswarah), you are not to enter as cultivated the cultivation of two or three years, but only that of the preceding year. If more is entered you will be dismissed.

25. As the surveyors, in order to get more pay, make out their accounts hastily, and give false additions, you will make your Gomastahs compare them, and send a list of all errors monthly to the treasury, showing the dates of measurement and the differences of the number of acres.

26. The land classed by you will be examined by the head assessor (Ser-terrim) and if any material error is discovered you will be dismissed.

27. You will make out the accounts of each village according to the forms, and when the district is completed, give the whole to the Aumildar. You are not to keep the accounts after the district is finished, nor to carry the Curnums to another district.

28. You are not to wait for the (Ser-terrim) head assessor, but as soon as you finish one village proceed to another.

29. You are not to dismiss or employ Gomastahs or peons, without reporting and obtaining authority.

30. You are not to beat or confine any of the inhabitants; and you are to pay for all articles at the bazar rate.

Principal Collector.

(No. 4.)—To Ser-Terrimdars or Head Assessors.

1. As you are appointed to superintend and correct the assessment of five (Terrimdars) assessors, you will divide your share of each district into five divisions, and give one to each Terrimdar: and you will give him at the same time the survey accounts which will be delivered to you by the Aumildar.

2. You will examine the classification of the lands, and you will fix the rates of assessment, in conjunction with the Potails, Curnums, and principal Ryots; and if you wish for the assistance of any intelligent persons formerly employed in the revenue, the Aumildar will send them to you, on your application.

3. In making the assessment, you must examine all circumstances that may assist in enabling you to form a right judgment. You must consider the akham namah (or assessment of Tippoo Sultan), the present extent of cultivation, the condition of the Ryots, and the nature of the soil; you will then fix the rate of assessment of each class of land, in dry, garden, and wet. You will explain it to the Ryots, and obtain their consent to it, and you will take care that it is not so high as to impede cultivation hereafter; you will also examine well the kamil rent of each village, the detail of the akham namah and of the rent of the last twenty years, and enter them in your statements.

4. If you find that any of the Terrimdars have classed the lands wrong, whether from ignorance or corrupt motives, you will report, in order that they may be dismissed.

5. Where

Reports of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

5. Where you find that the Terrimdars have entered two or three kinds of land in the same class, you will transfer each kind to its proper class.

6. As the classing the fallow and waste lands at too low a rate might induce the Ryots to occupy them, and throw up their cultivated lands, to the injury of the revenue, you will therefore keep in view, that waste lands are to be so classed as not to discourage their cultivation, and at the same time, as not to give them any advantage over the old cultivated lands.

7. As your assessment is regulated by the quality of the land and its actual state of cultivation, and as the Bramins and other tyargar or privileged casts, and the cullgootah-shotrium and guddad landholders, have always held, and must still be permitted to hold their lands at a reduced rent, and as this remission must be deducted from your assessment, and thereby reduce its amount, you must be careful, in comparing your assessment with that of former periods, to deduct the remission previously.

8. You will ascertain whatever has been allowed by the custom of the village as cuttgoottah (low rent to different casts), shotrium enam, and low-rented villages to Bramins, and (guddad) quit-rent for levelling rugged land, and show the amount of each separately in your abstract.

9. You are not to detain the Terrimdars until you arrive yourself to examine their assessment; but let them, as soon as they have finished one village, proceed to another.

10. If a part of your Terrimdars have finished their divisions, while another part is still behind in a different district, they will also finish the divisions which have not been begun before they proceed to a new district.

11. You will send the pay abstract of Terrimdars and Peons monthly to the Aumildar, who will get the amount from the treasury; and you will issue it and send a receipt.

12. When the assessment of a district is finished, you will deliver all the accounts to the Aumildar and take his receipt.

13. You will class and assess, monthly, 15,000 canteray pagodas of land cultivated, by the rent of the preceding year; and in case of any deficiency, your pay of fifteen pagodas will be reduced, in the same manner as that of the Terrimdars.

SECRET REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,
Dated 9th October 1812.

To the Honourable the Secret Committee of the Honourable the Court of Directors.

Honourable Sirs:

Secret Revenue Letter, from Bengal, 9 October 1812.

Par 1. We have lately had the honour to receive a letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors, dated the 27th November last, relative to the settlement of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

2. By that dispatch we are concerned to learn, that the Honourable Court had disapproved the arrangements which we had proposed to carry into effect, under the Regulation passed with respect to the above question in the year 1807.

3. It is not our intention, on the present occasion, to enter into any detailed discussion regarding the comparative advantages of temporary and permanent settlements in this country. Every information which can be required on the subject may, we conceive, be found in the Minutes of Lord Cornwallis, recorded on the proceedings of the 18th September 1789 and of the 10th February 1790, and in the Minutes more recently written by Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Colebrooke, and entered on the proceedings of the 20th June 1808, and in the dispatches patches from the Revenue Department to the Honourable the Court of Directors of the annexed dates.*

4. On a reference to Section 5, Regulation X, 1807, your Honourable Committee will observe, that it is expressly declared, "that the jumma, which may "be assessed on the estates of the Zemindars, in the last year of the settlement "immediately ensuing the settlement then depending, shall remain fixed for "ever, in case the Zemindars shall be willing to engage for the payment of the "public revenue, on those terms, in perpetuity, and the arrangement shall receive the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors." Strictly speaking, therefore, the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of lands can have no substantial ground to complain, that the public faith has been violated in not giving effect to the provisions contained in that Regulation. Notwithstanding, therefore, the diminution of confidence, of which any departure from the tenour of that regulation may be productive, we have not hesitated, as your Honourable Committee will perceive by the accompanying copies of two Regulations, to rescind, both in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, the rule above cited.

5. It still remained to be considered, in what mode the orders of the Honourable Court were to be carried into effect, with reference to the proclamations issued, and the regulations enacted, on the acquisition of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces respectively; or, in other words, in what mode those orders were to be reconciled with the obligations of public faith pledged by those acts, and which, we are persuaded, that the Honourable Court never intended should be in the slightest degree infringed.

6. This question is examined at length in the Minute of the Governor-General, a copy of which we have the honour to transmit for the consideration of your Honourable Committee. From that document it will appear that we have considered the orders of the Court of Directors, as applying only to the provisions of Regulation X, 1807, but not extending in their operation to the declarations made to the landholders, by the Regulations enacted in the years 1803 and 1805, soon after the acquisition of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

7. It will naturally occur to you, that this distinction is founded, in some degree, on the express reservation made of the Court's approval in the Regulation of 1807, which did not exist in those of 1803 and 1805, but more particularly on the great length of time which has elapsed since the last-mentioned regulations were respectively passed, and on the tacit acquiescence of the Honourable Court, during so long a period, in that arrangement.

8. Without intending, in any manner, to question the powers of controul possessed by the Court of Directors over the legislative acts of the local Government, as well as every other measure of those Governments, we have still felt, that in a case in which a positive unqualified engagement was made by the supreme local Government with individuals, by which they have been induced to devote their labour and capital to the cultivation of their estates, a tacit acquiescence on the part of the controuling authority, extending, at least in one instance (the Ceded Provinces), to the whole term of the contract, must be understood to import a ratification of it. Had the Honourable Court's dissent to the arrangements, established by the Regulations of 1803 and 1805, been signified at an early period after the enaction of those Regulations, the inherent powers of controul possessed by the Court might have been urged in support of such dissent, although those Regulations contained no reserve of the Court's approval; but now that the whole term of the contract has expired in the Ceded Provinces, and two-thirds of it in the Conquered Countries, the annulment of it, at this distant period, could not, we apprehend, as already intimated, be reconciled to the dictates either of policy or justice.

9. As already noticed, the temporary settlements made in the Ceded Provinces are now on the point of expiring, when, by the proclamation issued in the year 1802, and formed into a legislative enactment in 1803, a permanent settlement was to be made with the landholders in those provinces. Such settlement

* 31 July 1807; 30 January, 15 September 1808; 7 April, 30 December 1809; 31 August 1810; 12 February, 14 December 1811; 21 March 1812.

ment, however, was subject to two important restrictions: first, it was distinctly promised to those persons only who shall have held possession of their lands during the whole term of the temporary settlement; and secondly, it was only to be established in those estates, the cultivation of which might be sufficiently improved and extended to warrant the measure.

Secret Revenue Letter from Bengal, 9 October 1812.

10. The operation of the Regulation now transmitted to your Honourable Committee, regarding the settlement in the Ceded Provinces, will probably, therefore, be much more limited than may at first view be conceived to be the case; it being supposed that the two conditions above noticed, which alone entitle the landholders, at present, to a permanent settlement, will not be found to be applicable to a very large portion of them.

11. The preceding remarks are applicable to the Conquered Provinces; except that, as the permanent settlement will not now, in any case, take place in those territories until the commencement of the year 1223 fusily, time will be afforded to your Honourable Committee or to the Court of Directors, to furnish us with any further instructions on the subject which may be deemed necessary.

12. In the foregoing remarks, we have stated the constructions which we have affixed to the late orders of the Honourable the Court of Directors, and the operations now adopted, in regard to the permanency of the settlement, so far as judgment can be at present formed on the subject. There is still, however, a third view of the question, namely, the influence which those arrangements may eventually have on the general tranquillity of the country, a point which, for obvious reasons, we have deemed it prudent to submit to the consideration of your Honourable Committee.

13. It has been already observed, that strictly speaking the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of lands can have no substantial ground to complain, that the public faith has been violated, in not giving effect to the provisions contained in Regulation X, 1807. At the same time it is certain, that a departure from those rules will be felt as a severe disappointment by a very large proportion of the landed proprietors. In many cases, also, this disappointment will be exasperated, by the loss of the funds which they may have applied to the improvement of their estates, in the confidence (which, we confess, appears to us perfectly natural) that the recommendations of this Government, regarding the permanency of the jumma, would receive the confirmation of the authorities at home.

14. It is impossible to take a clear view of the present question, without adverting to the relation in which the great body of the people stand towards those authorities, and to the local Government, respectively. Every regulation which is enacted, every order which is issued, in whatever branch of the service, is communicated to the people in the name of the Governor-General in Council, or in that of some of the subordinate authorities.

15. They may not, possibly, be ignorant that, generally speaking, all those authorities are subject to the controulling power in England; but it may safely be affirmed, that of the nature and extent of that controul they have very imperfect ideas. This remark is, we conceive, applicable to the whole bulk of the community. It is more particularly so with respect to the natives of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, who having more recently become subjects of the British Government, must necessarily retain, in a great degree, the notions of civil policy which they had acquired under the native administrations to which they were before subject, and which were to the last degree ill suited to inspire them with any just conceptions of that system of controul, which is exercised by the Authorities in England over the Local Governments of her Colonies.

16. Under these circumstances, it cannot be doubted that, under the arrangements of 1807, the Zemindars and others would enter on the cultivation and management of the estates, with a confidence little short, in their judgment, of certainty in the permanency of the jumma. With those impressions, capital must have been employed in the improvement of the lands, which under different circumstances would have been appropriated to other purposes. The country and the Government are already reaping the advantage of that capital: landed property is becoming, in the estimation of the public, what it must ever be under a good system of Government, one of the greatest of human blessings: the security for the payment of the public revenue is rendered more substantial by the enhanced value of lands: the people are gradually divesting themselves of predatory habits, and seeking, by means of useful and peaceful industry, those fruits, which they formerly only attempted to acquire by oppression, rapine, and exaction.

17. It is under circumstances such as we have just stated, that we are commanded to announce to the great body of the people, that the permanency of the jumma no longer exists. The assurances given to landholders, in the years 1803 and 1805, and which, for the reasons already stated, we consider to be still in full force and effect, may in some degree alleviate the disappointment which must be experienced from the operation of the present orders. Still it is impossible to judge, à priori, of the effects with which that disappointment may be attended. It is a feeling which is nearly allied to discontent; and when those impressions are felt in any considerable degree, resistance to public authority is always to be apprehended. The people have furnished, on affairs of comparatively small and trivial interest, examples of a disposition to assist their wishes by tumult and outrage. A more powerful incitement to seek redress by combination and violence cannot be given in any country, and cannot extend to a larger and more powerful class of the community, than injuries supposed to be done to the great body of landed proprietors.

18. In the foregoing remarks, we have acquitted ourselves of an important public duty, in apprizing your Honourable Committee of the possible consequences of the arrangements which, in conformity to the orders above noticed, we have now directed to be carried into execution in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. Still it remains for us to suggest to you explicitly the expediency of investing us, at the earliest practicable period of time, with authority to modify those orders, in such manner as circumstances may appear to render necessary for the tranquillity of the British possessions. However much we may regret, that the Honourable Court have not deemed it advisable to confirm the arrangements adopted by us provisionally in the year 1807, we have not the slightest intention of soliciting any discretion in regard to the execution of their present instructions, so long as considerations, connected only with the public revenue, shall be involved in them. But, as already noticed, they may be productive of effects of great public emergency, which could not have been anticipated when the instructions in question were issued. In that, and in that case only, we trust that your Honourable Committee will deem it a measure of sound policy, to invest us with authority to refrain from carrying those orders into effect, further than can be reconciled with the dictates of prudence and with the general peace and tranquillity of the country.

We have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,
Honourable Sirs,
Your most faithful, humble servants,

MINUTE of the GOVERNOR-GENERAL,
Dated the 11*th July*, 1812.

[Read a letter from the Honourable Court of Directors, dated the 27th November 1811.]

Minute of the Governor-General, 11 July 1812.

In the dispatch above noticed, the Honourable the Court of Directors are pleased to observe, that they had not without anxiety learned from the late advices of this Government, that a triennial lease had been concluded in the Upper Provinces, and that it had been declared that the assessment in the third year of the lease should be permanent, provided that the Honourable Court approved the terms of the settlement.

The Honourable Court further observe, that they had perused with attention the report of the Board of Commissioners in the Upper Provinces, dated the Minute of the Governor General, 11 July 1812.

13th April 1808, and that the impression which they had received from it was, that the proposed final settlement of the revenues of those territories would be premature, &c.

With those impressions, the Honourable Court are pleased to direct, that the revenues of these provinces be administered, under a renewed lease, for a term not exceeding five years.

From the tenor of the above remarks, it may be doubted whether the Minutes recorded by Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Colebrooke, on the proceedings of the 20th June 1808, in the Revenue Department, had come under the consideration of the Honourable Court. If so, the circumstance is, in my opinion, a very just subject of regret, as those Minutes demonstrate strongly the advantages which would be experienced from the conclusion of a permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces at the earliest practicable period; and, at the same time, are calculated to meet very forcibly those arguments, which appear to have weighed with the late Board of Commissioners in maintaining the contrary position.

The advantages or disadvantages, however, of a permanent settlement, do not form the subject of which I propose to treat in the present Minute. The only point which I intend at present to consider, is the mode in which the orders of the Court of Directors should be carried into effect.

As already stated, the Honourable Court have been pleased to direct, that the revenues of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces be continued to be administered, under a renewed lease for a term not exceeding five years.

If those terms be taken in the broadest sense of which they are susceptible, they would imply that a permanent settlement should not be made of any lands whatever in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. If in a more limited sense, they may be construed to apply only to such estates as are not (to borrow the language of the Regulations) in a state of cultivation sufficiently advanced to warrant the adoption of that measure. The following arguments may be assigned in support of the latter construction.

On the 14th July 1802, a proclamation was issued by the late Lieutenant Governor and Board of Commissioners, in which the great body of the landholders are, among other things, informed as follows:

" At the end of these ten years, a permanent settlement will be concluded " with the same persons, if willing to engage, and if no others who have a " better claim shall come forward, for such lands as may be in a sufficiently " improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms as Go- " vernment shall deem fair and equitable."

A copy of that proclamation appears to have been transmitted to the Court of Directors, with a dispatch from the Political department, dated the 23d February 1803, in the fourth paragraph of which the Court's attention is particularly drawn to the arrangements made by the Lieutenant Governor and Board of Commissioners regarding the land revenue.

In Regulation XXV. 1803, passed by the Governor General in Council on the 24th March of that year, the declaration above cited from the proclamation of the late Lieutenant Governor and Board of Commissioners is framed verbatim into a legislative enactment. That regulation was, of course, transmitted to the Honourable the Court of Directors, in common with all other regulations. It does not appear, however, that the Honourable Court ever judged it advisable to annul or modify the declaration made to the great body of the landholders, either when it was first submitted to the Court in the form of a proclamation, or during the long period in which the same declaration has been in their possession as a provision of an existing Regulation.

Under these circumstances, the Zemindars and other proprietors of lands in the Ceded Provinces appear to me to possess every assurance which could be afforded to them; first by the proclamation, secondly by the regulation, and thirdly by the silence of the Court of Directors, that a permanent settlement would be concluded with them at the expiration of ten years: not, indeed, for all estates indiscriminately, but for such estates as might appear to be in a state a state of cultivation sufficiently advanced to render that measure expedient and proper.

It has been above stated, that the orders of the Honourable Court, if taken in the broadest sense of which the terms employed are susceptible, would imply that a permanent settlement should not be made of any lands whatever. It being impossible, however, to reconcile that construction of the orders in question with the maintenance of the faith of Government, so publicly and solemnly pledged to the landholders, the instructions in question must necessarily be construed in the more restricted sense above noticed. Connecting, indeed, the order contained in the last paragraph of the Court's letter with the general tenor of that dispatch, it appears evident, that the Honourable Court had only in view the arrangements adopted provisionally in the year 1807, and had not any reference whatever to arrangements before established, as detailed above.

In the passage already cited from the Court's letter, it is observed that they had learned, not without anxiety, from our late dispatches, that a triennial lease had been concluded in the Upper Provinces, whereby the assessment in the third year of the lease had been declared by us to be permanent, &c. But that declaration and those dispatches related exclusively to the arrangements proposed to be established by Regulation X. 1807. Any discussion, indeed, at so late a period, respecting arrangements adopted in 1802 and 1803, which had been submitted to the Honourable Court in the regular course, must necessarily have appeared superfluous.

Regretting, as I cordially do, the disabilities created by the above-mentioned dispatch, of carrying into effect the arrangement of 1807, it is manifest that it was perfectly competent to the Court of Directors, in the exercise of their discretion, to sanction the adoption of them, or otherwise, as they might deem advisable. Section 5, Regulation X, 1807, states, that "the jumma which "may be assessed on their estates in the last year of the settlement imme- "diately ensuing the present settlement, shall remain fixed for ever, in case "the Zemindars shall now be willing to engage for the payment of the public "revenue, on those terms, in perpetuity, and the arrangement shall receive "the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors." It consequently follows, that whatever disappointment may be felt by the landholders, they cannot justly complain of any violation of public faith.

With the sentiments above expressed, there appears to me only one mode by which the preservation of the public faith can be reconciled with the duties of obedience due from us to the orders of the Honourable Court; which is, by maintaining the arrangements of 1802 and 1803, and annulling those of 1807, the latter of which, as just stated, were declared to be expressly subject to the approval of the authorities at home.

The foregoing observations and propositions apply, in substance and principle, to the Conquered Provinces, including Cuttack and Bundlecund. I have discussed the subject, however, only with reference to the Ceded Provinces, in order to render the matter stated more clear, and to avoid the ambiguity arising from the quotation of a multiplicity of dates. In like manner, the annexed drafts of Regulations have been prepared for the conclusion of the settlement in the Ceded Provinces, and regarding the settlement of the Conquered Provinces, including Bundlecund and Cuttack, respectively.

REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,

Dated the 16*th March* 1813.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 16 March 1813.

Par. 1. Our last dispatch in this department was dated the 29th of January, 1813.

2. We have received your letters in the same department, dated the 14th December 1811, and 21st March 1812.

3. Your

3. Your Revenue Letter of the 9th October 1812, addressed to the Secret Committee of the Court of Directors, was received by his Majesty's ship Modeste, on the 8th February.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 16 March 1813.

4. As it is of great importance that you should be put in early possession of our sentiments upon the last-mentioned communication, we now proceed to reply to it, meaning to answer those of prior dates by a future opportunity.

5. In your letter of the 9th October 1812, transmitting a Minute recorded by the Governor-General on your Consultations of the 11th July 1812, we are informed of the proceedings you have adopted, in consequence of the Court's letter of the 27th November 1811, renewing their disapprobation of the arrangement proposed for their sanction in Regulation X. 1807, by which the landed assessment of the Upper Provinces, in the last year of the settlement terminating in fusily 1219, was to be declared permanent, and directing that the revenues of these provinces be administered under a renewed lease not exceeding five years.

6. We are now apprized that Regulation X, 1807, has been rescinded; but that two Regulations, Nos. IX. and X, 1812, have been substituted, with the view of reconciling, as far as possible in your opinion, the preservation of public faith, as pledged in Regulation XXV, 1803, and Regulation IX, 1805, with the duties of obedience due from you to the constituted Authorities at home.

7. You are right in supposing that it never was our intention, in any instructions which we have transmitted for your guidance, "that the obligations of "public faith should be in the slightest degree infringed;" and we perfectly concur with you in opinion, "that the Zemindars and other actual proprietors "of lands can have no substantial ground to complain that the public faith has "been violated, in not giving effect to the provisions contained in Regulation "X, 1807." The provisions of that Regulation, in so far as they went universally to extend, and partially to hasten, the introduction of the permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, beyond the limits and within the time contemplated in Regulations XXV, 1803, and IX, 1805, were framed with an express reservation that they should be binding upon your Government, only in the event of their receiving the sanction of the Court of Directors.

8. This sanction we thought ourselves bound in duty to withhold; and, in consequence of that legitimate exercise of power, all that is necessary now to be considered is, whether the instructions we have transmitted to you at different times, on this subject, were or were not compatible, both with the letter and spirit of Regulations XXV, 1803, and IX, 1805.

9. Those Regulations were unconditional in one view, and conditional in another. They did not, like Regulation X, 1807, contain a clause rendering their operation contingent upon the formal sanction of the Court of Directors, but their operation was limited by the express tenour of their own enactments. Neither in 1803, nor in 1805, nor in 1807, were the provisions of the Regulation absolute. In the last of the three Regulations, the condition was simple, depending solely on the concurrence of the Court of Directors: in the two first it was complex, depending, first, upon the circumstance of the landholders with whom a permanent settlement was to be concluded, having agreed for and discharged the temporary assessments; and secondly, upon the lands which they occupied having, in fusily 1219 in the Ceded Provinces, and in fusily 1222 in the Conquered Provinces, made such progress in improvement, as to justify Government in fixing its demands upon them to perpetuity.

10. The fulfilment or non-fulfilment of the first part of the condition being matter of record, may easily be ascertained; and where once the fact of fulfilment is established, there is no room for difference of opinion concerning the claim for a perpetual assessment resting upon it, in so far as that part of the condition goes to sustain the claim. It is to be recollected, however, that continued possession, and a punctual discharge of the dues of Government during the triennial leases, formed only one part of the condition on which Government pledged itself to a permanent settlement with the landholders. There was another, and still more important clause in the condition, viz. that the land should, in the interval, be brought to a sufficiently advanced stage of cultivation to warrant us in fixing perpetual limits to our demand upon it. The precise point of improvement at which such a measure might become expedient, or even justifiable, was not determined by the Regulations of 1803 and 1805, and could not, indeed, be determined by any prospective Regulation. The question was left completely open for the future exercise of the judgment of Government; nor is there any thing in these Regulations by which its decisions can, or ought to be, in the smallest degree fettered.

11. It was, probably, with this understanding of these Regulations, that the Government which enacted them deemed it unnecessary, at the time, to make them subject to the sanction of the Court of Directors; and it was under this interpretation of them that we abstained from censuring an arrangement exceedingly indefinite in its arrangement, and which, we were persuaded, no local government would venture to carry into effect without our authority and concurrence. But when we found that what had been left indefinite by Regulations XXV. 1803, and IX. 1805, had, by Regulation X. 1807, assumed a more determinate aspect, and that a measure was prematurely in contemplation, deeply affecting the best interests both of Government and the subject, and for which, in our apprehension, and according to the information we had received, the country was not properly prepared, we felt ourselves imperatively called upon to interpose between the design and its execution. These were the motives, as we very distinctly explained to you at the time, which induced us, in our Revenue Letter of the 27th February 1810 (paragraphs 45 to 47) in reply to your dispatch of the 31st July 1807, to state to you that "it was not our meaning to proceed immediately to a settlement in perpetuity "of these countries," and to declare to you our opinion, that such a measure would be "premature at so early a stage of our connection with them, when "our knowledge of the revenue actually derived from them by the Zemindars, "and of their capability, must have been necessarily imperfect, and when the "people were yet so little habituated to our Government." It was these motives, also, that led us, in our letter of the 1st February 1811, in answer to your's of the 28th October 1808 (paragraphs 36 to 47), after noticing the deficiency of the information you then possessed of the revenue affairs of Cuttack, and referring to our intention of making a provisional settlement in perpetuity for that province, strongly to urge to you the necessity of "a laborious scru- "tiny into individual rights, a careful investigation of local peculiarities, toge- "ther with a minute and detailed survey of the extent, cultivation, and pro- "ductive powers of the territory," before you proceeded to the adoption of so important a measure, as that of settling in perpetuity the lands of a province, and fixing the demand of Government upon them for ever. We therefore deemed it advisable to direct, that "no settlement should be declared per- "manent in Cuttack, or in any other of our provinces, till the whole proceed- "ings preparatory to it should have been submitted to us, and till your reso- "lutions on these proceedings had received our sanction and concurrence."

12. The same considerations operating on our minds with augmented force, as we became more particularly informed respecting the actual state of affairs in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, induced us to furnish you with our instructions of the 27th November 1811, and of the 15th January 1812, and with those which we have lately transmitted you under date the 29th January last.

13. From the exclusive reference which you make, in your dispatch of the 9th October last, to our letter of the 27th November 1811, as the cause of your having rescinded, in July 1812, the provisions of Regulation X. of 1807, an inference might not unnaturally be drawn, that the letter in question contained the first intimation with which you had been furnished of our intention to withhold our sanction to the engagements which you had provisionally concluded under that Regulation, and that, until the receipt of the instructions conveyed in that letter, we had left you uninformed of our sentiments upon this important matter. On referring, however, to the paragraphs of our former dispatches to you, which we have just briefly recited, it will be seen, that we had, so long ago as the 27th February 1810, clearly given you to understand, with an express reference to the provisions of the Regulation of 1807, that it was not our intention to confirm the arrangements which had been provided for by that regulation, and that on the 1st February in the following year (nearly ten months anterior to the date of our dispatch of the 27th November 1811), we strongly reiterated the expression of the same sentiments and intentions.

14. As to the interpretation we have put upon the Regulations passed by the Bengal Government in 1803 and 1805, respecting the extension of the permanent settlement to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, it does not much, if at all, differ from the interpretation which you yourselves have affixed to them, as is apparent from your late Revenue correspondence, as well as from the letter now before us. In your dispatch of the 12th February 1811, you submitted to our consideration the exceptions which you thought might be made, consistently with sound policy, to the permanency of the settlements in these provinces, and particularized some cases in the districts of Seharunpore and Goruckpore, in which you conceived that it would be proper to exercise the power expressly reserved to us by the Regulations, of postponing the settlement where such postponement might be deemed advisable. In like manner, you drew our attention, in your dispatch dated the 14th December 1811, to the pergunnah of Punwarree, in the district of Bundlecund, and to the inadequacy of the actual assessment to the probable resources of the pergunnah at a short distance of time, referring us, at the same time, to the orders which you had issued to the Board of Commissioners (and which we entirely approve), to regard the existing assessment as temporary, and to institute a revision of it at the term of its expiration, in virtue of the discretion reserved to the Court of Directors by the Regulations, thus anticipating the exercise of that discretion, by an interposition on your part, previous to a reference to the Court. And, in the 9th and 10th paragraphs of your dispatch, dated the 9th October 1812, after stating the restrictions (to which we have already adverted) contained in Regulation XXV. 1803, to which the introduction of the permanent settlement in the Ceded Provinces, at the expiration of fusily 1219, was made subject, you observe : " the operation of the Regulation now transmitted,* regarding the settlement in the Ceded Provinces, will probably be much more limited than may, at first view, be conceived to be the case, it being supposed that the conditions above noticed, which alone entitle the landholders at present to a permanent settlement, will not be found applicable to a very large portion of them." The same remarks you state, in paragraph 11, to be equally applicable to the Conquered Provinces ; with this difference, that in no case will the permanent settlement take place in these provinces until the commencement of fusily 1223.

15. There really appears, therefore, to be no substantial difference of opinion between us, respecting the mode in which Regulation XXV. 1803, and IX. 1805, ought to be interpreted : nor can we perceive how the public faith would have been at all violated, had our instructions of the 27th November 1811 been construed in the broadest sense of which they are susceptible,† which is certainly the sense they were intended to convey, and the only one reconcilable with the terms and general spirit of them, as well as with the previous orders which we had furnished you of the 27th February 1810, and 1st February 1811. In paragraph 8 of your reply, you do indeed speak of a positive unqualified engagement made by the Supreme local Government with individuals ; but the admission contained in the subsequent paragraphs of the same reply shows that the engagement, in your own opinion, was both qualified and conditional. The most important part of the condition, as has been already stated, was that " the lands should be in a state of cultivation sufficiently advanced to render it proper to fix the assessment on the same to perpetuity."‡ Whether

* Regulation IX. 1812.

† " If those terms be taken in the broadest sense of which they are susceptible, they would imply that a permanent settlement should not be made of any lands whatever in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. It being impossible, however, to reconcile that construction of the orders in question with the maintenance of the faith of Government, so publicly and solemnly pledged to the landholders, the instructions in question must necessarily be construed in a more restricted sense."—Governor-General's Minute, recorded the 11th July 1812.

‡ Regulation XXV. 1803, section 34.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 16 March 1813.

Whether the land be, or be not, in such a state as to warrant a measure irrevocable in its nature, and involving so materially, not only the financial interests of the Government, but the welfare and prosperity of those living under its protection, it is for the constituted Authorities at home, aided by the information transmitted by the local Government, to decide; and by a decision in the negative, supposing even the decision to be universal in its application, it does not appear to us that the obligations of public faith would be at all infringed. The local Government in 1808 may have been much too sanguine in calculating the progressive improvement of the land; its estimate of our future exigencies may have been greatly under-rated; and it may have been mistaken, both as to the facility of introducing, on just principles, a permanent settlement in a country where the rights and the descriptions of property are very imperfectly understood, and also as to the advantages likely to result from such an arrangement. These considerations, however, instead of being foreign to the question, are the very grounds on which it ought to be decided, and were, in fact, subsidiary to the deliberate judgment which we have passed upon it.

16. The Governor-General, in his Minute of the 11th July 1812, mentions as a just subject of regret, that we had not had an opportunity of perusing the Minutes recorded by Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Colebrooke on your Consultations of the 20th June 1808, before our letter of the 27th November 1811 was written, because, in his Lordship's opinion, "those Minutes demonstrate strongly "the advantages which would be experienced from the conclusion of a perma-"nent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces at the earliest practi-"cable period, and at the same time are calculated to meet very forcibly those "arguments which appear to have weighed with the late Board of Commis-"sioners in maintaining the contrary position." We have since perused, with the utmost attention, the Minutes alluded to; but they certainly have not succeeded, according to the expectation entertained by you, in removing the strong impressions that were made on our minds by the Report of the late Commissioners, dated the 13th April 1808. We must also add, that these impressions have been very powerfully confirmed and strengthened by a perusal of the Reports of the Acting Commissioners in the Upper Provinces; and for the sentiments and views to which they have given rise, we refer you to our last Revenue Letter in that department, dated the 29th January 1813.

17. You state, in paragraph 13 of your dispatch: "It is certain that a de-"parture from the rule of 1807 will be felt as a severe disappointment by a "very large proportion of the landed proprietors. In many cases, also, the "disappointment will be exasperated, by the loss of the funds which they may "have applied to the improvement of their estates, in the confidence (which, "we confess, appears to us perfectly natural) that the recommendations of this "Government, regarding the permanency of the jumma, would receive the "confirmation of the Authorities at home." In paragraph 17 you observe that, "It is impossible to judge à priori of the effects with which that disappoint-"ment may be attended. It is a feeling nearly allied to discontent; and "when these impressions are felt in any considerable degree, resistance to "public authority is always to be apprehended. The people have furnished, "on affairs of comparatively small and trivial interest, examples of a disposi-"tion to assert their wishes by tumult and outrage. A more powerful incite-"ment to seek redress by combination cannot exist, and cannot extend to a "larger and more powerful class of the community, than injuries supposed to "be done to the great body of landed proprietors." And, contemplating these possible consequences, you urge, in paragraph 18, the expediency of our investing you, "at the earliest practicable period of time, with authority to modify "the orders" (contained in Regulations IX. and X. 1812,) "in such manner "as circumstances may appear to render necessary for the tranquillity of the "British possessions."

18. Upon the contents of these paragraphs we have but a very few observations to make. In your instructions of the 20th June 1808, as issued through Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell to the Board of Commissioners, it is observed that, "although the landholders generally must be supposed to be apprised of the "leading principles on which an arrangement, so materially connected with "their interests as that of a permanent settlement, ought to be adopted, yet,

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 16 March 1813.

"as a measure of further precaution against future complaints on their part," Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell proceeds to observe, "I am directed to desire that "you will instruct the several Collectors subject to your authority, fully to ex- "plain to the Zemindars and Talookdars, that the permanency of the settle- "ment, at the jumma mentioned in the clause above cited, must depend on the "pleasure of the controlling Authority in Europe." To this is added: "The "Governor-General in Council likewise desires that a clause may be inserted, "to that effect, in the engagements which may be interchanged between Go- "vernment and the landholders."

19. Respecting the capital alleged to have been expended by the landed proprietors in the improvement of their estates under the temporary settlements, and the loss which they must sustain from the jumma in the year terminating the last settlement not being declared fixed to perpetuity, we, in the first place, greatly suspect that the premises are fallacious; and, in the next place, admitting the premises, we cannot acquiesce in the conclusion deduced from them. Considering the disordered state of these provinces when they devolved under our authority, and the vexatious and extortionate system of government to which they had been subject for a long period of time previous to their cession and conquest; adverting also to the facts detailed in the Reports of the Collectors and the Board of Commissioners, and to the clear evidence exhibited in the Revenue Proceedings of your Government, of the fluctuation which, since the acquisition of these territories, has marked your administration of the land-revenue, it is very difficult to believe that the landholders had much disposable capital to embark in the improvement of their estates; and if there was capital in existence, it is still more doubtful whether it has been so employed. The improvement in the state of those districts where improvement has actually taken place, may, we think, be more rationally accounted for, from the protection enjoyed by the cultivators under the British Government, and from the re-establishment of internal tranquillity. The establishment of progressive jummas must, indeed, have contributed, in no small degree, to obstruct the natural course of improvement under the temporary leases. That arrangement was adopted, probably, for the purpose of raising the assessment to the highest practicable standard within a short period, and with a view to its being, at the close of that period, fixed to perpetuity. We took occasion, however, in paragraph 21 of our dispatch dated the 29th January 1813, to express our disapprobation of jummas assessed on this principle of progressive increase; because, whilst we strongly discouraged the plan of an early permanent settlement, we were desirous that the landholders should have all the advantage of a moderate fixed assessment for a term of years. We trust, therefore, that in the arrangement of future leases, no departure will be permitted from the principle of leaving the landholders in entire possession of all the advantage they may derive from the improvement effected, by means of labour and increase of population, during the term of the settlement.

20. Supposing, however, that more capital has been expended by the landholders upon their estates in the course of the triennial leases, under the prospect of the jumma, at the expiration of the last settlement, being declared permanent, than would have been expended if no such prospect had been held forth, it does not follow as a matter of course, from the permanent settlement being postponed, that the landholders must lose the profit upon the sums so disbursed. Those disbursements may, and ought to be taken into consideration on the renewal of their leases; and one of the greatest advantages of periodical settlements is, that they put it in the power of Government, by means of the village accounts and the reports of the Canongoes, not only to correct inequalities in former assessments, proceeding from concealment, mistake, or collusion, but to encourage industry where it has been exerted, and to excite enterprise where it has been dormant. It is from the moderation, equality, and security of enjoyment, rather than from the permanency of the assessment, to which we must look for the improvement and prosperity of the country; and it is less a consequence of the revision and renewal of a periodical assessment that the aggregate jumma should be increased, than that it should be modified according to circumstances, and more correctly apportioned among the great body of contributors.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 16 March 1813.

21. We cannot, for the reasons which we have already stated, partake in the apprehensions which you seem to entertain, that the tranquillity of the country will be endangered by the postponement of the permanent settlement. On the contrary, we have strong doubts whether, if it was placed in the option of the landholders to concur in such an arrangement, or to hold their estates on terms more nearly analagous to their own customs, and the practice of the native governments when in a state of vigour and efficiency, a great majority of them would not embrace the latter alternative.

22. In deciding on the momentous question now under our consideration, instead of being actuated exclusively by fiscal considerations, we have steadily kept in view those great objects of general policy to which, in your letter of the 9th October 1812, you have thought it necessary to draw our attention. To maintain the public tranquillity ought to be the first aim, as it is the paramount interest, of every government; and we are only sorry to find that we differ respecting the means by which this important object can be best secured, as well as the measures by which its security is most likely to be endangered. It cannot be questioned by any one who has perused the proceedings, as connected with the formation of the existing settlements in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, that we are still very imperfectly acquainted with the rights of the various descriptions of landholders, and of the nature of the different sorts of tenures by which property is held in these territories: it is known, also, that the titles to a considerable proportion of the lands are still in dispute, and that years must elapse before decisions can take place on the pretensions of the claimants in the regular course of justice. Under such circumstances, it is impossible that an early conclusion of the permanent settlement should not have a tendency to derange the order and disturb the quiet of society.

23. Viewing the matter in another light, and bearing in mind the great proportion of the revenue derived from the land in India, we ought to proceed with the utmost caution and deliberation in those arrangements which shall have for their object a settlement of rent in perpetuity. Strictly speaking, wherever waste land exists, and where there is any reasonable prospect of its being, at a future period, brought into cultivation, the assessment cannot be fixed to perpetuity without a sacrifice of the contingent interest of Government; and if a practical rule were to be founded on this position, it would probably operate as a bar to a permanent settlement in any one instance. Could the settlement, indeed, be confined to the lands in a state of cultivation, to the exclusion of the waste, the objection so far would be obviated: but except this can be effected, considering the very large proportion which, according to the Reports of the Commissioners, the uncultivated bears to the cultivated land in the Ceded Districts, we are persuaded that, if the permanent settlement be not limited to a very few estates, there will be a most improvident and unnecessary sacrifice of the interests of Government; and if it be thus limited, it behoves you well to reflect upon the probable consequences of its partial introduction. On the supposition that it is regarded by the landholders as a measure advantageous to them, much discontent may be caused among those proprietors who are excluded from the benefit, whilst those individuals on whom the boon is conferred may avail themselves of it, by withdrawing the Ryots from the lands remaining under temporary settlements, to the prejudice both of Government and their fellow subjects.

24. We shall conclude this dispatch by reiterating our sentiments on the present inexpediency of a general or extensive application of the principles of the permanent settlement to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. You have yourselves admitted, that those landholders only can be entitled, under the Regulations of 1803 and 1805, whose estates, among other conditions, "might "be sufficiently improved and extended to warrant the measure." We confidently trust that you will, therefore, confine yourselves strictly to that limitation, and that, with regard to the other parts of these provinces, where local difficulties do not exist of sufficient magnitude to prevent their being carried into effect, you will particularly attend to the instructions with which you are already furnished, of the 27th November 1811, 15th January 1812, and of the 29th January 1813.

A. D. 1803. REGULATION XXV.

A Regulation prescribing rules for the conduct of the Board of Revenue and the Collectors; and for declaring the proprietary right in the lands, in the provinces ceded by the Nawaub Vizier to the Honourable the English East-India Company, to be vested in the Zemindars and other landholders, under the terms and conditions of the settlement of the land revenue formed by the Honourable the late Lieutenant-Governor and the Board of Commissioners, pursuant to the authority vested in them by His Excellency the Most Noble the Governor-General.—Passed by the Governor-General in Council, on the 24th March, 1803; corresponding with the 12th Choite 1209 Bengal era; the 16th Choite 1210 Fusily; the 12th Choite 1210 Waliaity; the 16th Choite 1860 Sumbut; and the 29th Zekaad 1217 Higeree.

Substance of the proclamation issued by the late Lieutenant-Governor and Board of Commissioners, under date the 14th July 1802, respecting the settlement of the land revenue of the Ceded Provinces: the terms of the proclamation confirmed, with certain additions and explanations.

XXIX. The following proclamation, relative to the settlement of the land revenue in the provinces ceded to the honourable the English East-India Company by the Nawaub Vizier, was published on the 14th day of July 1802, corresponding with the 29th Assaur of the fusily year 1209, by the honourable the late Lieutenant-Governor and the Board of Commissioners, in virtue of the powers vested in them by His Excellency the Most Noble the Governor-General; and the several articles contained in it are hereby confirmed and declared to be in force, with the subsequent additions and explanations contained in sections XXX, XXXI, and XXXII, of this Regulation; and in section LIII, Regulation XXVII, 1803, which comprizes the substance of the proclamation issued by the late Lieutenant-Governor and Board of Commissioners on the date abovementioned; with further provision, since made, for the settlement of the land revenue in the Ceded Provinces, under the extension of the authority of the Board of Revenue to the said provinces.

Proclamation issued by the late Lieutenant-Governor and Board of Commissioners, under date the 14th July 1802, respecting the settlement of the land revenue in the Ceded Provinces.

" Proclamation.—Whereas it is the intention of the British Government " to adopt, at the expiration of the present fusily year, such a plan for the set- " tlement of the landed revenue of the Ceded Provinces, as may be most con- " ducive to the prosperity of the country and to the happiness of the inha- " bitants; and whereas it is of the utmost consequence to the success of the " measure, as well as to the interests of the Zemindars, Talookdars, and all " others concerned, that the nature and terms thereof should be made known " as early as possible; notice is hereby given,

" 1st. At the commencement of the fusily year 1210, the sayer of every " denomination will be separated from the mâl, or land revenue, and a settle- " ment for the latter only concluded, in all practicable cases, with the Zemin- " dars

" dars or other actual proprietors of the soil (unless when disqualified by noto-" riously bad character, or other good and sufficient cause), for a period of " three years, at a fixed, equal, annual jumma; it being understood, that such " Zemindars as are huzzoor tehsil, or allowed to pay their kists immediately to " the collector of the zillah, are to be responsible for the police of their respec-" tive zemindarries.

" 2ndly. At the expiration of the three years, another settlement will again be " made with the same persons (if willing to engage), for three years, at a fixed, " equal, annual jumma, which jumma shall be formed by taking the difference " between the annual amount of the first lease, and the actual yearly produce " of the land at the time of its expiration, and adding two-thirds of such diffe-" rence to the annual rent of the first lease.

" 3dly. At the expiration of the sixth year, a new settlement will be made " with the same persons (if willing to engage), for a further period of four " years, at a fixed, equal, annual jumma, formed by adding to the annual rent " of the second three years, three-fourths of the net increase of revenue during " any one year of that period.

" 4thly. At the end of these ten years, a permanent settlement will be con-" cluded with the same persons (if willing to engage, and if no others who " have a better claim shall come forward), for such lands as may be in a suffi-" ciently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms " as Government shall deem fair and equitable.

" 5thly. Those Zemindars who may decline entering into engagements for " their estates, as also those whose offers may be rejected by Government, shall, " for the present, continue to be allowed the same nankar which they have hi-" therto received from the Nawaub Vizier.

" 6thly. With respect to such zemindarries as may have been mortgaged or " transferred on security, and possession thereof actually given to the mort-" gagers or sureties, the settlement will be made with the person in possession " of the land, as the temporary representative of the proprietor, leaving the " latter to obtain possession, either by a private settlement of accounts or by a " judicial process.

" 7thly. The settlement of such small talooks, or estates, as may be only no-" minally included in large zemindarries, in the sudder jumma of which their " jumma may be comprehended, will be made, separately and distinctly, with " the proprietors of such small estates, and they will be allowed to pay their " revenue directly to the Tehsildars on the part of Government.

" 8thly. With respect to such lands as are without proprietors, or the propri-" etors of which decline entering into engagements, a village settlement shall " be made for three years, at a fixed, equal, annual jumma, and a preference " will be given to the Mockuddums, Purdhauns, or respectable Ryots of the " several villages.

" 9thly. In the event of neither proprietors nor farmers being forthcoming, " such lands as are in that predicament will be held khas.

" 10thly. All authorized abwaubs are to be consolidated and incorporated " with the land-rent, and expressed in the pottahs and cabooleats, and nothing " but what is there expressed shall be collected from the Ryots or under-" renters.

" 11thly. All persons who may enter into engagements for the settlement, " must bind themselves, by written obligations, to grant pottahs, of the above " description, to their Ryots and under-renters.

" 12thly. All persons who may enter into engagements with Government " must previously give security for the fulfilment thereof, in an amount equal " to one-fourth of their annual jumma."

The Collectors authorised, under date the 28th August 1802, to deviate from the rule prescribed in the first clause of the above proclamation, in certain cases.

XXX. 1st. The several Collectors in the Ceded Provinces were authorized by the Board of Commissioners, under date the 28th of August 1802, to deviate from the rule prescribed in the first clause of the foregoing proclamation, and to conclude the settlement for the first lease of three years at a fair and epuitable equitable annual increase, instead of a fixed, equal, annual jumma, in instances in which, from calamity of season, the landholders might be unwilling to engage for their lands at such a jumma for the first year of the lease, as Government would have been otherwise entitled to demand, with a reference to the probable resources and produce of the lands during the whole of the lease.

Substance of orders issued to the Collectors, under date the 13th August 1802, with respect to regulating the nankar of the Zemindars.

2d. By an order of the Board of Commissioners, under date the 13th of August 1802, the several Collectors in the Ceded Provinces were further instructed, in concluding the settlement of their respective zillahs for the first lease of three years, to regulate the allowance of nankar to such of the Zemindars as might engage for their lands, by deducting the amount of the nankar from the jumma, and taking engagements from the Zemindars for the net residue, provided that the deduction for nankar should not exceed ten per cent. on the net jumma.

Orders of the Board of Commissioners in modification of the fifth clause of the proclamation, respecting nankar to Zemindars not engaging for their estates, in no instance to exceed ten per cent. on the jumma.

3d. In modification of the fifth clause of the proclamation issued under date the 14th of July 1802, whereby it was declared, that the Zemindars who might decline entering into engagements for their estates, as also Zemindars whose offers might be rejected by Government, should, for the present, continue to be allowed the same nankar which they had heretofore received under the Government of the Nawaub Vizier, it was subsequently determined by the Board of Commissioners, that the rate of allowance for nankar should not, in either of the cases stated, exceed ten per cent. on the jumma of the estate.

Explanation of the 2d and 3d clauses of the proclamation, as well as of clause second, of Section 53, Regulation XXVII, 1803, with respect to the rule to be adopted in adding to the jumma a portion of the increased produce, in concluding the future settlements.

XXXI. With the view of obviating any misconstruction of the rule to be adopted, in adding to the jumma a portion of the increased produce, in concluding the settlements to be formed at the commencement of the fusily years 1213 and 1217, it is hereby declared, in explanation of the second and third clauses of the proclamation issued on the 14th of July 1802, as well as of clause second of Section LIII, Regulation XXVII, 1803, that the amount of the nankar to which the Zemindars were entitled, under the original engagements, for the first triennial settlement, shall be deducted from the actual yearly produce of their estates at the time of the expiration of each lease, and the actual increase of public revenue to be assessed agreeably to the clauses above specified, shall be calculated on the amount of the difference between the actual net produce after such deduction, and the annual amount of the former lease. It is, at the same time, provided, that the portion of the increased produce relinquished to the Zemindars, under the above-mentioned clauses, on the formation of the successive settlements, shall be considered as precluding all claim, on the part of the Zemindars, to any further proportion of such increased produce, on account of nankar, in addition to the deduction originally made and continued to them on this account.

Substance of orders issued by the Board of Commissioners under date the 30th September 1802, vesting a discretionary power in the landholders to grant small portions of land for the support of village watchmen, exempt from the payment of rent.

Such lands resumable, on the death or removal of the persons to whom they may be granted; and considered responsible for the revenue assessed upon the estates to which they may respectively appertain.

XXXII. In pursuance of an order issued by the Board of Commissioners, under date the 30th September 1802, a discretion is vested in the landholders to grant small portions of land exempt from the payment of revenue, for the support of their village watchmen, whenever they shall prefer making such grants to paying the watchmen a pecuniary allowance. Such grants, however, shall be resumable on the death or removal of the persons to whom they may be made; and the lands thus exempted from the payment of rent, as well as any other lands held by public officers or private servants exempt from rent, in lieu of wages, and not forming part of any authorized lakheraje grants, or tenures, within the provisions of Regulations XXXI. and XXXVI. 1803, shall be considered to form a component part of the malguzarry lands of the estates to which they may respectively appertain, for the revenue assessed upon which they will consequently be held responsible, in common with all other malguzarry lands included therein.

Proprietors of lands held khas, or let in farm, will be restored to the management of the same, on agreeing to the payment of the required assessment.

XXXIII. The lands of some Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, having been held khas, or let in farm, in consequence of their refusing to pay the assessment required of them, under the proclamation inserted in Section XXIX. of this Regulation, the Governor-General in Council notifies to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands are held khas, that they shall be restored to the management of their lands, upon their agreeing to the payment of the assessment which shall be required of them, in conformity to the prescribed rules for the settlement of the land revenue; and the Governor-General in Council declares to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands have been let in farm, that they shall not regain possession of their lands before the expiration of the period for which they have been farmed (unless the farmers shall voluntarily consent to make over to them the remaining term of their lease, and the Governor-General in Council shall approve of the transfer), but that, at the expiration of that period, upon their agreeing to the payment of the assessment which shall be required of them, they shall be reinstated, under the general regulations, in the management of their estates respectively.

Regulation XXV. A. D. 1803.

XXXIV. It is well known to the Zemindars, Talookdars, and other descriptions of landholders, in the provinces ceded by the Nawaub Vizier to the Honourable the English East India Company, that from the earliest times until the present period, the public assessment upon the lands has never been fixed; and that, according to established usage and custom, the rulers of those provinces, and their delegates, have exercised a discretionary authority in depriving them of the possession of their zemindarries, ta'ooks, and other tenures, whereby their right of property therein has become precarious and of little value, whilst the lands, from being let in farm to strangers or otherwise disposed of, have been impoverished, and the tenants and cultivators of the soil have been exposed to rapacity and oppression. With a view of promoting the interests of the landholders and to enhance the value of their estates, as well as to induce them to encourage their under-tenants and to extend cultivation, under the certainty that they will enjoy the fruits of their industry and good management, the Governor-General in Council has, by the rules contained in the preceding sections of this Regulation, and in Section 53, Regulation XXVII. 1803, not only directed a settlement to be immediately made with the Zemindars and other proprietors of land, who shall be willing to engage for the revenue of their respective estates, but has also declared that a permanent assessment shall be fixed, at the end of ten years, on such lands as shall be in a state of cultivation sufficiently advanced to render it proper to fix the assessment on the same in perpetuity; and the Governor-General in Council further declares the proprietary rights of all Zemindars, Talookdars, and other descriptions of landholders, possessing a right of property in the lands composing their zemindarries, talooks, or other tenures, to be confirmed and established, under the authority of the British Government, in conformity to the laws and usages of the country, and to the Regulations which have been, or shall be hereafter, enacted by the Governor-General in Council.

Assessment in former times liable to variation at the discretion of the ruling power.

Motives of the Governor-General in Council for abolishing this usage, and providing for a permanent assessment.

XXXV. To prevent any misconstruction of the declaration contained in the foregoing section, the Governor-General in Council deems it to be necessary to publish the following declarations to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land.

1st. It being the duty of the ruling power to protect all classes of people, and more particularly those who, from their situation, are most helpless, the Governor-General in Council will, whenever he shall deem it proper, enact such regulations as he shall judge to be necessary for the protection and welfare of the dependent Talookdars, Ryots, and other cultivators of the soil; and no Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall be entitled, on this account, to make any objection to the discharge of the assessment on their lands, which they have respectively agreed, or may hereafter agree to pay.

Government to enact such regulations as they may think necessary for the welfare of the dependant Talookdars and cultivators, and proprietors not to withhold the revenue on that account

2d. The Governor-General in Council having, by Regulation XXXVIII. 1803, abolished all the duties coming under the denomination of sayer, rahdarry, zemindarry, or any other denomination, levied on goods or merchandize of any description, with the exception of the established duties levied by Government in bazars and gunges; and it being provided, by the first clause of the proclamation aforesaid, issued under date the 14th July 1802, as well as by clause 13th, of section 53, Regulation XXVII. 1803, that all engagements for the land revenue entered into with Government shall be exclusive of sayer duties, and of all other collections not connected with the land revenue, the Governor-General in Council hereby declares, that if he should hereafter think it proper to establish any internal duties, and to appoint officers on the part

All internal duties that may be hereafter established, to belong exclusively to Government.

part of Government to collect them, no proprietor of land will be admitted to any participation thereof, or be entitled to make any claims for remissions of assessment on that account.

Jumma that may be assessed on alienated lands, to belong exclusively to Government.

3d. The Governor-General in Council will impose such assessment as he shall deem equitable, on all lands held exempt from the public revenue, which have been, or shall be, proved to be so held, under illegal or invalid titles. The assessment thus imposed will belong to Government, and no proprietor of land will be entitled to any part of it.

Police allowances in land or money resumable by Government, on the proprietors being exonerated from the charge of keeping the peace.

4th. The jumma of those Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, with whom a settlement shall have been made, or shall be hereafter concluded, under the terms set forth in the aforesaid proclamation, dated the 14th July 1802, or in Section 53, Regulation XXVII. 1803, shall be considered exclusive of any allowances which have been made to them in the adjustment of their jumma, for maintaining tannahs, or police establishments, and also of the produce of any lands which they may have been permitted to appropriate for the same purpose; and the Governor-General in Council reserves to himself the option of resuming the whole or any part of such allowances, or of the produce of such lands, if he should at any time think it to be proper to exonerate the proprietors of land from the charge of keeping the peace, and to appoint officers, on the part of Government, to superintend the police of the country. The Governor-General in Council, however, declares that the allowances, or the produce of lands, which may be thus resumed, will be appropriated to no other purpose but that of defraying the expense of the police.

Proprietors at liberty to transfer their lands without the sanction of Government.

XXXVI. That no doubt may be entertained, whether it be lawful for proprietors of land to dispose of their estates without the previous sanction of Government, the Governor-General in Council notifies to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, that they are at liberty to transfer to whomsoever they may think proper, by sale, gift, or otherwise, their proprietary rights, in the whole or any portion of their respective estates, without applying to Government for its sanction to the transfer; and that all such transfers will be held valid, provided that they be conformable to the Mahommedan or the Hindoo laws (according as the religious persuasions of the parties to each transaction may render the validity of it determinable by the former or the latter code), and that they be not repugnant to any Regulations now in force, or which shall be hereafter enacted by the British Government. It is, at the same time, hereby declared, that no private transfer by sale, gift, or otherwise, nor any private mortgage or other assessment upon land assessed with the public revenue will be admitted, in any respect, to affect the indefeasible right of Government to hold all such lands answerable, in the first instance, for the public revenue assessed thereupon.

Provided the transfer be conformable to law, and not contrary to the Regulations.

Such transfer declared not to affect the right of Government to hold the lands answerable for the revenue assessed thereon.

Rules for apportioning the fixed jumma on portions of estates, in the event of their being disposed of at public sale, or transferred by the proprietors, and on shares of estates divided amongst the joint proprietors upon the transfer or division being notified to the Collector, or other prescribed officer.

XXXVII. Whenever an entire estate (viz. the whole of any landed property, for the assessment on which a distinct engagement has been or shall be entered into between Government and the proprietor, or which shall be separately assessed, although included in one engagement with other estates belonging to the same proprietor), shall be disposed of by public or private sale, without any subdivision of such estate, no new allotment of the jumma will be requisite, and the purchaser will succeed to all the rights of the former proprietor in the entire estate. But it is essential, that a declaration should be made of the principles upon which the public assessment, or jumma, charged upon any such estates, will be apportioned on the several divisions of it, in the event of the whole of it being transferred by public or by private sale, or otherwise, in two or more lots, or of a portion of it being transferred in one, or in two or more lots, or of its being joint property, and a division of it being made among the proprietors. The Governor-General in Council has accordingly prescribed the following rules for apportioning the public assessment in the several cases above-mentioned; and as Government might sustain a considerable loss of revenue by disproportionate allotments of that assessment, were the apportioning of it, in any of the cases above specified, to be left to the proprietors, it is hereby required, that all such transfers or divisions as may be made by the private act of the parties themselves, be notified to the Collector of the revenue of the zillah in which the lands shall be situated, or such other officer as Government Government shall in future prescribe, in order that the public assessment, or jumma, charged upon the whole estate, may be apportioned on the several shares in the manner hereafter directed, and that the names of the proprietors of each share, and the jumma charged thereon, may be entered in the public registers, and that separate engagements for the payment of the jumma assessed upon each share may be executed by the proprietors, who will thenceforward be considered as proprietors of distinct estates. If the parties concerned in such transfers or divisions of estates shall omit to notify them to the Collector of the revenue of the zillah, or such other officer as shall be hereafter prescribed, for the purposes before mentioned, the whole of the original estate will be held responsible to Government for the discharge of the jumma assessed upon it, in the same manner as if no such transfer or division had ever taken place. The Governor-General in Council deems it to be necessary further to notify, in elucidation of the declarations contained in this section, that if any Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall dispose of a portion of his or her lands as a dependent talook, or any other under-tenure, to remain as a dependency, subject to the payment of rent to the proprietor of the estate of which such talook may form a part, the jumma which may be stipulated to be paid by the dependent Talookdar, or other under-tenant, will not be entered in the records of Government, nor will the transfer exempt such lands from being answerable, in common with the remainder of the estate, for the payment of the public revenue assessed upon the whole of it, in the event of the proprietor, or his or her heirs or successors, falling in arrear from any cause whatever; nor will such transfer be allowed in any case to affect the rights or claims of Government, any more than if it had never taken place.

But the transfer of dependant talooks not to affect the rights or claims of Government in any respect.

1st. In the event of the whole estate of a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or shall be concluded, being exposed to public sale, by order of the Governor-General in Council, for the discharge of arrears of the public assessment, or in consequence of the decision of a court of justice, in two or more lots, the assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the public assessment upon the whole of the lands sold may bear to the whole of their actual neat produce. The neat annual produce is to be understood to be the neat annual rent, or other neat produce receivable by the proprietor, after deducting from the gross rent, or other gross produce, the actual expenses of collection, and other usual charges of management, inclusive of the expense of embankments, and similar incidental expenses, where such may be paid by the proprietor from his gross receipts; but exclusive of his malikanah, nankar, or other proprietary income, and all other personal appropriations of the gross produce of his estate, as such can have no claim to consideration in determining the neat produce for an equal division of landed property, or for the allotment of the public assessment thereon, in conformity to the rules prescribed. The neat produce, as here defined, shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed by the Regulations, and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his, her, or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold them at the jumma at which they may be so purchased, subject to the general rules in force at the time of sale, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

Explanation of the term actual neat produce.

2d. When a portion of the estate of a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or shall be concluded, shall be exposed to public sale, by order of the Governor-General in Council, for the liquidation of arrears of assessment, or pursuant to the decision of a court of justice, the assessment upon such lands, if disposed of in one lot, shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to their actual neat produce, as the assessment upon the whole of the lands of such proprietor, included in the same estate, may bear to the whole of their actual neat produce. If the lands sold shall be disposed of in two or more lots, the assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the assessment upon the whole of the lands of such proprietor, included in the same estate, may bear to the whole of their actual neat produce. The actual neat produce of the whole of the lands of such proprietor, whether the portion of them them which may be sold be disposed of in one, or in two or more lots, shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed by the Regulations, and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his, her, or their heirs or successors, will be allowed to hold them at the jumma at which they may be so purchased, subject to the general rules in force, at the time of sale, for the periodical or permanent assessments of the land revenue.

3d. When a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or shall be concluded, shall transfer the whole of his or her estate, in two or more distinct portions, to two or more persons, or a portion thereof to one person, or to two or more persons in joint property, by private sale, gift, or otherwise, the assessment upon each distinct portion of such estate so transferred, shall be fixed by the Collector, or other authorized officer of Government, at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the assessment upon the whole of the estate of the transferring proprietor, of which the whole or a portion may be so transferred, may bear to the whole of its actual neat produce. This produce shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed in the Regulations, and the person or persons to whom such lands may be transferred, and his, or her, or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold them at the jumma at which they may be so transferred, after the same shall have been duly sanctioned and registered and engaged for, subject to the general rules in force at the time of transfer, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

4th. Whenever a division shall be made of lands, the settlement of which has been or shall be concluded with, or on behalf of, the proprietor or proprietors, and that are or may become the joint property of two or more persons, the assessment upon each share shall be fixed by the Collector, or other authorized officer of Government, at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the jumma assessed upon the whole of the estate divided may bear to the whole of its actual neat produce. This produce shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed by the Regulations, and the sharers, and their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold their respective shares at the jumma which may be so assessed upon them, after the same shall have been duly sanctioned, registered, and engaged for; subject to the general rules in force, at the time of the division, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

Rules for adjusting the jumma of lands held khas, or let in farm, in the event of the whole, or any part of them, being disposed of by public sale or private transfer, or divided amongst the proprietors.

XXXVIII. The following rules are prescribed, respecting the adjustment of the public assessment or jumma on the lands of Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands are or may be held khas, or let in farm by Government, in the event of their being disposed of by public sale, or transferred by any private act of the proprietor, or of their being joint property, and a division of them taking place amongst the proprietors.

1st. If the whole, or a portion of the lands of a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, who may not have agreed to the payment of the assessment proposed to him or her, and whose lands are or shall be held khas, or let in farm by Government, shall be exposed to public sale, in one, or in two or more lots, pursuant to the decree of a court of justice, such lands, if khas, shall be disposed of at whatever assessment the Governor-General in Council shall deem equitable, and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his, or her, or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold the lands at the assessment at which they shall be so purchased, subject to the general rules in force, at the time of sale, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue. If the lands, at the time of their being exposed to sale, shall be held in farm, and shall be put up in one, or in two or more lots, they shall be disposed of under the following conditions. The purchaser or purchasers shall receive, during the unexpired part of the term of the lease of the farmer, whatever such proprietor shall have been entitled to receive, in virtue of his or her proprietary rights, on account of the lands so purchased; and such purchaser or purchasers shall, at the expiration of the lease of the farmer, be put in possession of the lands, on his or their engaging to pay such assessment as Government may deem equitable, under the general rules in force for the assessment of the land revenue.

Persons to whom such lands may be so transferred, will stand in the same predicament as the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, or other actual proprietors of land, mentioned in Section XXXIII, whose lands are held khas, or have been let in farm, in consequence of their refusing to pay the assessment required of them, under the before-mentioned Regulations, for the decennial settlement; and the declarations contained in that section are to be held applicable to them.

XXXIX. Nothing in the two preceding sections shall be understood to preclude the revision and correction of allotments of the public assessment, upon portions of estates disposed of by public sale or private transfer, or upon the partition of joint estates, in cases of evident error, collusion, or fraud, for which provisions have been made by Regulation XXVI, 1803, prescribing rules for the sale and division of lands paying revenue to Government; nor shall any thing in the foregoing section be construed to authorize the Collectors, or any other officers of Government, to determine finally the amount of the public assessment to be allotted upon the portion of an estate, whether publicly or privately disposed of, or divided between sharers, without the sanction of the Board of Revenue, as more fully provided for by the Regulation above-mentioned.

A. D. 1805. REGULATION IX.

A Regulation for enacting into a Regulation certain articles of a Proclamation to be issued in the Conquered Provinces, situated within the Dooab and on the right bank of the river Jumna, and in the territory ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company in Bundlecund by the Peishwah.—Passed by the Governor-General in Council, on the 11th of July 1805; corresponding with the 29th Assaur 1212 Bengal era; the 29th Assaur 1212 Fusily; the 29th Assaur 1212 Waillaity; the 15th Assaur 1862 Sumbut; and the 13th Rubbee-us-Sany 1220 Higeree.

I. The following articles of a Proclamation, which is hereby addressed by the Governor-General in Council to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and othe actual proprietors of land, paying revenue to Government, in the Conquered Provinces situated within the Dooab (or country lying between the rivers Ganges and Jumna) and on the right bank of the river Jumna, ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by Dowlut Rao Scindiah, and in the territory situated in Bundlecund, on the right bank of the river Jumna, ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by the Peishwah, are enacted into a Regulation. Regulation IX. A. D. 1805.

II. Proclamation. Art. 1. Whereas, by Regulation IX, 1804, and Regulation VIII, 1805, the laws and regulations established by the British Government, for the internal administration of the provinces ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by the Nawaub Vizier, have been extended, with such modifications and qualifications as were deemed necessary, to the Conquered Provinces situated within the Dooab and on the right bank of Proclamation, Preamble.

Regulation IX. A. D. 1805.

of the river Jumna, ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by Dowlut Rao Scindiah, and to the territory in Bundlecund, situated on the righ bank of the river Jumna, ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by the Peishwah; and whereas it is the intention of the British Government, at the expiration of the current year 1212 fusily, to adopt a plan for the settlement of the land revenue in the said territories, upon principles of moderation and justice; and whereas it is of importance, that the terms and conditions of such settlement should be made known throughout the territories aforesaid, as early as may be practicable; and whereas it is essential to the security of the rights and interests of the Zemindars, and other landholders, in the said territories, that the nature of their right of property in their respective estates, under the terms and conditions hereafter recited, should be publicly acknowledged and declared; it is accordingly hereby proclaimed as follows.

The sayer to be separated from the mâl, and a settlement to be made for the latter, for three years, from the commencement of 1213 fusily, with the exception in the fifth article, at a fixed, equal, annual jumma

Huzzoory tehsil Zemindars to be responsible for the police, with certain exceptions

Settlement to be made at annual increase, in certain cases

III. Art. 2. At the commencement of the year 1213 fusily, the sayer of every denomination will be separated from the mâl, or land revenue; and a settlement will be concluded for the land revenue only, in all practicable cases, with the Zemindars, or other actual proprietors of the soil (unless when disqualified by notoriously bad character, or other good and sufficient cause), for a period of three years, viz. for the years 1213, 1214, and 1215 fusily (with the exception specified in the fifth article), at a fixed, equal, annual jumma; it being understood that such Zemindars as are huzzoor tehsil, or allowed to pay their kists immediately to the Collector of the zillah, shall be responsible for maintaining the police of their respective zemindarries, with the exception of the police in cities, large towns, and principal gunges, the expense of which will be defrayed by Government. In instances, however, in which, from calamity of season or other good and sufficient cause, any landholder may be unwilling to engage for his lands at such a jumma, for the first year of the lease, as Government would otherwise be entitled to demand, with a reference to the probable resources and produce of the lands during the whole of the lease, the settlement will be concluded, for the first lease of three years, at a fair and equitable annual increase, instead of a fixed, equal, annual jumma. The cabooleats executed by Zemindars, and other actual proprietors of land or farmers of land, shall contain a clause, restricting them from collecting sayer duties, or any duties whatever, in their respective estates or farms. The Collectors are required to explain fully the nature and extent of this restriction, in order that persons desirous of entering into engagements may regulate their proposals accordingly. No settlement shall be considered final, until it shall have received the sanction of the Governor-General in Council.

Rules for concluding a new settlement for four years on the expiration of the preceding one.

V. Art. 4. At the expiration of the year 1218 fusily, a new settlement will be concluded with the same persons (if willing to engage), for a further period of four years, viz. for the years 1219, 1220, 1221, and 1222 fusily (with the exception specified in the fifth article) at a fixed, equal, annual jumma, which jumma shall be formed, by adding to the annual rent of the second three years three-fourths of the net increase of the revenue during any one year of that period.

Rules for concluding the several settlements in zillah Bundlecund.

VI. Art. 5. The settlement of the land revenue in the territory in Bundlecund, ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by the Peishwah, to be formed at the commencement of the year 1213 fusily, will be concluded for one year only, in the first instance, under the general rules notified in this proclamation. The three succeeding settlements of the land revenue, in the territory aforesaid, will be concluded for the following periods of time; first, for the years 1214, 1215, and 1216 fusily; secondly, for the years 1217, 1218, and 1219 fusily; and thirdly, for the years 1220, 1221, and 1222 fusily; under the terms and conditions specified in this proclamation.

Nankar to be allowed to Zemindars in certain cases, and at what rate.

VIII. Art. 7. Those Zemindars who may decline entering into engagements for their estates, as also those Zemindars whose offers may be rejected by Government, shall, for the present, be allowed the same nankar which they have hitherto received from the ruling power for the time being; provided the rate of such nankar shall not, in either of the cases above stated, exceed ten per cent. on the jumma of the estate.

In instances in which lands are mortgaged, or transferred on security, the settlement to be made with the person in possession.

IX. Art. 8. With respect to such zemindarries as may have been mortgaged or transferred on security, and possesion thereof actually given to the mortgagees or sureties, the settlement will be made with the person in possession of the land, as the temporary representative of the proprietor, leaving the latter to obtain possession, either by a private settlement of accounts or by a judicial process.

Rule for concluding the settlement of small talooks, or estates, nominally included in large zemindarries.

In the event of a Zemindar considering himself aggrieved by a separation made, in conformity to the foregoing rule; or of a Talookdar being dissatisfied at not being separated from a zemindarry, agreeably to what he may have considered as his right; in either case, the party considering himself aggrieved will be at liberty to seek redress in the courts of justice. The Collectors, however, shall not allow any disputed claims to interfere with, or delay, the immediate conclusion of the settlement, which, in all doubtful cases, shall be made with the person in possession.

Where there are no proprietors, or the proprietors refuse to engage, a village settlement to be concluded for three years.

Exception with respect to Bundlecund.

Preference to be given to Mocuddums, Purdhauns, and respectable Ryots.

XI. Art. 10. With respect to such lands as are without proprietors, or the proprietors of which may decline entering into engagements, a village settlement shall be concluded for three years, from the commencement of the year 1213 or the year 1214 fusily, according as the settlement may be concluded in the provinces ceded by Dowlut Rao Scindiah, or in the territory ceded by the Peishwah, at a fixed, equal, annual jumma; with the reservation contained in the concluding part of the second article, relative to forming the settlement, in certain cases, at an annual increase. In instances in which a village settlement shall be concluded in Bundlecund at the commencement of the year 1213 fusily, such settlement shall be formed only for one year. In all cases of the description mentioned in this article, a preference will be given to the Mocuddums, Purdhauns, or respectable Ryots of the several villages.

Chunchur lands after one year, and bunjur lands after two years, shall be considered equal to politch. Bunjur lands after one year shall be considered equal to chunchur. In khas settlements, the bhaunt, or nuzzerana, shall be abolished. The wages of the Putwarries shall be paid by the Ryots; but the expense of the mussahut, or measuring, and valuing the crops, shall be defrayed by Government, in consideration of the additional pusseree received out of the politch crop. In concluding the settlement, the nankar to be deducted from the jumma, if not exceeding ten per cent

XVI. Art. 15 In concluding the settlement of the land revenue, in the territories mentioned in this proclamation, at the commencement of the year 1213 fusily, the allowance of nankar to such of the Zemindars as may engage for their lands shall be regulated by deducting the amount of the nankar from the jumma, and taking engagements from the Zemindars for the neat residue; provided that the deduction for nankar shall not, in any instance, exceed ten per cent. on the neat jumma.

Rules respecting the claims of persons having claims to lands, who shall not prefer the same within certain periods

XVII. Art. 16. Persons having claims to lands, for which engagements have been entered into with the present possessors, and who shall not prefer their claim to regain possession of the same within six months from the date (as recorded in the respective zillahs) of issuing this proclamation, shall not be entitled to be restored to the actual possession of such lands before the expiration of the year 1213 fusily, if the lands are situated in the zillah of Bundlecund, or before the expiration of the first triennial lease, ending with the year 1215 fusily, if the lands are situated in the zillah of Allyghur, the northern or southern division of the zillah of Seharunpore, or the zillah of Agra. Persons preferring such claims in the zillah of Bundlecund, after the expiration of the year 1213 fusily, and before the conclusion of the first triennial lease in that zillah ending with the year 1216 fusily, shall not be entitled to regain possession of the lands claimed by them, until such lease shall expire. Persons who shall not prefer their claims before the expiration of the first lease of three years (that is to say, before the commencement of the year 1216 fusily in the zillah of Allyghur, the northern or southern division of the zillah of Seharunpore, or the zillah of Agra, or before the commencement of the year 1217 fusily in the zillah of Bundlecund) shall not be entitled to regain possession of the lands claimed by them until the expiration of the ten years, or the commencement of the year 1223 fusily. But this rule shall not be considered to restrict persons from preferring their claims at any time within the ten years.

Report to be made to the Board of Revenue, when a Collector shall judge it inexpedient to conclude a settlement with a Zemindar proceedings to be held on the occasion.

XVIII. Art. 17. In instances in which a Collector shall judge it to be inexpedient to conclude a settlement with a Zemindar, he shall hold proceedings on the subject, detailing at large his reasons for rejecting the claim, with whatever information he may have obtained respecting such Zemindar; at the same time receiving the Zemindar's answer to the objections urged to his claim. The Collector shall then transmit the whole of his proceedings to the Board of Revenue, and shall await their determination thereon.

Large zemindarries not to be entrusted to Zemindars

XIX. Art. 18. The Collectors shall not, in any instance, intrust the settlement or the collection of the revenues of a considerable zemindarry to a Tehsildar. The settlement of all zemindarries of the above description shall be concluded immediately by the Collectors, to whom the revenue of such zemindarries shall also be immediately paid. In like manner, the Collectors shall conclude the settlement, and receive immediately into their respective treasuries the collections of all other lands which they can bring under their immediate superintendence, without detriment to their general avocations.

The settlement and collections of all other lands to be likewise managed by the Collectors, in all practicable cases

XX. Art. 19.

XX. Art. 19. In instances in which lands to a considerable amount shall be let in farm to one individual, and Government shall be of opinion, from the report of the Board of Revenue, that the other avocations of the Collector will admit of the measure, the rent of such farm shall be paid immediately into the treasury of the Collector, instead of being received through the channel of a Tehsildar.

Rent of considerable farms to be paid immediately into the treasuries of the Collectors, in certain cases.

XXI. Art. 20. With the view of obviating any misconstruction of the rule to be adopted, in adding to the jumma a portion of the increased produce, in concluding the settlements to be formed at the commencement of the fusily year 1216 and 1219, or 1217 and 1220 (according as the settlements shall be concluded in the provinces ceded by Dowlut Rao Scindiah, or in the territory ceded by the Peishwah), it is hereby declared, in explanation of the third and fourth articles of this proclamation, that the amount of the nankar to which the Zemindars will be entitled, conformably to the engagements entered into by them under this proclamation, shall be deducted from the actual yearly produce of their estates at the time of the expiration of each lease, and the actual increase of public revenue, to be assessed agreeably to the articles above specified, shall be calculated on the amount of the difference between the actual net produce, after such deduction, and the annual amount of the former lease. It is, at the same time, declared, that the portion of the increased produce relinquished to the Zemindars under the above-mentioned articles, on the formation of the successive settlements, shall be considered as precluding all claim, on the part of the Zemindars, to any further proportion of such increased produce, on account of nankar, in addition to the deduction which will be made and continued to them on this account.

Explanation of the third and fourth articles of this proclamation, respecting the rule to be adopted in adding to the jumma a portion of the increased produce, in concluding the future settlements.

XXII. Art. 21. A discretionary power is vested in the landholders to grant small portions of land, exempt from the payment of revenue, for the support of their village watchmen, whenever they shall prefer making such grants to paying the watchmen a pecuniary allowance. Such grants, however, shall be resumable on the death or removal of the persons to whom they may be made; and the lands thus exempted from the payment of rent, as well as any other lands held by public officers or private servants exempt from rent, in lieu of wages, and not forming part of any authorized lakheraje grants, or tenures, within the provisions of Regulations XXXI and XXXVI, 1803, shall be considered to form a component part of the malguzairy lands of the estates to which they may respectively appertain, for the revenue assessed upon which they will consequently be held responsible, in common with all other malguzairy lands included therein.

A discretionary power vested in the landholders to grant small portions of land for the support of village watchmen, exempt from the payment of rent

Such lands resumable, on the death or removal of the persons to whom they may be granted,

And considered responsible for the revenue assessed upon the estates to which they may respectively appertain.

XXIII. Art. 22. The Governor-General in Council hereby notifies to those Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands may be held khas, or let in farm, in consequence of their refusing to pay the assessment required of them under this proclamation, that the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands may be held khas, shall be restored to the management of their lands, upon their agreeing to the payment of the assessment which shall be required of them, in conformity to the prescribed rules for the settlement of the land revenue; and that the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands may be let in farm, shall not regain possession of their lands before the expiration of the period for which they may be farmed, unless the farmers shall voluntarily consent to make over to them the remaining term of their lease, and the Governor-General in Council shall approve of the transfer; but that, at the expiration of that period, upon their agreeing to the payment of the assessment which shall be required of them, they shall be reinstated, under the general regulations, in the management of their estates respectively.

Proprietors of lands held khas, or let in farm, to be restored to the management of the same, on agreeing to the payment of the required assessment Restriction with respect to lands let in farm

It is well known to the Zemindars, Talookdars, and other descriptions of landholders, in the provinces situated in the Dooab and on the right bank of the river Jumna, which have been ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by Dowlut Rao Scindiah and the Peishwah, that from the earliest times until the present period, the public assessment upon the lands has never been fixed; and that, according to established usage and custom, the rulers of those territories and their delegates have exercised a discretionary cretionary and despotic authority, in depriving them of the possession of their zemindarries, talooks, and other tenures, whereby their right of property therein has become precarious and of little value, whilst the lands, from being let in farm to strangers, or otherwise disposed of, have been impoverished, and the tenants and cultivators of the soil have been exposed to rapacity and oppression. With a view of promoting the interests of the landholders and to enhance the value of their estates, as well as to induce them to encourage their under-tenants and to extend cultivation, under the certainty that they will enjoy the fruits of their industry and good management, the Governor-General in Council has, by the rules contained in the preceding articles of this proclamation, not only directed a settlement to be immediately made with the Zemindars and other proprietors of land, who shall be willing to engage for the revenue of their respective estates, but has also declared that a permanent assessment shall be fixed, at the end of ten years, on such lands as shall be in a state of cultivation sufficiently advanced to render it proper to fix the assessment on the same in perpetuity; and the Governor-General in Council further declares the proprietary rights of all Zemindars, Talookdars, and other descriptions of landholders, possessing a right of property in the lands composing their zemindarries, talooks, or other tenures, to be confirmed and established, under the authority of the British Government, in conformity to the laws and usages of the country, and to the regulations which have been or shall be hereafter enacted by the Governor-General in Council.

Motives of the Governor-General in Council for abolishing this usage, and providing for a permanent assessment.

The following declarations published to proprietors of land

XXV. Art. 24. To prevent any misconstruction of the declaration contained in the foregoing article, the Governor-General in Council deems it to be necessary to publish the following declarations to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land.

Government to enact such regulations as they may think necessary for the welfare of the dependent Talookdars and cultivators, and proprietors not to withhold the revenue on that account.

1st. It being the duty of the ruling power to protect all classes of people, and more particularly those who, from their situation, are most helpless, the Governor-General in Council will, whenever he shall deem it proper, enact such regulations as he shall judge to be necessary for the protection and welfare of the dependant Talookdars, Ryots, and other cultivators of the soil; and no Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall be entitled, on this account, to make any objection to the discharge of the assessment on their lands, which they have respectively agreed, or may hereafter agree to pay.

All internal duties that may be hereafter established, to belong exclusively to Government

2d. The Governor-General in Council having, by Regulation XI, 1804, abolished all the duties coming under the denomination of sayer, rahdarry, zemindarry, or any other denomination, levied on goods or merchandize of any description, with the exception of the established duties levied by Government in bazars and gunges, which duties have been since abolished by Regulation VI, 1805 and a town duty established in lieu thereof; and it being provided by the second article of this proclamation, that all engagements for the land revenue entered into with Government shall be exclusive of sayer duties, and of all other collections not connected with the land revenue; the Governor-General in Council hereby declares, that if he should hereafter think it proper to establish any internal duties, and to appoint officers, on the part of Government, to collect them, no proprietor of land will be admitted to any participation thereof, or be entitled to make any claims for remissions of assessment on that account.

Jumma that may be assessed on alienated lands to belong exclusively to Government

3d. The Governor-General in Council will impose such assessment as he shall deem equitable on all lands held exempt from the public revenue, which have been or shall be proved to be so held, under illegal or invalid titles. The assessment thus imposed will belong to Government, and no proprietor of land will be entitled to any part of it.

Police allowances in land or money resumable by Government, on the proprietors being exonerated from the charge of keeping the peace.

4th. The jumma of those Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, with whom a settlement shall be concluded, under the terms set forth in the present proclamation, shall be considered exclusive of any allowances which may be made to them in the adjustment of their jumma, for maintaining tannahs or police establishments, and also of the produce of any lands which they may be permitted to appropriate for the same purpose; and the Governor-General in Council reserves to himself the option of resuming ing the whole or any part of such allowances, or of the produce of such lands, if he should at any time think it to be proper to exonerate the proprietors of land from the charge of keeping the peace, and to appoint officers, on the part of Government, to superintend the police of the country. The Governor-General in Council, however, declares, that the allowances, or the produce of lands, which may be thus resumed, will be appropriated to no other purpose but that of defraying the expense of the police.

Proprietors at liberty to transfer their lands, without the sanction of Government

XXVI. Art. 25. That no doubt may be entertained, whether it be lawful for proprietors of land to dispose of their estates without the previous sanction of Government, the Governor-General in Council notifies to the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, that they are at liberty to transfer to whomsoever they may think proper, by sale, gift, or otherwise, their proprietary rights in the whole or any portion of their respective estates, without applying to Government for its sanction to the transfer; and that all such transfers will be held valid, provided that they be conformable to the Mahommedan or the Hindoo laws (according as the religious persuasions of the parties to each transaction may render the validity of it determinable by the former or the latter code), and that they be not repugnant to any Regulations now in force, or which shall be hereafter enacted by the British Government. It is, at the same time, hereby declared, that no private transfer, by sale, gift, or otherwise, nor any private mortgage or other assessment upon land assessed with the public revenue, will be admitted, in any respect, to affect the indefeasible right of Government to hold all such lands answerable, in the first instance, for the public revenue assessed thereupon.

Provided the transfer be conformable to law, and not contrary to the Regulations

Such transfer declared not to affect the right to Government to hold the lands answerable for the revenue assessed thereon.

Rules for apportioning the fixed jumma on portions of estates, in the event of their being disposed of at public sale, or transferred by the proprietors, and on shares of estates divided amongst the joint proprietors, upon the transfer or division being notified to the Collector, or other prescribed officer.

XXVII. Art. 26. Whenever an entire estate (viz. the whole of any landed property for the assessment on which a distinct engagement has been or shall be entered into between Government and the proprietor, or which shall be separately assessed, although included in one engagement with other estates belonging to the same proprietor) shall be disposed of by public or private sale, without any subdivision of such estate, no new allotment of the jumma will be requisite, and the purchaser will succeed to all the rights of the former proprietor in the entire estate. But it is essential, that a declaration should be made of the principles upon which the public assessment, or jumma, charged upon any such estates, will be apportioned on the several divisions of it, in the event of the whole of it being transferred by public or by private sale, or otherwise, in two or more lots, or of a portion of it being transferred in one, or in two or more lots, or of its being joint property, and a division of it being made among the proprietors. The Governor-General in Council has accordingly prescribed the following rules for apportioning the public assessment in the several cases above-mentioned; and as Government might sustain a considerable loss of revenue by disproportionate allotments of that assessment, were the apportioning of it, in any of the cases above specified, to be left to the proprietors, it is hereby required, that all such transfers or divisions as may be made by the private act of the parties themselves, be notified to the Collector of the revenue of the zillah in which the lands shall be situated, or such other officer as Government shall in future prescribe, in order that the public assessment, or jumma, charged upon the whole estate, may be apportioned on the several shares in the manner hereafter directed; that the names of the proprietors of each share, and the jumma charged thereon, may be entered in the public register; and that separate engagements for the payment of the jumma assessed upon each share may be executed by the proprietors, who will thenceforward be considered as proprietors of distinct estates. If the parties concerned in such transfers or divisions of estates shall omit to notify the same to the Collector of the revenue of the zillah, or such other officer as shall hereafter be prescribed, for the purposes before-mentioned, the whole of the original estate will be held responsible to Government for the discharge of the jumma assessed upon it, in the same manner as if no such transfer or division had ever taken place. The Governor-General in Council deems it to be necessary further to notify, in elucidation of the declarations contained in this article, that if any Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall dispose of a portion of his or her lands as a dependant talook, or any other under-tenure, to remain as a dependency, subject to the payment of rent to the proprietor of the estate of which such talook may form a part, the jumma of which may be stipulated to be paid

But the transfer of dependent talooks not to affect the rights or claims of Government in any respect.

paid by the dependant Talookdar, or other under-tenant, will not be entered in the records of Government, nor will the transfer exempt such lands from being answerable, in common with the remainder of the estate, for the payment of the public revenue assessed upon the whole of it, in the event of the proprietor, or his or her heirs or successors, falling in arrear, from any cause whatever; nor will such transfer be allowed, in any case, to affect the rights or claims of Government, any more than if it had never taken place.

1st. In the event of the whole estate of a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or shall be concluded, being exposed to public sale, by order of the Governor-General in Council, for the discharge of arrears of the public assessment, or in consequence of the decision of a court of justice, in two or more lots, the assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the public assessment upon the whole of the lands sold may bear to the whole of their actual neat produce. The neat annual produce is to be understood to be the neat annual rent, or other neat produce, receivable by the proprietor, after deducting from the gross rent, or other gross produce, the actual expenses of collection, and other usual charges of management, inclusive of the expense of embankments and similar incidental expenses, where such may be paid by the proprietor from his gross receipts; but exclusive of his malikanah, nankar, or other proprietary income, and all other personal appropriations of the gross produce of his estate, as such can have no claim to consideration, in determining the neat produce for an equal division of landed property, or for the allotment of the public assessment thereon, in conformity to the rules prescribed. The neat produce, as here defined, shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed by the Regulations; and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his, her, or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold them at the jumma at which they may be so purchased, subject to the general rules in force, at the time of sale, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

Explanation of the term, actual neat produce.

2d. When a portion of the estate of a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or shall be concluded, shall be exposed to public sale, by order of the Governor-General in Council, for the liquidation of arrears of assessments, or pursuant to the decision of a court of justice, the assessment upon such lands, if disposed of in one lot, shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to their actual neat produce, as the assessment upon the wholeof the lands of such proprietor, included in the same estate, may bear to the whole of their actual neat produce. If the lands sold shall be disposed of in two or more lots, the assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the assessment upon the whole of the lands of such proprietor, included in the same estate, may bear to the whole of their actual neat produce. The actual neat produce of the whole of the lands of such proprietor, whether the portion of such lands which may be sold be disposed of in one, or in two or more lots, shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed by the regulations; and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his, her, or their heirs or successors, will be allowed to hold them at the jumma at which they may be so purchased, subject to the general rules in force, at the time of sale, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

3d. When a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or shall be concluded, shall transfer the whole of his or her estate, in two or more distinct portions, to two or more persons, or a portion thereof to one person, or to two or more persons in joint property, by private sale, gift, or otherwise, the assessment upon each distinct portion of such estate, so transferred, shall be fixed by the Collector, or other authorized officer of Government, at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the assessment upon the whole of the estate of the transferring proprietor, of which the whole or a portion may be so transferred, may bear to the whole of its actual neat produce. This produce shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed in the Regulations; and the person or persons to whom such lands may be transferred, red, and his, or her, or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold them at the jumma at which they may be so transferred, after the same shall have been duly sanctioned and registered, and engaged for; subject to the general rules in force, at the time of transfer, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

4th. Whenever a division shall be made of lands, the settlement of which has been or shall be concluded with, or on behalf of, the proprietor or proprietors, and that are or may become the joint property of two or more persons, the assessment upon each share shall be fixed by the Collector, or other authorized officer of Government, at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual neat produce, as the jumma assessed upon the whole of the estate divided may bear to the whole of its actual neat produce. This produce shall be ascertained in the mode that is or shall be prescribed by the Regulations; and the sharers, and their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold their respective shares at the jumma which may be so assessed upon them, after the same shall have been duly sanctioned, registered, and engaged for, subject to the general rules in force, at the time of the division, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue.

XXVIII. Art. 27. The following rules are prescribed respecting the adjustment of the public assessment or jumma on the lands of Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands are, or may be, held khas, or let in farm by Government, in the event of their being disposed of by public sale, or transferred by any private act of the proprietor, or of their being joint property, and a division of them taking place amongst the proprietors.

1st. If the whole or a portion of the lands of a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, who may not have agreed to the payment of the assessment proposed to him or her, and whose lands are or shall be held khas, or let in farm by Government, shall be exposed to public sale, in one, or in two or more lots, pursuant to the decree of a court of justice, such lands, if khas, shall be disposed of at whatever assessment the Governor-General in Council shall deem equitable; and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his, or her, or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold the lands at the assessment at which they shall be so purchased, subject to the general rules in force, at the time of sale, for the periodical or permanent assessment of the land revenue. If the lands, at the time of their being exposed to sale, shall be held in farm, and shall be put up in one, or in two or more lots, they shall be disposed of under the following conditions. The purchaser or purchasers shall receive, during the unexpired part of the term of the lease of the farmer, whatever such proprietor shall have been entitled to receive, in virtue of his or her proprietary rights, on account of the lands so purchased; and such purchaser or purchasers shall, at the expiration of the lease of the farmer, be put in possession of the lands, on his or their engaging to pay such assessment as Government may deem equitable, under the general rules in force for the assessment of the land revenue.

2d. If a Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, whose lands are or may be held khas, or let in farm by Government, shall transfer, by private sale, gift, or otherwise, the whole or a portion of his or her lands, in one, or in two or more lots, and such transfer be legal and valid under the Regulations, the person or persons to whom the lands may be so transferred shall be considered to have succeeded to the whole of the proprietary rights of the former possessor, and will accordingly be entitled to receive any malikanah or nankar, to which the former proprietor was entitled, on account of the lands so transferred. Persons to whom such lands may be so transferred will stand in the same predicament as the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, or other actual proprietors of land, mentioned in the eighteenth article, whose lands are held khas or have been let in farm, in consequence of their refusing to pay the assessment required of them under this proclamation, and the declarations contained in that section are to be held applicable to them.

Regulation IX. A.D 1805.

3d. In the event of a division being made of lands, which are or shall become the joint property of two or more persons, and which are or shall be held khas, or let in farm by Government, the proprietors of the several shares will stand in the same predicament, with regard to their respective shares, as the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, specified in the eighteenth article, whose lands have been held in farm, or are held khas by Government, in consequence of their having refused to pay the assessment required of them; and the declarations contained in that section are to be considered applicable to them.

Nothing in the two preceding articles to preclude the revision of allotment of the assessment on portions of estates, in cases of evident error, collusion, or fraud

XXIX. Art. 28. Nothing in the two preceding articles shall be understood to preclude the revision and correction of allotments of the public assessment, upon portions of estates disposed of by public sale or private transfer, or upon the partition of joint estates, in cases of evident error, collusion, or fraud, for which provision has been made by Regulation XXVI. 1803, prescribing rules for the sale and division of lands paying revenue to Government; nor shall any thing in the foregoing section be construed to authorize the Collectors, or any other officers of Government, to determine finally the amount of the public assessment to be allotted upon the portion of an estate, whether publicly or privately disposed of, or divided between sharers, without the sanction of the Board of Revenue, as more fully provided for by the Regulation above-mentioned.

The Governor-General in Council, however, hereby notifies to the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, that the jumma which may be assessed on their estates, in the last year of the settlement immediately ensuing the present settlement, shall remain fixed for ever, in case the Zemindars shall now be willing to engage for the payment of the public revenue on those terms in perpetuity, and the arrangement shall receive the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors.

A. D. 1812. REGULATION IX.

A Regulation for modifying some of the Rules before enacted regarding the Settlement of the Ceded Provinces.—Passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 11th July, 1812; corresponding with the 29th Assar 1219 Bengal era, the 17th Assar 1219 Fusly; the 20th Assar 1219 Willaity; the 3d Assar 1869 Sumbut; and the 1st Rajeeb 1227 Higeree.

Regulation IX
A. D. 1812.

Preamble.

I. Whereas it was enacted, in Section 5, Regulation X, 1807, with respect to estates paying revenue to Government in the provinces ceded by his Excellency the Nawaub Vizier, that the jumma which might be assessed upon them in the last year of the quartennial settlement, commencing with the fusly year 1216, and terminating with the year 1219, should remain fixed for ever, provided that the arrangement should receive the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors; and whereas the Honourable Court, in the exercise of the discretion expressly reserved to them by the rule above cited, have not deemed it advisable to confirm that arrangement, the following rules have been enacted, to be immediately in force in the Ceded Provinces.

II. Such part of Section 5, Regulation X, 1807, as declares provisionally that the jumma, which may be assessed on the estates of the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land in the Ceded Provinces, shall remain fixed for ever, is hereby rescinded.

Certain part of Section 5, Regulation X, 1807, rescinded.

III. It

Declaration contained in Clause 4th, Section 29, Regulation XXV, 1803, respecting a permanent settlement to be concluded after a period of ten years, to be in full force and effect

III. It having been declared in Clause fourth, Section 29, Regulation XXV, 1803, with reference to the settlement then depending, that at the end of ten years, a permanent settlement would be concluded with the same persons (if willing to engage, and if no others having a better claim should come forward), for such lands as might be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms as Government should deem fair and equitable, the said rule is hereby declared to be in full force and effect.

The Board of Commissioners to ascertain what estates are in a state of cultivation to warrant the conclusion of a permanent settlement, and rules for the formation of it

IV. Under the provision contained in the preceding Section, it will of course be the duty of the Board of Commissioners to ascertain what estates may be in a state of cultivation to warrant the conclusion of a permanent settlement. In all such cases, a revision shall be made of the jumma assessed on the said estates, on the principle of leaving to the proprietors a net income of ten per cent. on the jumma, exclusive of charges of collection; and a settlement shall be concluded with the proprietors, subject, of course, to the approval of the Governor-General in Council accordingly. The jumma which may be so fixed on the estates of the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land, shall in conformity to the tenor of the proclamation originally issued by the late Lieutenant-Governor and Board of Commissioners, and afterwards incorporated into Regulation XXV, 1803, remain fixed for ever.

Report to be made to Government of such estates as may not be in a sufficiently improved state to admit the conclusion of a permanent settlement

V. Under the rule contained in Section 3 of this Regulation, it will likewise be the duty of the Board of Commissioners to submit to the Governor-General in Council a report, specifying the estates which may not appear to be yet in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to admit of the conclusion of a permanent settlement, without a sacrifice of those resources which may hereafter be derived from them for the exigencies of Government. In all cases of that nature, the Governor-General in Council will determine, on consideration of the information which may be furnished by the Board of Commissioners, whether the settlement of such estates shall be made for the term of three or five years, or for any other period, according as may appear most conducive to the public interests.

A. D. 1812. REGULATION X.

A Regulation for modifying some of the Rules before enacted, regarding the Settlement of the Conquered Provinces lying on the right and left banks of the River Jumna, of the Territory ceded by his Highness the Peishwa in Bundlecund, and of the District of Cuttack.—Passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 11th July 1812; corresponding with the 29th Assar 1219 Bengal era; the 17th Assar 1219 Fusily; the 20th Assar 1219 Willaity; the 3d Assar 1869 Sumbut; and the 1st Rajeeb 1227 Higeree.

I. Whereas it was provided by Section 7, Regulation IX, 1805, in regard to estates paying revenue to Government in the Conquered Provinces, lying on the right and left banks of the River Jumna, that three temporary settlements, comprehending altogether a period of ten years, should be made with the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land, and in regard to the territory ceded by his Highness the Peishwa in Bundlecund, that four temporary settlements should be made, comprehending also a period of ten years, and that at the end of the said ten years, expiring with the year 1222 fusily, a permanent settlement should be concluded with the same persons (if willing to engage, and if no other persons having a better claim should come forward), for such lands as might be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms as Government should deem fair and equitable; and whereas the principle of the foregoing rules was likewise adopted, in its fullest extent, in the district of Cuttack, in so much that it is declared in the 6th article of the proclamation incorporated into Regulation XII, 1805, that at the end of the year 1222 a permanent settlement would be concluded with the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land, for such lands as might be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms as Government should deem fair and equitable; and whereas it is enacted in Sections 5 and 6, Regulation X, 1807, that at the expiration of the temporary settlement then about to take place, the jumma which might be assessed on the estates, in the last year of the settlement, should should remain fixed for ever, in case the arrangement should receive the confirmation of the Honourable the Court of Directors; and whereas the Honourable Court, in the exercise of the discretion expressly reserved to them by the rules above cited, have not deemed it advisable to confirm that arrangement, the following rules have been enacted, to be immediately in force in the Conquered Provinces lying on the right and left banks of the river Jumna, in the territory ceded by His Highness the Peishwa in Bundlecund, and in the district of Cuttack.

Certain parts of Sections 5 and 6, Regulation X, 1807, rescinded.

II. Such parts of Sections 5 and 6, Regulation X, 1807, as declare provisionally that the jumma which may be assessed on the estates of the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of lands, in the abovementioned territories, shall remain fixed for ever, is hereby rescinded.

Declaration contained in Section 7, Regulation IX, and Clause 6th, Section 4, Regulation XII, 1805, respecting a permanent settlement to be concluded after a period of ten years, to be in full force and effect.

III. It having been declared in Section 7, Regulation IX, and Clause 6th, Section 4, Regulation XII, 1805, with reference to the settlement then depending, that at the end of ten years (that is, at the expiration of the fusily year 1222), a permanent settlement would be concluded with the same persons (if willing to engage, and if no others having a better claim should come forward), for such lands as might be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms as Government should deem fair and equitable, the said rule is hereby declared to be in full force and effect.

The Board of Commissioners and Board of Revenue, respectively, to ascertain what estates are in a state of cultivation to warrant the conclusion of a permanent settlement, and rules for the formation of it

IV. Under the provision contained in the preceding Section, it will of course be the duty of the Board of Commissioners and Board of Revenue, in the places subject to their control respectively, to ascertain, previously to the expiration of the year 1222, what estates may be in a state of cultivation to warrant the conclusion of a permanent settlement. In all such cases, a revision shall be made of the jumma assessed on the said estates, on the principle of leaving to the proprietors a net income of ten per cent. on the jumma, exclusive of charges of collection, and a settlement shall be concluded with the proprietors, subject, of course, to the approval of the Governor-General in Council accordingly. The jumma which may be so fixed on the estates of the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land, shall, in conformity to the tenor of the proclamations originally issued, and afterwards incorporated into Regulations IX and XII, 1805, remain fixed for ever.

Reports to be made to Government of such estates as may not be in a sufficiently improved state to admit the conclusion of a permanent settlement.

V. Under the rule contained in Section 3 of this Regulation, it will likewise be the duty of the Board of Commissioners and Board of Revenue to submit to the Governor-General in Council a report, specifying the estates which may not appear to be yet in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to admit of the conclusion of a permanent settlement, without a sacrifice of those resources which may hereafter be derived from them for the exigencies of Government. In all cases of that nature, the Governor-General in Council will determine, on consideration of the information which may be furnished by the Board of Commissioners and Board of Revenue, whether the settlement of such estates shall be made for the term of three or five years, or for any other period, according as may appear most conducive to the public interests.

Revenue Letter from Bengal. 14 Dec 1811.

Par. 66. In order to complete the general review of the collection of the different branches of the public Revenue, noticed in the preceding paragraph, we have the honour to transmit, a separate number, a copy of a letter from the Board of Revenue, inclosing a statement of the lands advertized, and actually sold, for the recovery of arrear of public assessment in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, (excepting Cuttack), in the year 1216 B.S. and F.S.

67. The jumma of the lands actually sold is only Rupees 83,485, the amount of the purchase-money Rupees 2,32,451.

68. It would be superfluous to offer any remarks on statements which, of themselves, indicate so strongly the agricultural prosperity of the country.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,
Dated the 28th October 1814.

Letter from, dated 14th December 1811.

(Par. 66 to 68.) Lands sold for the recovery of arrears of revenue.

38. WE have read with attention the information contained in these paragraphs, videlicet, that the lands advertised and actually sold for the recovery of public assessment, on account of fusily 1216, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, (excepting Cuttack), bore a jumma of only Rupees 83,485, and that the purchase-money amounted to Rupees 2,32,451.

39. To enable us to judge of the value of landed property in the Lower Provinces, it is desirable that the next statement you transmit of a similar kind should be accompanied with an estimate of the rent payable to the Zemindar from the lands exposed to sale. If, when the permanent settlement was introduced, the Zemindar's allowances amounted to no more than ten per cent. upon the Government jumma, their interest in the lands disposed of in fusily 1216 must have sold for near twenty-eight years' purchase, which (taking the common interest of money in India to be ten per cent.) is equal to near fifty-six years' purchase in Europe. It follows, therefore, that the Zemindar's allowances must, from the beginning, have greatly exceeded their nominal amount, or that their emoluments must have subsequently been increased by arbitrary exaction, or that, in the interval, the agricultural prosperity of the country and the value of landed property must have advanced with a rapidity, perhaps beyond example.

76. On referring to your Consultations of 22d October, 1811, we find that Mr. Dowdeswell, before relinquishing the office of Acting President of the Board of Revenue, submitted to you his sentiments on some of the most important questions then depending in the Revenue Department; and though no notice is taken in your dispatch now under reply, either of his suggestions or of the remarks made upon them in the letter addressed to the Board of Revenue by your Chief Secretary, we think them deserving of special attention.

77. In this minute are brought under your notice the difficulties and inconveniences, both to Government and individuals, attendant upon the separation of estates, at the desire of the joint sharers, or for sale, to liquidate balances against estates, as proceeding from the very imperfect knowledge existing of the produce, extent, and boundaries of the lands. As a means of remedying the evil, he recommended "the revival of the office of Canongoe, and the "modifying of that of Putwarree, in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, upon the "same footing on which these offices are constituted in Benares, and the "Ceded and Conquered Provinces."

78. We have often had occasion to regret the suppression of the office of Canongoe in Bengal persuaded as we are, that though the records of it are not to be entirely depended upon, yet the minute information they contain, respecting the rents and revenues, and other matters connected with the concerns of cultivation, is exceedingly useful in duly conducting the fiscal administration of an Indian country: we therefore authorize the re establishment of this office in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa.

79. In a letter from the Collector of Bhaugulpore, dated 6th of December 1787, we find the following account of the duties of the office of Canongoe. After enumerating the papers which composed their records, he says, "These "accounts, when faithfully taken, gave the complete history of a zemindairy: "comprehending the ground in cultivation; particularizing the portion of it "which paid rent to Government, and of that which was held free; the "customs and usages established by former Aumils, and those introduced by "the Aumils of the time being; the amount in demand for every Ryot, with the "balance remaining against any of them at the end of the year; every head "under which these collections were made, together with the expenses of col- "lection. In short, the object of the Canongoe's office was to supply such infor- "mation respecting the country, that no circumstance of advantage in the admi- "nistration of it should be concealed, nor the Zemindar enabled to appropriate "any more of the product of it to himself than the share allotted to him by Go- "vernment; that no lands should be separated from the jumma, or rent-roll, "without authority, and that the real value of the land yielding revenue might "be known at the end of one year, as a rule for farming it, or keeping it khas "(or in the hands of Government) for the next, either of which modes it was the "right of Government to adopt." The Collector further observes, that in Bengal, even at that time, "little of the office remained besides the name, and the "salaries annexed. In Behar, where the ancient usages of the provinces have "undergone fewer alterations, the Canongoes have retained more of the "exercise of their functions, although, as might be expected, they have often "been made subservient to the purposes of the Zemindars."

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 28 October 1814.

80. When the office of Canongoe, sudder and mofussil, was abolished, regulation VIII, 1800, was passed, directing the preparation of a pergunnah register of lands, malguzarry and lakheraje, according to a certain form therein prescribed. The object of this Regulation seems to have been, in some measure, to supply the place of the records formerly kept in the Canongoe's office; but this object has been so very imperfectly accomplished as to amount to a failure.

81. We are still more strongly impressed with the necessity of placing the office of Putwarry on an efficient footing: a point which we, indeed, very earnestly pressed in our letter of the 29th January 1813, and in a former letter; for without the information derived from village records, not only is that of the Canongoe in a great measure nugatory, but the Government must ever remain in darkness as to mofussil affairs, on which it is so necessary that both Judges and Collectors should have the best obtainable means of information, to enable them satisfactorily to perform their important duties.

82. By Regulation VIII. of 1793, every Zemindar who had not established a Putwarry in each village within his estate, to keep the accounts of the Ryots, as required by the original rules of the decennial settlement of the three provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, was immediately to appoint one to each village, unless in such instances as the Board of Revenue might deem it unnecessary to have a separate one for each. The Zemindars were further required to deposit in the Dewanny Adawlut, the Collector's cutcherry, and the principal cutcherry in each mehaul or pergunnah, a list of the Putwarrees in their respective estates, and the names of the villages the accounts of which they may be severally appointed to keep; and they were to notify, every three months, to the court and the Collector, all vacancies that might occur, and the names of the persons whom they might appoint to fill them.

83. The reasons for making these provisions, as they are stated in the sixty-second section of the above mentioned Regulation, very clearly demonstrate the importance that was attached to the duty of keeping up the village accounts by the Putwarrees. "The rules hereafter prescribed regarding Putwarrees, "are framed solely to facilitate the decision of suits in the courts of judicature, "between proprietors and farmers of lands and persons paying rent or revenue "to them, and to guard against any diminution of the fixed revenue of Go-"vernment or injustice to individuals, by enabling the Collectors to procure "the necessary information and accounts for allotting the public jumma upon "estates that may be divided agreeably to the principles prescribed in Regu-"lation I, 1793." It is added, that the rules laid down in the Regulation "could be objected to by those only who had it in contemplation, in the event "of the division and transfer of a portion of their estates, to deprive Govern-"ment of a part of the fixed revenue, or defraud some of the partners in "their estates, by obtaining a disproportionate allotment of the public as-"sessment on the several shares, or to oppress the persons paying rent "or revenue to them with impunity, by withholding from the courts of "justice the documents necessary to enable them to afford redress to the "complainant."

84. With this evidence before us, of the necessity which you conceived to exist for the efficient establishment of Putwarrees in 1793, and after having formally provided, in the manner we have shown, at that period, for carrying this arrangement into effect, it certainly is not creditable to former administrations in Bengal, that nothing effectual should yet have been accomplished on this head, although the serious evils which arose in consequence of it were daily experienced: nor is it less dissatisfactory to us, that the first intimation which we received from you of the inefficient and ill-organized state of the Putwarry department in the Lower Provinces was in a dispatch of so late a date as the 14th December 1811.

85. Mr. Dowdeswell's remarks upon the oppressions practised by the landholders, in the distress and sale of property for the recovery of arrears of rent from Ryots, have much engaged our attention, and we have found on your records powerful confirmations of their truth. We shall be glad to find that Regulation V of 1812, which has been passed since Mr. Dowdeswell's minute was recorded, for the purpose of amending some of the rules then in force for the collection of the land revenues, will have the effect of relieving the husbandman from the injustice and extortion to which he was exposed, under the operation of Regulation VII, 1799, and at the same time secure to the Zemindar or farmer the ready realization of his just demands; but, we must own, the provisions of that regulation appear to us but very imperfectly calculated to attain these objects.

86. It is certainly desirable, that the suggestions recorded by Mr. Dowdeswell, before quitting his seat at the Revenue Board, respecting the best means of drawing a revenue from the extensive tracts of land which have been reclaimed from jungle, commonly called the Sunderbuns, and from lands gained by alluvion, should undergo the most serious and deliberate consideration. In offering these suggestions, Mr. Dowdeswell has, with great propriety, guarded against any construction being put upon them, inconsistent with the principles of the permanent settlement and the subsisting engagements between Government and the landholders. "Those engagements and those rules," he observes, "guarantee to the proprietors the full benefit of lands which have been, "or may be, reduced to cultivation, within the ascertained boundaries of their "respective estates. It will scarcely, however, be maintained, that the principle "extends to the large tracts of land ordinarily called the Sunderbuns, to the "territory on the borders of Chittagong and other frontier districts, to the ex- "tensive forests which have been more or less cultivated in the interior of some "of the districts, and to lands gained by alluvion in many parts of the country, "which, so far from being the acknowledged property of any particular indivi- "duals, are a perpetual source of dispute and of the most serious affrays be- "tween the proprietors of adjacent lands." He further adds, "I cannot, of "course, pretend to determine, with any sort of precision, the amount of "revenue which might be derived from the lands so described. I can only "observe, generally, that I am strongly impressed with a belief, that it would "be considerable, compared with the improvement which could be effected in "any branch of the existing resources, or with any new tax which could be "established in this country."

87. The general principle on which it appears to us that your decision ought to rest is this: that all lands which were not alienated by Government at the period when the permanent settlement was concluded, ought to be considered as the property of Government; or, to state the position in a yet more unobjectionable form, that lands which were not included within the boundaries of estates permanently assessed, are still liable to such assessment as Government may think fit to impose. Much inquiry and circumspection will doubtless be necessary, in order to a just application of this principle; particularly in the case of lands gained by alluvion, whether from a recession of the sea or a deviation in the course of rivers: and the utmost degree of care must be taken to prevent any apprehension of a design, on the part of Government, to infringe the conditions of a compact, to the maintenance of which our faith is irrevocably pledged. We are persuaded however, that under judicious arrangements, a very considerable accession of revenue may be derived from the lands in question, not only without injury, but without giving just cause of complaint to any class of individuals.

88. We understand, from the seventh paragraph of Mr. Secretary Edmonstone's letter to the Board of Revenue, dated 22d October, 1811, that an engineer officer was then employed in surveying the Sunderbuns.* The survey, when completed, will materially facilitate the inquiries of the revenue officers respecting

* Large tracts of woodland, which were retained in the hands of Government, when the permanent settlement was concluded, and from which Calcutta has derived a supply of fuel.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 28 October 1814.

respecting the extent of the lands in question; but a more detailed survey will be requisite to adjust the assessment to the productive powers of the soil brought into cultivation, and to the details of such a survey the natives would, under proper instructions, be rendered fully competent.

89. We are decidedly of opinion, that it would be unadvisable to expose these lands to public sale, by which means they would probably fall into the hands of Calcutta Banyans. The settlement should be concluded with the actual occupiers, and it ought to be limited to the lands already brought into cultivation, whilst, at the same time, every reasonable encouragement should be held out to reclaim the lands still remaining waste. A stipulation exempting lands of the latter description from assessment for a few years after they are reclaimed, would operate as an encouragement to industry, without compromising the permanent interests of Government.

90. It is desirable also (provided it can be done without much inconvenience) that a separate account should be kept of the revenue which may be drawn from the lands to which these observations refer.

91. These are the only remarks which now occur to us upon this highly important topic; to which we cannot, with too much earnestness, direct your attention. We shall, of course, be furnished with a report of your proceedings on the subject.

92 The last suggestion of Mr. Dowdeswell relates to abuses believed to be committed with respect to the pension list, by the descendants or relations of persons to whom pensions were granted, continuing to receive them after the death of the grantees. It being apprehended that considerable difficulty will attend the correction of this abuse, solely by means of the local authorities, we approve of the intention announced by the Vice-president in Council, of deputing one of the members of the Board of Revenue to assist in conducting the investigation thought to be indispensable for its suppression.

(Par. 107) Irrecoverable balances ordered to be struck off the public accounts

97. After perusing the Consultations referred to in this paragraph, in paragraph 15 of your letter dated 21st March, and in paragraph 112 of your letter dated 30th October 1812, the only observation that occurs to us upon the proceedings therein recorded, respects the heavy balances which have accrued, particularly in the districts of Tirhoot, Shahabad, Burdwan, and Nuddea, in consequence of the sale, on account of Government, of mehals which did not yield a sufficient sum to discharge the arrears of assessment, and occasionally in consequence of a reduction in the jumma on the re-settlement of forfeited estates. It is not easy to reconcile an accumulation of irrecoverable arrears from such causes, with the facts stated in paragraphs 66 to 68 and 90 and 91 of your letter now under reply. In the former of the two passages referred to, the purchase-money of lands, yielding a jumma of Rupees 83,485, and exposed to sale in fusily 1216, is said to have amounted to Rupees 2,32,451; and from the latter passage it appears, that in the case of some mehals, the immediate property of Government, which had been sold on public account in 1810, a rise of about 10,000 Rupees had been obtained in the jumma, besides a sum of Rupees 1,88,955 which had been paid for the mehals in question, subject to that increased rate of assessment. These facts were mentioned by you, for the purpose of showing the enhanced value of landed property in the territories subject to your government. Some explanation, therefore, seems to be necessary, with reference to the apparently contradictory facts contained in the letter addressed to you by the Board of Revenue on the 22d March 1811, with the view of accounting for the irrecoverable arrears of 1210 and 1211 (1805 and 1806), from which we are left to conclude, not only that in many instances the price paid for the sequestered estates had been inadequate to discharge the arrears of the previous assessment, but also that, in some instances, a reduction had taken place in the subsequent assessment. You are accordingly directed to furnish us with an explanation of this apparent discordance, which we confess ourselves at present unable to reconcile.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,
The 22d October 1811.

Minute by Mr. Dowdeswell, late Senior Member of the Board of Revenue.

To N. B. Edmonstone, Esq., Chief Secretary to Government,

SIR:

Mr. Dowdeswell's Minute, 19 October 1811.

1. I request that you will inform his Excellency the Vice-president in Council, that Mr. Rocke being arrived at the Presidency, I propose, in conformity to what I understand to be the intentions of Government, to discontinue my attendance at the Board of Revenue. I shall, of course, cease to draw the extra allowance which was granted to me, of Rupees 1,500 per month, from the present date.

2. It was not to be expected that, with the duties of another office to discharge, I could do much more than attend to the current business of the Board of Revenue. There are some points, however, of a more general nature, to which I have not failed to direct my attention, and on which I am desirous of offering a few observations to his Excellency in Council, although they, in very few instances, require any orders from Government.

3. The questions to which I allude may be noticed under the following heads:

Customs.
Partition of estates.
Sales for the recovery of the arrears of assessment.
Distress and sale for the recovery of arrears of rent.
House-tax.
Revenue derivable from lands latterly reduced to cultivation.
Pensions.

4. Customs.—On assuming charge of the office of Acting President of the Board of Revenue, no branch of the public business appeared to me so immediately to require attention as the customs. Although the principles now established for the collection of those duties, at least of the Government customs, are in my judgment the soundest possible, the detailed provisions of the existing Regulations appeared to me to require in some instances modification; and at one station (Dacca), the practical introduction and proper application of the new Regulations, for a time demanded strict attention.

5. With respect to the former, I have drafted such rules as appeared to me necessary for the correction of some partial defects in the existing Regulations. Those rules are neither numerous nor important; and I have suggested to the Board of Revenue to suspend the transmission of them to Government, until they shall have ascertained whether any of the other provisions now in force require amendment.

6. The Regulations, generally, for the collection of the Government customs and town-duties, are now, I believe, duly enforced at Dacca. I cannot, however, but think that this branch of the public revenue ought to be more productive than it at present is at that station. I doubt not that every exertion will be made, which circumstances will admit, by the Acting Collector. I apprehend, however, that on the introduction of a new system, the business in question may require the undivided attention of one person. It would likewise be, in my judgment, expedient that the person so employed should be an officer of known experience and activity in that branch of the public service.

7. Partition of Estates.—The rules regarding the partition of estates still appear to me very defective. In proof of the justness of this opinion, I shall only observe that, during the seven months that I have officiated as a member of the Board of Revenue, we have only confirmed five butwarrahs, whether ordered during the time that I have sat at the Board or before that period. I need not dwell on the inconvenience, embarrassment, and loss experienced by individuals, from the delay attendant on the performance of that duty; an evil which must continue to be felt, until some other means than those which now exist shall be adopted, for the purpose of obtaining accounts of the produce, extent, and boundaries of estates.

Mr. Dowdeswell's Minute, 19 October 1811.

8. Sales for the Recovery of Arrears of Assessment.—Considerable difficulty is likewise experienced, arising also from the cause noticed in the preceding paragraph, in bringing lands to sale for the recovery of the arrears of assessment: the Board is consequently reduced to the necessity, on almost all occasions of that nature, of either advertising entire estates or fractional portions of estates, the latter of which expedients involves all the inconvenience already noticed regarding butwarrahs.

9. These difficulties and inconveniences will not, I conceive, be obviated, without reviving the office of Canongoe and modifying that of Putwarry, on the footing on which those offices are now constituted in Benares and the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, under Regulation IV. 1808. An arrangement of that nature would certainly be attended with some additional expense; but it merits consideration, whether the greater punctuality which might, by those means, be established in the collection of the public revenue, and the prevention of actual loss on the partition of estates, would not most fully counterbalance such expense. I shall not enlarge on the subject, not being prepared to offer any specific suggestions regarding it. The question of sales has, I know, occupied a considerable share of Mr. Buller's attention; and it is to be hoped, that he and Mr. Rocke, jointly, will be able to submit some rules calculated to obviate the inconvenience now experienced.

10. Distress and Sale of Property for the Recovery of Arrears of Rent.—No branch of the business of the Board of Revenue has engaged more of my attention than the distress and sale of property for the recovery of arrears of rent. Satisfied of the oppressions which are frequently committed by the landholders in the exercise of this power, I, shortly after I had taken my seat at the Board, recommended my sentiments at some length on the subject, The Collectors generally were, in consequence, directed to submit their opinions regarding the abuses which I was led to suppose existed, and the best means of obviating them in future. I likewise endeavoured to obtain, through private channels, such information as might be best calculated to assist my judgment in preparing rules for the prevention of the existing abuses. The reports of the Collectors have hitherto been only in part received; and, from all the inquiries which I have made on the subject, the modification of the present rules appears to me a work of great difficulty The question will, of course, be further discussed at the Board of Revenue; and if I can now afford any further assistance in the business, I shall be most happy to do so.

11. House-tax.—Considerable progress has been made in the assessment of the tax on houses; and it may reasonably be expected that it will be shortly completed throughout Bengal, Behar, and Orissa.

12. From the experience hitherto obtained on the subject, it appears clear that the tax cannot be an object to Government, except at the cities and in the suburbs of Calcutta. At those places (at least at the cities), I am led to believe, from all that I have heard on the subject, that a considerable degree of irritation still prevails on account of the tax, and that years must elapse before that irritation will altogether subside.

13. If this view of the subject be correct, the sacrifice of two or three lacs of rupees (for I do not conceive that the aggregate amount of the tax will exceed that sum) may not perhaps be thought too much to conciliate the affections of the large bodies of people composing the cities and principal towns, and by these means to draw closer the ties which unite the community to the Government.

14. If, however, the produce of the tax be still deemed an object of moment, I would suggest that it be commuted for a tax on the licenses issuable to the several classes of people specified in Section 12, Regulation I. 1811. Such tax would rather aid than obstruct the reform of police, by eventually reducing the number of persons employed in the trades in question, who require to be vigilantly watched by the police; and if the Regulation and tax were extended to the Western Provinces, as might hereafter be done, the produce of the latter would, in all probability, be equal to that of the tax on houses.

15. Should these suggestions appear to merit attention, it may, of course, be also considered whether the tax on houses in the suburbs of Calcutta might not be be still continued, where the greater part of the objections which may be urged to the tax in other places do not exist.

16. Revenue derivable from Lands latterly reduced to Cultivation.—Any observations which I could make on this subject, would consist only of a repetition of the remarks and suggestions which I have recorded regarding it at the Board of Revenue; I therefore beg leave to submit a copy of that minute, for the information of his Excellency in Council.

17. Pensions.—Having a strong impression that considerable abuses existed with respect to the pension list, the attention of the Collectors was, at my suggestion, drawn to the subject, as will appear from the enclosed copy of a circular order issued to them on the 10th of July last. The reports of some of the Collectors have been received, on which such orders as the nature of the case admitted have been passed; the remaining reports will, of course, come under the consideration of Mr. Rocke and Mr. Buller. I apprehend, however, that a more strict inquiry than has been hitherto instituted will be requisite fully to detect and prevent, in future, the abuses above noticed.

I have, &c.

Mr. Dowdeswell's Minute above referred to.

Mr. Dowdeswell's Minute, 16 October 1811.

Previously to relinquishing my temporary seat at the Board of Revenue, I am desirous of recording some remarks and suggestions, respecting the best means of drawing a revenue from the vast tracts of land which have been reclaimed from jungle, and from lands gained by alluvion, whether by the recession of the sea or by the alteration of the course of rivers, so far as that object can be accomplished, consistently with the principles on which the permanent settlement was concluded.

Eighteen years have now elapsed since that monument of the wisdom, justice, and moderation of the British Administration was established. It is assumed above, that vast tracts of land have been reduced to cultivation during that period: a point which few, I imagine, will be disposed to dispute, but which, at all events, appears susceptible of easy proof. It is computed by writers on political economy, that the population of a country, where no extraordinary checks oppose its natural progress (which certainly is not the case in these provinces), will double itself in twenty years. If, then, the cultivation of the country had not kept pace with the increase of its population, its produce would, at the present day, be totally insufficient for the support of its inhabitants. Exclusively of this consideration, almost every person's observation leads him to remark the extension of cultivation in one part of the country or another; and we have every reason to suppose, that estates which before only yielded to the proprietors a surplus produce of ten or twelve per cent. on the jumma, now yield them a surplus produce of thirty, forty, or fifty per cent.

It will not, I trust, for a moment be inferred from these remarks, that I have the slightest design of suggesting any measures at variance with the principles of the permanent settlement; that is, with a fair construction of the engagements subsisting between Government and the landholders, or a liberal interpretation of the rules on which those engagements are founded.

Those engagements and those rules guarantee to the proprietors, as I conceive, the full benefit of lands which have been or may be reduced to cultivation, within the ascertained boundaries of their respective estates. It will scarcely, however, be maintained, that this principle extends to the large tracts of land ordinarily called the Sunderbunds; to the territory on the borders of Chittagong and other frontier districts; to the extensive forests which have been more or less cultivated in the interior of some of the districts, and to lands* gained by alluvion in many parts of the country, which so far from being the acknowledged property of any particular individuals, are a perpetual source source of dispute, and of the most serious affrays between the proprietors of adjacent lands.

Mr. Dowdeswell's Minute, 16 October 1811.

It remains to be considered, whether, after setting aside the lands cultivated during the last eighteen years, in virtue of the immunities granted to the Zemindars, by the principles of the permanent settlement, the resumption of the revenues of the remaining lands, as described generally in the preceding paragraph, would be an object to Government. I cannot, of course, pretend to determine, with any sort of precision what the amount of the revenue might be; I can only observe, generally, that I am strongly impressed with the belief that it would be considerable, compared with the improvement which could be effected in any branch of the existing resources, or with any new tax which could be established in this country. On this point, however, any inquiries may, of course, be made by the Board, which they may deem necessary to enable them to form their judgment on the question.

Should it ultimately be determined to adopt any measures, with the view of drawing a revenue from the lands described in this minute, I would strongly recommend that the course laid down in Regulation VIII. 1811, for cases something similar, be observed in the present instance; that is, that the right of Government to the revenue of the lands in question be first decided by the Revenue Authorities, leaving the individuals, who may thereby deem themselves aggrieved, to try the merits of the case by the institution of a regular suit in the Adawlut.

I now submit the whole to the Board, with my request that this minute may be forwarded, when convenient, to the Vice-president in Council, with the Board's sentiments on the subject. Should it be resolved to adopt any measures, with a view to the resumption of the revenue of the lands above described, I am aware that some circumspection may be requisite, to prevent unfounded apprehension of an infringement of the permanent settlement. I conceive, however, that the line of distinction between the lands which are and are not included in that settlement, as already stated in general terms in this minute, is quite plain and clear; an explicit declaration, therefore, on that point, would necessarily preclude all reasonable grounds for alarm, with respect to the intentions of Government.

16th October, 1811. (Signed) G. DOWDESWELL.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL, Dated the 7th October, 1815.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 7 October 1815.

Letter to, dated 28th October, 1814. (Par 38 and 39.) Observations on sales of land for the recovery of arrears of revenue, and requiring estimate of rent payable to Zemindars from lands exposed to sale.

Par. 13. We apprehend that considerable difficulty would be experienced in any attempt to form an accurate estimate of the rent payable to the Zemindars, from estates exposed to public sale for arrears of revenue.

14. The abolition of the office of Canongoe, and the want of village records in which confidence could be reposed, combined with the habitual jealousy of the proprietors, would render any scrutiny of that nature generally fruitless; and it would seldom, we apprehend, be practicable to procure that accurate information and those detailed accounts, on which alone such an estimate could be formed.

15. With these impressions, we have not thought it advisable to institute any inquiry regarding the points noticed by your Honourable Court; but should the office of Canongoe ever be generally revised, and the office of Putwarry placed on a proper footing, less difficulty will certainly attend the discussion of any question of that nature.

(Par. 76 to 91.) Notice Mr. Dowdeswell's Minute, recommending the revival of the office of Canongoe, and regret its suppression. Recommend also the placing of the office of Putwarry on an efficient footing.

21. We shall give every possible attention to the observations contained in these paragraphs; and, in the mean time, the Board of Revenue have been furnished with a copy of paragraphs 79 to 91, and directed to make the remarks and suggestions of your Honourable Court objects of their early and particular attention. It is our intention shortly to furnish the Board of Revenue with more explicit instructions regarding the revival of the office of Canongoe, and the reform of the office of Putwarry, in the districts subject to their superintendence, with a view to the more easy adjustment of disputed claims between landlord and tenant, and generally between all persons, from the Sudder Malguzar to the actual cultivator of the soil, and to the accomplishment of the other objects for which those instructions were so eminently useful, previously to the year 1793. It appears to us to be an object of primary importance, to take into consideration the means which should be employed, in conjunction with the agency of the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry, for the purpose of accurately ascertaining the extent and boundaries of estates. The determination of this question will materially facilitate the partition of estates among individuals, and Government will thereby be enabled to derive a revenue from lands which, under the orders of your Honourable Court, are liable to a separate assessment.

30. A copy of this paragraph has been sent to the Board of Revenue, with directions to furnish the explanation required, which, together with any remarks that may appear to us necessary, will be transmitted to your Honourable Court by a future opportunity.

Letter to, dated 1st February 1811.
(Par 15 to 39.) Respecting the formation of the settlement of Cuttack.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 14 December 1811.

Par. 9. We have considered the observations contained in these paragraphs with all the attention which the importance of the subject, the justness of the principles stated in them, and the respect due from us to the sentiments of your Honourable Court require. At the period of writing them, your Honourable Court was in possession of the regulations adopted for the conclusion of the settlement in the district of Cuttack, and in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces generally. The comparative advantages of permanent and temporary settlements are fully discussed in the minutes of the Members of Government and of the Board of Revenue, to which we had the honour to solicit your attention in our address of the 15th September 1808; and the progress made in the practical discharge of the duty in question has been since fully stated, from time to time, to your Honourable Court. Little, therefore, can be said on the subject on the present occasion, which has not, in one form or other, been already submitted to your consideration. There are only three points noticed in the dispatch of your Honourable Court on which we would wish to offer a few brief remarks.

10. First. In treating of the advantages which may be derived from actual surveys, your Honourable Court observe, "that in the management of the "Conquered and Ceded Territories which have been annexed to the two sub-"ordinate Presidencies, this course has been successfully pursued, &c." Possessing only general knowledge of the measures adopted, with a view to the adjustment of the assessment in the territories dependent on the Presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay, and of the effect of those measures, we are necessarily precluded from offering any opinion upon the expediency of the surveys made in those parts of the British dominions; but the experience obtained on the subject in Bengal, would by no means warrant us in recommending that a similar course should be observed in the territories dependent on this Presidency. In former times, recourse was not unfrequently had to this expedient; but the chicanery and corruption practised by the large body of native officers necessarily employed in the performance of that duty, the exactions and injustice to which the Zemindars and others were consequently exposed, and the heavy expense with which all such surveys were attended, gradually induced succeeding Governments to abandon the plan of fixing the public assessment by an actual measurement and computation of the produce of the lands of each individual. The practice has long been entirely discontinued, and we are satisfied that the most experienced and capable of the revenue officers would deem the revival of it an evil, burthensome and oppressive to the people, and unproductive of any substantial benefit to the pecuniary interests of the state.

11. We must further remark, that this method of assessment appears particularly unsuited to the condition of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, where the lands are in general parcelled out into small properties, the joint owners of which are themselves the cultivators of the soil; and a minute scrutiny into the resources of the estates is consequently far more difficult than in provinces where the cultivation is in the hands of tenants holding of superior Zemindars, and where a measurement and survey ascertain the rents payable by the Ryots to the Zemindars, as a preparatory step to the assessment of the public demand on the landholder.

12. It will, of course, be understood, that in the foregoing remarks we allude only to those minute surveys or measurements, to which, as already noticed, recourse was formerly occasionally had, for the purpose of fixing the public assessment. With respect to surveys made by professional persons, with the view of obtaining more correct geographical information of the actual state of the country, we cannot, of course, be insensible of the advantages with which they are attended in every branch of its internal administration.

13. Second. In the nineteenth paragraph of your letter, your Honourable Court is pleased to observe as follows: "In our revenue letter dated 27th February 1810 (paragraphs 14 to 17), we communicated to you our opinion, "that it would be premature to introduce the permanent settlement into the "Upper Provinces at so early a period of our connexion with them, and in so "imperfect a stage of our acquaintance with their resources."

14. From that and other passages in your dispatch, it appears to be supposed that the accuracy of our knowledge, respecting the resources of estates on which an assessment is to be fixed, is exactly proportionate to the length of time during which the lands in question may have formed a part of the British territories; but there is reason to believe, that considerable errors were committed in making the settlement of some parts of Bengal and Behar, notwithstanding the length of time during which those provinces had been subject to the British administration. On the other hand, we are not apprized that any material difficulty has been experienced in fixing the assessment in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; nor have we the slightest ground to believe, that any errors of magnitude have been committed in the performance of that duty. The fact is, that the proper execution of this duty depends much more upon the fidelity of the executive officers, and the efficiency of the controul to which they may be subject, than on any other circumstances. It may be further remarked, that the nature of our revenue institutions is by no means calculated to afford any great facilities in the adjustment of the assessment on landed estates. Under the Native Governments, offices existed (we mean those of the Canongoes and Putwarrees) in which the most minute particulars connected with the rents and revenues of the different estates were recorded. About the period of the conclusion of the permanent settlement in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, it was deemed proper to abolish the first-mentioned office, and the latter has since remained in a very inefficient and ill-organized state. In stating the fact of the abolition, we by no means intend it to be understood that we concur in the policy of that measure. It is only noticed here for the purpose of shewing, that whatever difficulties or facilities may have attended the conclusion of the settlement of the above-mentioned provinces, the former would not have been removed, nor the latter augmented, had that measure been suspended to the present period. On the same principle, were the settlement which has now been provisionally concluded of Cuttack, suspended during the next ten years, or any other given period, we entertain considerable doubts, whether the duty would be performed in a more efficient manner than that in which it has been already executed. Few things are more naturally seducing than the anticipation of a large increase in the public revenue from an extension of the cultivation of the country; but while it is admitted, on the one hand, that the advantages to the community are incalculably great, and that the benefits derived by Government from it are more and more strongly manifested in each successive year; while, on the other hand,

Extracts of a letter from Europe, dated 1st February 1811

(Par 55.) It cannot but be gratifying for us to find, that the arrears due from these provinces (Bengal, Behar, Orissa and Benares) at the close of the annual accounts have, in the course of nine years, been reduced from Rupees 10,74,287 to Rupees 1,25,649, which is less than one and a half per cent. on the jumma hand, the increase which may be obtained in the public revenue by protracting the settlement is highly problematical, a sound and enlightened policy naturally suggests, that the former advantages, were they less considerable than they are, should not be sacrificed to the precarious benefit of a limited augmentation of the land revenue.

(56) We readily admit, also, that facts like these present a striking illustration of the great benefits which have accrued from the permanent settlement of the lands.

15. Third. It is observed, in the twenty-third paragraph of your letter, that "you doubt not of our being fully "sensible, that in India sudden innovations are to be "avoided, and that all changes, however benignant they "may be in principle or salutary in operation, must be cautiously and gradually "insinuated among a people, with whom established usage holds the place of "almost every recommendation to respect."

16. We trust that the general tenor of our correspondence with your Honourable Court, and the uniform tendency of our measures, will shew that no persons can be more sensible than we are, of the indispensable necessity of guarding against every measure, calculated by its novelty to offend the religious or civil opinions of the natives. We confess, however, that we do not discern, in the arrangement under consideration, any thing which could possibly be productive of that effect. A settlement of the revenue for the life of an individual was by no means unknown under the native governments. Perpetual grants were not unfrequently conferred as favours upon individuals: the permanent settlement is only an istemary grant in the most extensive sense of the word, and comprehending, in its operation, the whole body of the Zemindars, instead of a few favoured individuals.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL, Dated the 19th June 1813.

Letter to, dated 9th September 1812

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 19 June 1813.

Par. 6. In the ninth paragraph of your letter your Honourable Court observes, that "you cannot admit the "policy of realizing the Government revenue by the means of farmers, &c. "and that you give a decided preference to a detailed collection of the revenue from the cultivators of the land by the native cutcherry servants." It of course rests with your Honourable Court to prescribe whatever principles you may judge most expedient for the internal administration of the country; but our own opinion is, that the Company must suffer enormously, if ever the latter system be adopted, to any extent, in this part of India. In recording this sentiment, we are satisfied that we express not only our own opinion, but likewise the opinion of the most intelligent and experienced officers in the Revenue Department. The fact is, that with the concurrent opinion of these officers, it has been an object uniformly, for many years past, of the Revenue Authorities, and of the Governor-General in Council as the head of these authorities, to abolish that system of collection (or, as it is ordinarily called, khas management), throughout the provinces immediately dependent on this presidency. The principal motives for the adoption of this course of policy were, that it was impracticable for the Collectors, engaged as they are with other duties, and situated frequently at a distance of very many miles from the estate or estates which were to be managed, to give that attention to the business which was necessary to promote the cultivation of the lands and superintend the actual collection of the rents. In the district of Cuttack, for instance, the Collector resides at the town so called. Let it be supposed that he has the immediate charge of one estate situated at Balasore, of another at the northwest extremity of the district, and of a third situated on the southern frontier, that it is at a distance of sixty, eighty, or a hundred miles in quite different directions, as will be demonstrable from an inspection of the map, from his ordinary place of residence. In such a state of things, it must necessarily appear quite impracticable for the Collector to exercise an efficient controul over the conduct of the native officers who may be invested with the immediate charge of the lands. It will not be maintained, we presume, that so long as he shall remain at his principal station, the strictest attention which he can give to the reports and the accounts of his native native officers, will either enable him to judge of the means which should be employed for the improvement of the estate intrusted to his charge, or to exercise any efficient check over the receipts and disbursements. It is well known that in Cuttack, as indeed in every other district, an inconsiderable part only of the year can be employed by the Collectors in visits to the different parts of the districts subject respectively to their authority: even then it is extremely difficult for the Collectors, on quitting the principal station, to provide for the general collection of the revenues, to controul the disbursements of their treasuries, to superintend the embankments, and to provide for the conduct of other miscellaneous duties, which it would be superfluous to detail in this place. The consequence of these circumstances is, that whenever lands are held khas, the almost exclusive management of them is necessarily confided to native officers, who are entirely disqualified by education and principle for the faithful discharge of a trust of that nature. In cases of that description, the peasantry are subjected to exaction, and the Government to embezzlement, while the lands themselves become every day more and more impoverished, from the want of the fostering care of some person who has an immediate interest in the property.

7. On the grounds above noticed, khas management has for years past been nearly exploded in the territories dependent on these provinces. It continued, however, to prevail in estates belonging to females and minors, who were wards of Government, to a later period than in mehauls of any other description. All the ill effects, however, inherent in khas management having been experienced in estates of that description, by which Government, the proprietor, and the peasantry were equally sufferers, it was resolved at the Board of Revenue, some years ago, to take the earliest opportunities that might occur of letting all such mehauls to farm. Since that period, the estates in question have, generally speaking, been greatly improved, and have yielded a considerable surplus to the proprietors.

Respecting the system of realizing the Government revenues.

8. In the ninth paragraph of your dispatch you are pleased to observe, "That experience has shewn, both "in the extensive territories ceded to the Company by the Nizam in the "Deccan, and also in the pergunnah of Broach under the Residency of "Bombay, where the lands since the period of their acquisition have been "under a ryotwarry plan of management, that the difficulties attending the "system may be surmounted."

9. Possessing only a general and imperfect knowledge of the arrangements adopted for the collection of the revenues in places subject to the presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay, we cannot pretend to determine whether those arrangements could be introduced with any prospect of success in Bengal. It is possible, however, that more European agency may have been employed in the performance of the duty in question at Fort St George and Bombay, than the state of the service at this presidency will permit. It is possible, that the circumstances of the three presidencies may vary, as to the extent of the districts, the means of supplying the Collectors with assistants (in Bengal there are scarcely any), and the duties of these officers, which under the presidency of Fort William are multifarious: above all, it is possible that it may ultimately be discovered, as was slowly done in Bengal, that evils of the most serious nature are absolutely inherent in khas management, and that it will be preferable to adopt the farming system.

10. Your Honourable Court, in treating this subject, is pleased to observe, that the system in question cannot be made to attain all the advantages of which it is susceptible, until a local survey, which ought ever to form the ground-work of this system of collection, can be completed.

11. We are not insensible of the inconvenience arising from relying, as is ordinarily done, on the zemindarry accounts, including those of the Canongoes and Putwarrees, in districts in which such offices exist, in the adjustment of demands for rents from the Ryots and tenantry, and in fixing the assessment on estates: but still we think, that this inconvenience is light, compared with the evils resulting from the chicanery, exaction, and deception of every sort practised by native officers, when employed to make measurements ments and jummabundies. On this subject, however, we can only repeat the remarks contained in the tenth and eleventh paragraphs of our dispatch of 14th December 1811, which has probably already received the consideration of your Honourable Court.

Regarding the farming system Cuttack.

12. In the tenth paragraph of your dispatch, your Honourable Court is pleased to observe as follows. " We are the " more suprised at your having had recourse to the farming system in Cuttack, " because we find, from your late advices, that in the Upper Provinces, where " it seems to have been prevalent, you have considered the resumption of the " farms to be so desirable in itself, as to justify considerable sacrifices on the " part of Government for its attainment." But we confess that we do not discern any analogy between the case of the Rajah of Khoordah, who had declined to engage for the revenue of his estate, and those of the powerful Talookdars in Allighur. In the former, the alternative was, whether the lands should be let to farm or held khas; in the latter, whether the lands should remain in farm to those Talookdars, or whether the settlement should be made with the Zemindars, the rightful proprietors.

13. In the former case, every step had been taken to induce the Zemindar to engage for the payment of the revenue of his estate, on such terms as appeared reasonable to Government. He declined it, and the lands were let to farm; not as a preferable thing, by any means, to the conclusion of a settlement with the Zemindar, but as one less replete with inconvenience than khas management.

14. In Allighur, every motive of justice towards the excluded proprietors was combined with every consideration of policy, in restoring the Zemindars to the possession and management of their estates. By this arrangement, a numerous body of landholders were restored to the possession of their estates, from which they had been wrongfully excluded for years, and the influence of persons who were not deemed extremely well affected to the British interests was materially abridged. With respect to the compensation which was granted, in the form of jaghires, to those persons, it appears to us to sink into absolute insignificance, significance, when weighed against the powerful motives of policy and justice which dictated these arrangements.

15. But whatever difference of opinion may exist in regard to the farming system and khas management, we think it a just subject of regret, that the expediency of either arrangement should, at the present moment, be so little settled, that while your Honourable Court is expressing, in the most unqualified terms, an opinion in favour of the latter system, the Revenue Authorities in this country should not only be entertaining, but we may say, invariably acting upon the opposite principle.

16. The terms of your Honourable Court are, that "you cannot admit the "policy of realizing the Government revenues by means of farmers." If this was intended as a general instruction, as the terms of it seem to imply, it would not only authorize us, but might, in the opinion of many, appear to require us to abolish that system of management altogether, and to establish a khas collection wherever the settlement could not be made with the Zemindars. In order, however, to put your Honourable Court in possession of the fullest information on the subject, we have desired the Board of Revenue and the Board of Commissioners to furnish us with their sentiments on the points here noticed: on the receipt of the required reports, the discussion of the subject will be revived.

(Par. 11 to 14.) Remarks in regard to the permanent settlement of Cuttack, and referring to paragraphs 15 to 16 of Court's letter of the 1st February 18[illegible]

17. We propose, whenever the severe pressure of other duties will permit, to address your Honourable Court, generally, on the subject of the permanency of the settlement proposed to be established in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces: at present, we only deem it necessary to forward to you, in addition to the communication made to your Honourable Court on 30th October last, and to the Secret Committee on the 9th October, 1812, the enclosed printed copy of a Regulation* regarding the depending temporary settlement of the district of Cuttack. That Regulation will inform you specifically of the arrangements ordered to be adopted, with respect to that question, in that district, and more ample details will be submitted to you hereafter.

18. The remarks of your Honourable Court, respecting the inconvenience attendant on the frequent removal of the public officers, especially in situations like Cuttack, appear to us perfectly just; but we confess that we do not discern how that inconvenience is to be avoided, in a service constituted as this is, in which a never-ceasing call exists for the service of efficient officers, to fill vacancies occasioned by resignations, deaths, or other occurrences, and in which the principles of justice require that due attention should be given to the claims of seniority.

REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,
Dated 17th July 1813.
(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 July 1813.

To the Honourable the Court of Directors for Affairs of the Honourable the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East-Indies.

Honourable Sirs:

Par 1. We have, more than once, expressed our intention of submitting to your Honourable Court, a detailed reply to the orders contained in your despatches of the 27th November 1811, and the 15th January 1812, respecting the permanency of the settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, including Cuttack.

2. It cannot be denied, that no duty can engage the attention of a Government, of greater importance than that of fixing in perpetuity the assessment on the lands: it is equally indisputable, that whether we look at the finances of Government, when the orders on that subject were passed by the late Governor-General in Council, or at the present moment, the state of them urgently requires, that every possible improvement should be effected in the public resources. It consequently follows, that whatever advantages might, in other respects, attend a measure of that nature, both our predecessors and ourselves must must have hesitated in the adoption of it, supposing that it was calculated to reduce the pecuniary resources of Government below the means which might otherwise be drawn from the country: but, in our judgment, it may be successfully maintained, that taking any term of years which may be judged proper, Government will actually derive, during that period, a greater revenue from the Ceded and Conquered Provinces by means of the permanent settlement, than could, with any sort of reason, be expected to be drawn from those territories under temporary assessments.

3. But previously to stating those arguments, on which we chiefly rely for the establishment of that position, it is proper to reply to the objections which have been offered to the permanency of the assessment, in the dispatches of your Honourable Court already referred to, and to the plan suggested by you for a variable land-tax. Those objections may, we think, be reduced to the following heads, viz.

First. The defective materials at present possessed by us for fixing the assessment in perpetuity.

Second. The disappointment experienced in Bengal, &c. with respect to the other branches of the public revenue.

Third. The inexpediency of the arrangement considered with reference to the peculiar character of the natives.

Fourth. The loss which must be experienced from the measure in question, in consequence of the depreciation of the precious metals.

4. We shall beg leave to offer a few remarks on each of those points.

First Head.

5. Under the first head of the present discussion, your Honourable Court is pleased to observe as follows: " We have uniformly been of opinion, that " supposing the principle of the permanent settlement in the Bengal provinces " to have been as politic and wise, as the sentiments which dictated it cer- " tainly were liberal and disinterested, a similar settlement ought not hastily " to be introduced into territories which have but recently devolved under " our authority, and with the resources of which we must have been imper- " fectly acquainted." You further add, " that the Company had been in " possession of Bengal for nearly thirty years, before the Government fixed " limits to its demands upon the lands."

6. From the foregoing information it must necessarily be inferred, that you consider our sources of information more or less adequate to the accomplishment of the important duty of fixing the assessment, entirely proportioned to the length of time during which we may have held possession of the country. We think, however, that little grounds will appear to exist for that opinion, if a reference be made to the real nature of the accounts, and means of information, by which the revenue authorities are guided in fixing the assessment, whether temporary or permanent, on estates. Those sources of information are, the accounts deposited in the offices of the Collectors themselves, or what are usually called the sudder serishta, the zemindarry accounts, and the accounts of the Canongoes and Putwarrees. It will be naturally observed, that accounts of the three latter descriptions should be received with circumspection, lest the Government be defrauded by false and fabricated statements. The justness of such objections will scarcely be disputed; but in whatever degree they are founded, they apply equally, whether the duty of forming a permanent settlement of any estates be undertaken at a recent period, after they have been subjected to the British Government, or, as your Honourable Court observes, was the case in Bengal, at the expiration of thirty years afterwards. The zemindarry dufter, and the serishtah of the Canongoes and Putwarries, are not contrivances and institutions of the British Government, but of the governments which preceded us, and existed at least in as complete a form under the latter, as under our administration. If then these documents can in any case be sufficiently relied on, to serve as a basis for the adjustment of an assessment, they may be equally well applied to that purpose at one period as at another. If, on the other hand, sufficient reliance cannot be placed on those those accounts, the idea of a permanent settlement must be altogether abandoned; for, generally speaking, there are absolutely no other documents which can be applied to the object in view.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 July 1813.

7. It may be urged, perhaps, that the circumstances here noticed furnish a strong argument for those local surveys and valuations, to which your Honourable Court has, in more than one passage of your dispatches, adverted, and which are stated to have been attended with such beneficial effects in other parts of India. But we know nothing that we should more strongly deprecate, than the undertaking of such surveys and valuations, in the territories immediately dependant on this presidency. The objections which exist to any arrangements of that sort need not, we believe, be more fully or strongly stated, than they are in the following transcripts of paragraphs 10 and 11 of our dispatch of the 14th December 1811.

8. In treating of the advantages which may be derived from actual surveys, your Honourable Court observes, "that in the management of the Conquered "and Ceded Territories which have been annexed to the two subordinate presi-"dencies, this course has been successfully pursued," &c. "Possessing only "a general knowledge of the measures adopted with a view to the adjustment "of the assessment in the territories dependent on the presidencies of Fort St. "George and Bombay, and of the effect of those measures, we are necessarily "precluded from offering any opinion upon the expediency of the surveys "made in those parts of the British dominions; but the experience obtained "on the subject in Bengal would by no means warrant us in recommend-"ing, that a similar course should be observed in the territories dependent on "this presidency. In former times, recourse was not unfrequently had to this "expedient; but the chicanery and corruption practised by the large body of "native officers, necessarily employed in the performance of that duty, the "exactions and injustice to which the Zemindars and others were conse-"quently exposed, and the heavy expense with which all such surveys were "attended, gradually induced succeeding Governments to abandon the plan "of fixing the public assessment, by an actual measurement and computation "of the produce of the lands of each individual. The practice has long been "entirely discontinued; and we are satisfied that the most experienced and "capable of the Revenue officers would deem the revival of it an evil, bur-"thensome and oppressive to the people, and unproductive of any substantial "benefit to the pecuniary interests of the state.

9. "We must further remark, that this method of assessment appears par-"ticularly unsuited to the condition of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, "where the lands are in general parcelled out into small properties, the joint "owners of which are themselves the cultivators of the soil, and a minute "scrutiny into the resources of the estates is consequently far more difficult "than in provinces where the cultivation is in the hands of tenants holding "of superior Zemindars, and where a measurement and survey ascertains the "rents payable by the Ryots to the Zemindars, as a preparatory step to the "assessment of the public demand on the landholders."

10. We have already admitted, that the village accounts above-noticed should be received with circumspection; but when such precautions have been duly observed, they have been found fully adequate to the object for which they were required. At all events, much greater confidence can be reposed in them, because they are not easily falsified or fabricated, than can be done in the accounts of local surveys and valuations made almost exclusively by the agency of native officers, not holding any permanent appointments under Government, but employed pro hâc vice in a duty, for which, as already noticed, they are quite disqualified, by the want of general principle and the thirst of illicit gain.

11. Your Honourable Court seems to be fully sensible, that in forming the settlement of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, at the expiration, as already noticed, of nearly thirty years from the period of the acquisition of those provinces, very considerable errors were committed in the adjustment of the assessment.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 July 1813.

12. To the errors thus committed, after so long experience of the resources of the Lower Provinces, may be opposed the regularity and propriety with which the depending settlements have been formed in the newly acquired territories; the strict attention which has been given, both to the rights of individuals and of Government, in the performance of that duty; and the signal success* which, under that settlement, has attended the collection of the public revenue. The conclusion of the settlement of a part, at least, of those provinces, may of course be now postponed at the discretion of your Honourable Court; but there is no truth of which we are more fully persuaded, than that the accounts and papers required for that purpose, will not hereafter be more ample and complete than they are at present, while the agency required for the superintendence of the duty may be much less efficient.

13. One of the reasons assigned by your Honourable Court for not hastily establishing a permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces is, that "the permanent settlement, which had been introduced into the province "of Dindigul, totally failed; and that after sustaining a considerable loss of "revenue, the Madras Government had been obliged to resort to the esta-"blishment of a system of village leases." But we cannot possibly anticipate any such failure in the territories immediately dependent on this presidency. It will have been seen from our dispatch of the 19th June last, that the revenue of the Provinces ceded by the Nuwab Vizier had been realized, with a balance only of about two and a quarter per cent.; that the revenue likewise of the Conquered Provinces had also been realized with a balance only of about one and one-fifth per cent.; and that the revenues of the district of Bundlecund had been realized, with a balance only of about nine anas and five pice per cent. In like manner, the revenues of the district of Cuttack for the year 1811-12 have been collected, with a balance of about one and a half per cent. on the jummat†. By Regulation X, 1807 (to which we shall have occasion more particularly to refer in a subsequent part of this dispatch) it was intended, that the jumma thus realized and brought to account should form the basis of the permanent assessment; or to speak with greater precision, that the jumma of the last year of the settlement in question should itself constitute the permanent assessment. It will not, we presume, be denied, whatever difference of opinion may exist on other points, that a permanent assessment was calculated to promote the agricultural prosperity of the country, and consequently to facilitate the perception of the public revenue. If, then, the jumma has been realized with such inconsiderable arrears during the late temporary settlement, under all the disadvantages attendant on arrangements of that nature, and with seasons far from favourable, what ground, it may be asked, can exist, for apprehending that any failure should arise, under circumstances best calculated to promote the general improvement of the country? The fact is, that we cannot possibly apprehend any such adverse consequences, but from the discouragement which may be given to the improvement of the lands, by measures of a contrary tendency.

Second Head.

14. In the seventy-eighth paragraph of your dispatch of the 15th January 1812, your Honourable Court is pleased to observe as follows:

15. "That the hopes which were entertained, at the period of the intro-"duction of the permanent settlement into Bengal, of Government being able "to compensate itself for the sacrifice which it made, in fixing to perpetuity "the maximum of its claims upon the land by taxation on other objects, have "not been realized, will be manifest, on comparing the amount of the public "revenue at that time and the present, together with the sources from which "at the two epochs that revenue was and is derived."

16. It is impossible to say to what degree your Honourable Court or the local Government of this country may have expected, in limiting the demand on the lands in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares, that the other branches of the public revenue should be improved, or how far new taxes might be established. But if you will be pleased to compare the produce of the different branches of the public revenue, specified in the margin‡, at the period period of the conclusion of the permanent settlement, with their present produce, you will find that a very considerable improvement has been effected during the intermediate period. It will scarcely be denied, that the population will nearly keep pace with the agricultural improvement of the country: it may consequently be naturally expected, that the revenue derived from each of those sources will continue to improve in future, as they have done during the last twenty years. It is not, however, solely from an augmentation of the population that this effect may be produced, but likewise from an improved system of collection. The Government customs and town-duties furnish a direct proof of the justness of this observation. In our dispatch of the 19th June last we had the honour to state, that we were then endeavouring to establish an improved system for the collection of the duties on spirituous liquors and intoxicating drugs. Improvements of this nature can only be gradual; but it is at present quite impossible to state how far they may ultimately be carried. In offering these observations to the consideration of your Honourable Court, we confess that we rely much more on improving the existing resources, than on the establishment of new taxes, which we do not hesitate to acknowledge is attended with great, and in the present state of the country, perhaps, with insuperable difficulties. In treating of the "sacrifice" which Government was supposed to make by the formation of a permanent settlement, we have already observed, with respect to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, that the Company would, in our opinion, actually derive, in any given term of years, a greater revenue from these territories by means of a permanent settlement, than it could possibly do from temporary assessments. The same remark is in substance applicable to the province of Bengal, &c. By this we mean, that although the Zemindars now derive very considerable advantages from the improvements made in their estates, the Government has sustained no loss whatever; and for this plain reason, because without such settlement, those improvements would not, generally speaking, have taken place. But setting this argument aside for the present, it seems to be of importance to inquire, what can justly be deemed a "sacrifice" in cases of this nature. In [illegible]ng assessments, the usual process is to deduct from the gross resources about five per cent. on account of charges of collection, to set apart ten per cent. for the support of the Zemindar and his family, and to consider the remainder as the public assessment; that is, to take the largest possible share for the state, and to leave the smallest possible share for the tenant and his dependants. Under such circumstances, it may be asked, can any country be possibly expected to improve, unless the natural influence of arrangements like these be counteracted by an assured prospect to the landholders, of hereafter enjoying more adequate means of subsistence from the gradual improvement of their lands? The right of property in the soil is no longer a question; but the benefits which the Zemindars are to derive from that right seem to be almost as unsettled, as when a former Governor-General,* whose sentiments your Honourable Court will not be less disposed than ourselves to respect, recorded the following emphatic observations on this interesting subject. "They "(the Zemindars) are to have their property in farm for a lease of ten years, "provided they will pay a good rent for it, and this property is then to be "again assessed at whatever rent the Government of this country may at that "time think proper to impose. In any part of the world, where the value of "property is known, would not such a concession of a right of property in the "soil be called a cruel mockery?"

Third Head.

17. With respect to the third head to which we have reduced the present discussion, your Honourable Court is pleased to observe as follows: "To the "formation of any system connected with the administration of India, we are "fully aware that, besides a studious attention to the general principles of "political economy, an intimate knowledge of the character and manners, "the habits and prejudices of the natives, is required."

18. If by this observation nothing more was intended, than that in all our arrangements strict attention should be given to the character, the manners, the habits, and even to the prejudices of the people, nothing can be farther from our intention, than to dispute the justness of a doctrine on which, in our judgment, judgment, not only the security of the public revenue, but the very existence of the Indian empire, radically and essentially depends: but if the observation above-cited may be construed to imply, that the project of a permanent settlement was, in any respect, at variance with that character, and with those manners, habits, and prejudices, we confess that we cannot discern any grounds for that opinion. The natives in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces are, like the natives of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, divided into two great classes of Hindoos and Mahomedans. The character of a people will always mainly depend upon their religion; but more especially among the Hindoos (who constitute nine parts in ten of the whole population), whose civil rites are so closely blended and interwoven with their religious duties. The same observation is applicable, although not perhaps in the same degree, to our Mahomedan subjects. If these observations be allowed to be well-founded, it must equally be admitted, that we had no peculiar habits, manners, or prejudices, in the natives of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, to consider, but what we had been daily in the habit of contemplating in the provinces of Bengal, &c. The only feature, indeed, in which they appear to differ from each other, is, that the former, owing to the vices and defects of the preceding government, frequently manifest a more refractory spirit than what prevails in the Lower Provinces. But instances without number might be adduced of the same refractory spirit among the natives, even of the latter provinces, for years after the accession of the British Government, until the inhabitants gradually found that their own interests were better promoted by the cultivation of the arts of peace, than by an indulgence in those habits of oppression towards their inferiors, and of resistance to public authority, to which they were before so much addicted. This alteration in their character, which is manifest to every person of long experience in this country, appears to us to be the natural fruit of the unremitting efforts made for the improvement of the administration of justice, and of the limitation established in regard to the demand of Government on the lands. But whatever the character of the natives of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces may be, there seems to be one universal principle, viz. that of self-interest, which must necessarily render a permanent settlement, as opposed to temporary assessments, highly desirable and satisfactory to them. The principle here noticed could not have failed to produce that effect, even if permanent settlements had been, in the most complete manner imaginable, novel to their minds. But the fact is, that it was nothing less than novel. That the Asiatic governments have never carried their moderation so far as to grant permanent settlements to whole bodies of people, is true; but it is not less true, that they have frequently granted settlements, at least for the natural lives of the grantees, as boons to favoured individuals, under the denomination of mokerery and istimrary grants. To say that the natives know how to appreciate such grants, is merely to say, that they, like the rest of mankind, are sensible of the value of arrangements which fix and limit the demand upon them, secure to them the whole produce of their labour beyond the amount of such demand, and exempt them from the vexation and exaction almost inseparable from the revision and re-adjustment of the assessment on their estates. But it would be superfluous to dwell on topics like these, which, we conceive, require only to be stated to command universal assent.

Fourth Head.

19. Considerable apprehensions appear to be entertained, lest in fixing the assessment in perpetuity, the intrinsic value of the public revenue should be reduced by the depreciation of the precious metals, although its nominal amount may remain undiminished. It is a difficult task, reasoning à priori, to judge in what degree the increased influx of specie into Europe, which has unquestionably tended for several years past to reduce in that quarter of the globe the value of gold and silver, will contribute to produce the same effect in Asia. We say in "Asia" broadly; because if the influx of specie into this country, under the commercial relations which subsist with the mother country and some other parts of Europe, and which lately did subsist with America, were confined to our Indian possessions, it is natural to conclude, that these colonies would feel the influence of such augmentation of specie; or in other words, that the value of the precious metals would, from that cause, be gradually reduced. But even admitting the influx of specie to be gradually increased, creased, there exist so many drains for the diffusion of it through every part of Asia, not excepting China, that it is presumable, its influence cannot, but at a very remote period indeed, be felt in this country.

20. It is not, however, solely by the diffusion of the precious metals, imported at Calcutta, Fort St. George, or Bombay, through the different states of Asia, that the tendency of such influx to depreciate their value would be counteracted. A great demand, as your Honourable Court is fully aware, has for some years past existed for supplies of bullion from this country to England, and the exertions made for the accomplishment of that object are fully before your Honourable Court in another department. It may possibly be urged, that this demand is only of a temporary nature, and that on the return of peace its urgency will cease. The re-establishment of peace is, however, very uncertain; and the renewal of war a contingency which, judging from the history of the world down to the present time, may be considered as an occurrence by no means improbable. On all occasions of that nature, a demand will probably exist for supplies of bullion from this country; and we cannot but think, that it is more to be apprehended that the country should be drained of its circulating medium, than that the value of the money should be depreciated from a gradually increasing stock of the precious metals. But even supposing the stock of precious metals numerically to increase in this country, it does not follow that their value will therefore be depreciated. These provinces are, and have long been, in a progressive state of improvement. The population, it cannot be doubted, has very materially increased: the increased influx of specie may, therefore, be only proportioned to the increase of the population, and the augmented stock of all the necessaries of life. In other words, admitting, for the sake of argument, the supposed increase of gold and silver, they may still stand in the same ratio to the stock of consumable commodities as they did some years ago, when the quantity, both of those metals and of such commodities, was much smaller than at present. It is scarcely necessary to add, that the same effect may continue to be experienced for years, or even centuries to come.

21. It is likewise worthy of observation, that the habit of hoarding, so prevalent among Asiatic states, must tend, by withdrawing a large portion of the precious metals from circulation, to uphold the value of the remainder. There is scarcely a state in India, or perhaps in Asia, to which this remark is not applicable. By these means enormous sums are annually withdrawn from circulation; and this miserable policy is carried so far by some of the existing powers, that they are known to suffer the extremities of distress before they can be induced to open their coffers to supply the exigency of their governments.

22. But a more accurate judgment may be formed of this question by a reference to past experience, than by any reasoning with respect to the future, which is, of course, liable to be overset by the influence of events, which no human prudence can control or even foresee. Considering the subject then in that point of view, we beg leave to observe, that notwithstanding the depreciation which the precious metals have experienced in Europe, it is not apparent, from such inquiries as we have been enabled to make on the subject, that this effect has been felt in this country. In expressing this opinion, we of course refer to the ordinary standard for judging of a question of this nature, viz. the price of grain and the wages of labour; neither of which have, as far as we have the means of judging, been generally enhanced in this country, since it has been subjected to the British Government. In other words, a given quantity of gold and silver will at present command the same quantity of grain and labour (which of course materially influence the price of all other commodities the growth or produce of the country) as heretofore. It is impossible, under those circumstances, to admit the supposition, that the precious metals have been depreciated.

23. In a minute prepared by Mr. Colebrooke, before he vacated his seat in the Supreme Council (of which the enclosed is a copy),* it is suggested, that the loss which might otherwise be experienced from the eventual depreciation of of gold and silver might be prevented, by converting the engagements subsisting between Government and the landholders for a specific amount in specie, into engagements for the market value of a specific quantity of corn. The advantages or disadvantages of this plan are proposed to be reciprocal; that is to say, if the market price of corn should rise, Government should be entitled to an increase of revenue, and if it should fall, the Zemindars should be entitled to a reduction of jumma. But notwithstanding the very respectable quarter whence this suggestion has originated, we cannot but apprehend, that it would be attended with the most serious difficulties in practice. Should the price of grain fall in however small a degree, the Zemindars would immediately claim a reduction of the assessment, and the Government must immediately comply with the demand, from the regard due to its character for good faith; but should the price of corn be enhanced, although as a matter of right Government would be equally entitled to an enhancement of the jumma, every delay and artifice would be practised by the landholders, in order to frustrate claims, just indeed in themselves, but calculated, from their nature, to excite the greatest possible degree of counteraction and dissatisfaction on the part of the large and powerful body liable to be affected by them.

* See page 194.

24. We shall only trouble your Honourable Court with one more observation on this branch of the subject, which is, that the consequence here contemplated is at all events remote and contingent, while the effect which would be produced by the permanent settlement, not only with respect to the public revenue, but likewise in the branches of the administration (as will be more particularly noticed hereafter), would be almost instantaneous. Whether it be advisable to sacrifice advantages of that sort, with the view of providing against an evil which at present can only be contemplated in speculation, and which may never have a real existence, we submit to the deliberate consideration of your Honourable Court.

25. We now beg leave to advert to the two plans suggested by your Honourable Court, for the establishment of such a variable land-tax as shall enable Government to participate in the growing resources of the country. The first is, to revise the assessment at the expiration of a given term; the second, to do the same on the succession of every new proprietor. Both plans, we confess, appear to us liable to great, or even insurmountable obstacles. Were the former adopted, it would be the obvious interest of the proprietors, as will be more particularly shewn in a subsequent part of this letter, to neglect the cultivation, and deteriorate their estates, as much as possible, during the latter years of the term, with the view of obtaining a lighter assessment (which must, of course, be fixed in each, with reference to the actual produce of the lands) during the ensuing term of years.

26. The other plan suggested, viz. that of revising the assessment on the succession of every new proprietor, is not liable exactly to the same difficulty; but it is exposed to another, of scarcely less magnitude, which is, that estates in this country are frequently, we may say indeed ordinarily, held in joint tenancy. It would be at variance with the very principle of the plan, as we understand it, to subject the estates to a revision of the assessments on the death of one of the proprietors, while there were several others surviving; and the same objection would, of course, arise on the death of every other partner, ad infinitum.

27. Exclusively of this consideration, estates would be of little value when exposed to sale for the recovery of arrears of assessment, if the jumma were only to remain fixed during the life of the former proprietor. It is the permanency of the asessment which can alone render the lands substantial security for the public demand.

28. In treating of this question, that is, a variable land-tax, your Honourable Court is pleased to observe, "that it is no demerit, at least in the plan now "brought forward for discussion, that the suffrage of one of the most en-"lightened writers on political economy may be quoted in its favour. In all "the variations of the state of society, says Dr. Adam Smith, in the improve-"ment and in the declension of agriculture, in all the variations of the value "of silver, and in all those in the standard of the coin, a tax of this kind "would,

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 July 1813.

" would, of its own accord and without any attention of Government, readily " suit itself to the actual situation of things, and would be equally just and " equitable in all those different changes." But we submit, that the suggestion of the celebrated author of the " Wealth of Nations," on this point, is stated in the most qualified manner possible, or rather that it is purely hypothetical. " If," says that able and profound writer, " by such a system of administration " a tax of this kind could be so managed, as to give not only no discourage- " ment, but on the contrary, some encouragement to the improvement of land, " it does not appear likely to occasion any other inconveniency to the landlord, " except always the unavoidable one of being obliged to pay the tax." In such case alone, as we understand the passage, the effects above-stated would ensue.

29. But we maintain, that no scheme can be devised, by which a variable land-tax shall not operate as a discouragement to agriculture: certainly not in opposition to Dr. Adam Smith, but in perfect concurrence with the sentiments delivered by him on the subject. The following further extract from that enlightened author, may serve to set the question in its true point of view. " The discouragement which a variable land-tax of this kind might give to the " improvement of land, seems to be the most important objection which can be " made to it. The landlord would certainly be less disposed to improve, when " the sovereign, who contributes nothing to the expense, was to share in the " profit of the improvement."

30. With reference to the same author, your Honourable Court is pleased to intimate, that one of the advantages attendant on a plan of that sort is, that it would tend to draw the attention of the sovereign power to the improvement of the land, from a regard to the increase of its own revenue. But we cannot possibly anticipate a failure of that essential duty, either on the part of the authorities in this country, or of the controuling power at home. That duty, properly understood, consists, as we conceive, in the construction of roads, bridges, canals, and where the natives of the country may require it, of embankments; or in other words, of such works as are calculated to promote the general prosperity of the country. And even under the system of a permanent settlement, the Government had an inducement to create and promote these improvements, little, if at all inferior to that which is stated by your Honourable Court as attendant on the plan of a variable tax; since although these improvements do not produce a direct accession of revenue, they indirectly augment other branches of its available resources. That duty certainly has not been neglected, although the practical discharge of it has necessarily been limited, as it must be under any circumstances, by the actual state of the finances. Exclusively of the works of that description, Government has been in the habit of making large advances for the cultivation of the country, under the denomination of tuccavy: but we are far from recommending an extension of that plan. It is necessarily confined in its operation to the estates of a few individuals, or at all events to an inconsiderable portion of the country. It is only in improvements of a very general and comprehensive nature in which Government should, in our apprehension, interfere; the rest may be safely left to the great body of people, if the profits of their industry and capital be duly secured to them.

31. " If," says your Honourable Court, " a duty of this nature be imposed " upon the Government of India, &c. &c. it will be difficult to reject the conclu- " sion, that the sovereign has a right to indemnity for the expense incurred in " the undertaking." It will scarcely be maintained, we presume, after a perusal of paragraph 16 of this dispatch, that the assessment can at present be raised higher than it is, with the view of indemnifying Government for the expense which it may incur in the execution of works of the nature of those above described. If then a variable land-tax cannot be established, without discouragement to agriculture, which it is the main object of this address to shew, it follows, that it would be preferable to limit undertakings of that sort to works of indispensible necessity, or to seek the indemnity for them by some other means, rather than check the agricultural improvement of the country. This may perhaps, in particular cases, be done by means of tolls; but, at all events, Government will, generally speaking, receive a full indemnification for all expense pense so incurred, although indirectly and insensibly, by the facilities afforded by those means to commerce, and by the consequent improvement of the customs.

32. With respect to the improvement of the rural economy of the natives, on adverting to the vast extent of country and its immense population on the one hand, and to the very limited number of Europeans employed in the collection or superintendence of the revenue, on the other, we apprehend that all improvements of that nature must generally, if not entirely, be left to the natural effects of time, and to the gradual adoption, by the natives themselves, of such improvements as they may find conducive to their own interests. This is a principle which is never dormant; and although its operation may be in some measure retarded, by the peculiar character of the natives, which renders them very averse to the adoption of such suggestions as deviate from established usage, it cannot fail to produce, in part at least, those effects which result from it in every state of society, which enjoys, in its proper degree, the protecting influence of Government.

33. But although we cannot, for the reasons above-stated, recommend that either of the plans suggested by your Honourable Court be carried into effect, we think that there is another mode, free at least from the difficulties above-stated, by which Government might secure to itself a share in the progressive improvement of the country. This, however, requires to be explained at some length, and with reference to the subsisting arrangements in Bengal. It was a leading principle of those arrangements, that the Zemindars, after paying the assessment then fixed on their estates, should themselves enjoy the remaining produce, whether arising from lands then in an actual state of cultivation, or from such as might be afterwards cultivated, by the application of their capital and industry. No very determinate ideas, however, appear to have been formed, with respect to the extent of the latter immunity. As the question at present stands, it may be construed to mean lands included within the limits of the estates of the Zemindars respectively, or the wastes generally, which exist more or less in every district, especially on the frontiers of other states. The subject was lately brought under our consideration by Mr. Dowdeswell, on quitting his temporary seat at the Board of Revenue. The following is a transcript of a part of his remarks on the subject. " It will not, " I trust, for a moment be inferred from these remarks, that I have the " slightest design of suggesting any measures at variance with the principles " of the permanent settlement; that is, with a fair construction of the engage- " ments subsisting between Government and the landholders, or a liberal in- " terpretation of the rules on which those engagements are founded.

34. " Those engagements and those rules guaranteed to the proprietors, as " I conceive, the full benefit of lands, which have been, or may be reduced to " cultivation, within the ascertained boundaries of their respective estates. It " will scarcely, however, be maintained, that this principle extends to the " large tracts of land ordinarily called the Sunderbunds; to the territory on the " borders of Chittagong and the other frontier districts; to the extensive forests " which have been more or less cultivated in the interior of some of the dis- " tricts, and to lands* gained by alluvion in many parts of the country, which " so far from being the acknowledged property of any particular individuals, " are a perpetual source of dispute, and of the most serious affrays between " the proprietors of lands adjacent."

35. From the proceedings which may have already come under the consideration of your Honourable Court, you may have observed that we did not entirely agree with Mr. Dowdeswell on the subject, and thought that no measures should be adopted for deriving a revenue from the lands, reduced of late years to a state of cultivation, except in the extensive tract ordinarily called the Sunderbunds. This opinion was, of course, in part at least, founded on the indefinite manner in which the question had been left at the conclusion of the permanent settlement, and on the apprehension, under those circumstances, of shaking the confidence of the people in the stability and permanency of the assessment.

36. But

* Churs Deearahs.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 July 1813.

36. But whatever opinion may be entertained on that point, in regard to Bengal, &c. now that the settlement has been long since concluded in those provinces, no objection can, in our judgment, exist, to deriving an increase of revenue from the gradual cultivation of the wastes in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, which are the immediate property of the state. For the accomplishment of this purpose, it only seems necessary to declare, that the Zemindars shall be entitled to the full benefit arising from the cultivation of any wastes, actually situated within the limits of their estates; but that if they reduce any lands to cultivation beyond those limits, they shall be liable to the payment of an additional and separate assessment to Government. It is further worthy of remark, that if this limited immunity be deemed too great a sacrifice, its operation might be further restricted, by leaving to the Zemindars such wastes only as are intermingled with, or immediately adjoin to lands already in a state of actual cultivation (but we do not by any means intend to recommend this arrangement), and by declaring that all others, when reduced to cultivation, shall be liable to assessment to Government. In either of those cases, it would be necessary that the boundaries of the estates on which the assessment might be at present fixed, should be properly and carefully defined, in order that the Revenue Authorities might at all times know when they might properly interpose, on the principles already stated, to fix the assessment, and raise a revenue on other lands recently reduced to cultivation.

37. There is still a third mode by which the object in view (viz. that of deriving an increase of revenue from the gradual cultivation of the country) might be accomplished, which is by a russud, or progressive increase in the assessment of those estates, considerable portions of which are at present waste. In cases in which settlements have been formed on this principle, the progressive increase has ordinarily been limited to a short term of years. In estates, however, of the description above-noticed, that term might possibly be extended to the period of six, eight, or ten years; but it is sufficient in this place to notice the principle itself, as it would require a minute and detailed discussion with the executive officers of the Revenue department, to enable us to judge in what mode it should be reduced to practice, so as to combine the increase of the public revenue with the personal interests of the landholders.

38. In replying to the objections stated by your Honourable Court to the permanency of the settlement, we have necessarily been already led to submit to your consideration many of those arguments, by which we think that this system is to be supported. Still the main question remains to be discussed, which is, whether any reasonable prospect exists, that the country, under a contrary system, will, generally speaking, improve; and consequently, whether Government will be able, by means of temporary assessments, to derive a greater revenue from the lands, than it will do if the land-tax be at once fixed in perpetuity.

39. No proposition can be more self-evident, than that the industry and capital employed by the great body of the land-holders in the improvement of their estates, that is, collectively speaking, in the general amelioration of the country, will be proportioned to the profits, which the application of such industry and capital may be expected to afford to them or their descendants. To attempt, therefore, to increase the public revenue in proportion to such improvements, must, under any circumstances, operate as a great check, if not absolute bar, to the accomplishment of this important object. Objections have been made to the tithes at home, because being levied in proportion to the increased produce of estates, they necessarily operate to the discouragement of agriculture. If this objection be founded in regard to the limited demand for tithes, how much more forcibly will it apply in a case like the present, in which the Government may aim at drawing to its own treasury, not a tenth of the increased produce of estates, but a third, a moiety, or two-thirds, or any other proportion which may have been contemplated of such improvement. A project of this nature will not, however, operate simply as a check to agriculture; that is, it will not merely restrain the land-holders from applying the industry and capital, which they would otherwise do, to the improvement of their estates; but it actually operates as a direct encouragement to them to deteriorate their lands, from time to time, to the greatest possible extent. Let it be supposed, for instance, that that a settlement has been made in any particular case for a period of ten years. The proprietor will naturally endeavour to improve his lands, so as to derive the greatest possible benefit from them during the early part of his lease; but knowing that a re-settlement is to be made at the expiration of the above term, and that the assessment is then to be again fixed, according to the actual produce of the lands, it becomes his immediate interest to neglect the cultivation of the lands, and the general improvement of the estate, with the view of obtaining as light an assessment during the ensuing term, whether of ten years or otherwise, as possible. A strong proof of the justness of these remarks at present exists in the district of Goruckpore, where the arrears of assessment, according to the latest towjee account, amount to the very large sum of Rupees 6,02,869.

40. These balances, we believe, are chiefly, if not entirely, ascribable to the circumstance of the landholders, who are for the most part village Zemindars, having thrown their lands out of tillage, in order to obtain as light an assessment during the ensuing temporary settlement as possible. How far the ultimate security of the current year's revenue will be affected by these means, cannot be at present determined. By the operation of these successive incitements to improvement and neglect, we cannot ourselves anticipate any other general effect, than that the agricultural state of the country should remain stationary; or if any improvement be effected, that it should be so slow and feeble, as not to be an object in any national point of view whatever.

41. It has been observed in the preceding paragraph, that "the proprietor "will naturally endeavour to improve his lands, so as to derive the greatest "possible benefit from them during the early part of his lease;" but even then, it cannot be expected that he will ever devote any capital to the accomplishment of that object, for which he cannot be fully indemnified within that limited period. Being liable to be dispossessed at the expiration of that term, he would naturally regard it as the height of folly, to disburse money in improvements, from which it is quite uncertain whether he or his posterity shall ever derive the smallest advantage. This argument will not, we think, appear destitute of force, if your Honourable Court will be pleased to advert to the nature of the improvements chiefly, but by no means exclusively, contemplated in this discussion: we mean the reclaiming of waste lands, which require several years to afford an adequate return for the trouble and expense incurred in clearing and cultivating them. Under these circumstances, it would be to set aside all the known maxims of human conduct, to suppose that the proprietor would subject himself to the expense incident to an undertaking of that sort, the future benefits of which he held by so very precarious a tenure.

42. One of the greatest difficulties with which we have had to contend in the administration of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces is the refractory and lawless spirit of the Zemindars and others. This spirit has manifested itself in two ways: first, by open resistance to the public authorities; and secondly, by the protection afforded to robbers, and other disturbers of the public peace. In regard to the former, the disposition to resist overtly the authority of Government, has been in a great degree suppressed; the latter offence, however, being committed more clandestinely, and being consequently less exposed to detection and punishment, exists to a very great degree, at the present moment, in the above-mentioned territories. One of the penalties established by the existing regulations for the offence of harbouring any notorious and proclaimed offender, is the confiscation of the estate of the person so offending. Under these circumstances, it seems natural to conclude, that the Zemindars will be restrained, more or less, from the commission of that offence, according to the value of the property which they are liable to lose as the punishment of their crimes: it would consequently follow, that the improvement of the estates of individuals would contribute greatly to the improvement of the general police of the country. But a still more comprehensive view may be taken of this branch of the subject. Limited as is the share at present enjoyed by the Zemindars of the produce of their estates, and limited as it must continue to be, under any scheme of a variable land-tax, it is quite impossible that they should feel any real interest in the support of the Government; on the contrary, it is not improbable that, in any case of difficulty and emergency, emergency, they might regard its overthrow as a benefit to themselves. But were they to derive those advantages from the possession and cultivation of their estates, which we would wish to see them enjoy, it is evident that they would feel the strongest inducements to support, to the utmost extent of their means, that state of things from which they derived such ample benefits. Advantages of this nature, in fact, appear to be indispensable, to strengthen those ties of allegiance on the side of our native subjects, which under other circumstances must necessarily remain very weak and imperfect. This argument will not, we think, appear unworthy of the consideration of your Honourable Court, if you will be pleased to advert to the local situation of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, adjoining as they do to the territories of various independant states, which cannot be supposed to be all equally friendly to the British interests in this country. It is obvious, that if our own Zemindars be in any manner disaffected towards the Government, the situation of their estates will afford to them peculiar facilities for intrigue with the neighbouring powers, which, under certain circumstances, might prove very detrimental to the national interests.

43. But if variable assessments operate only remotely, and eventually to the prejudice of Government in other branches of the administration, they are productive of the most serious evils in the Revenue department, by the direct tendency which they have to keep alive and perpetuate a spirit of intrigue, connivance, and corruption. The addiction of the natives to vices of that description, who must necessarily be largely employed in every revision of the public assessment, is too well known to your Honourable Court to require discussion in this place. It is to be apprehended, however, that effects of that sort may not always be confined to the natives, but that their influence may be felt even among the European officers. Thinking highly as we do of the character of the service in general for integrity, those fears cannot be deemed quite imaginary or superfluous, which suggest, that while we are laying before the Collectors the strongest temptation to corrupt practices, some of them should sacrifice their duty to their pecuniary interests. It should be held in mind, with respect to those officers, that many of them are young and inexperienced; many under great pecuniary embarrassments. A new assessment opens the widest possible door to abuse on their part, if they be not restrained by the purest principles. Your Honourable Court has had before you, within these few years past, some instances of this nature, the serious consequences of which have, we presume, been already sufficiently explained. We are the more disposed to refrain from developing this subject so fully as might be done, as we would not willingly reflect on any body of men, we shall, therefore, only further observe, that the policy of any system must be deemed questionable, which exposes the Collectors, periodically, to strong temptation, and involves the hazard of encountering the great and serious evils, which must infallibly attend any deviation, on their part, from the paths of rectitude and integrity.

44. We have already endeavoured to impress upon the minds of your Honourable Court, the great improvements effected in the agricultural state of the country during the last twenty years; improvements which are, in our judgment, the natural and almost exclusive effects of the permanent settlement. It still remains to compare the actual state of the land-revenue with that important branch of the public resources antecedently to the existing limitation of the demand of Government on the lands. The following is an abstract statement of the jumma of the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and of that part of Orissa which then belonged to the British Government, for ten years previously to the introduction of the permanent settlement.

45. During the above-mentioned period, the jumma fell off, under the system of temporary assessments, from Rupees 2,84,45,572 to Rupees 2,64,16,819; so that a change of system was indispensably necessary, not merely with a view to the general improvement of the country, but to prevent the fatal consequences which were likely to ensue from a further reduction of this important branch of the public resources. The jumma of the same provinces and places for the year 1811-12 is Rupees 2,71,96,826.

46. The following is a statement of the collections on account of each year during the period of time above specified:

1783 4 from May to April ......Rupees	2,53,22,585.	13.	14.	2
1784-5	2,50,42,381.	13.	3.	1

1792-3	2,42,51,478.	11.	1.

47. The collections made in the same districts on account of the year 1811-12, brought down to the 31st December last, were Rupees 2,69,71,728.

48. Exclusively of the inferences which will naturally be drawn from the above-mentioned statements, it is worthy of remark, that previously to the establishment of the permanent settlement, the Government possessed scarcely any security for the public revenue. A great part of the lands were let to farm, frequently to persons by no means responsible: but even in those cases, in which estates remained in the hands of the proprietors, being of little value in the contemplation of others, as long as the land-tax was liable to be raised at the pleasure of Government, they afforded very inadequate means for the recovery of any arrears which accrued. This remark is so just, that even during the early period of the permanent settlement, the lands were scarcely security for the public revenue. We have since seen that mehauls bearing a jumma of Rupees 30,931. 11. 3. 1 have been sold for the large sum of Rupees 1,59,232. 8. 5. 3, as appears by a Report from the Board of Revenue, dated the 18th June 1313.

49. It will, of course, be urged, in reply to the foregoing remarks, that it is by no means intended to revert to the plan of annual settlements, and that it is only proposed to increase the demands of Government from time to time, according to the increased ability of the country. Doubtless the evils noticed in the preceding paragraphs will stand in an inverse proportion to the duration of the successive settlements; but if those evils are likely to be experienced in any material degree (as we have endeavoured to shew must be the case), even under arrangements of the latter description, it is for your Honourable Court to judge, whether a wise and liberal policy does not suggest, that we should pursue that course which has been productive of such substantial advantages in Bengal and the provinces-adjoining.

50. It remains to notice the censures passed by your Honourable Court (whether justly or not, we respectfully submit to your decision, after a consideration of the following remarks), upon the orders issued by us, respecting the settlement of the district of Agra. On this point you are pleased to observe as follows: "We are the more surprized at your resolution, declaring "the triennial settlement of the district of Agra permanent, with the reser- "vation of our sanction, as it is an open departure from your own Regula- "tions. In Regulation IX, 1805, the provisions of which are expressly "applied to the settlement of the zillah of Agra, it is enacted, that three suc- "cessive settlements of the land-revenue, in the territory aforesaid, shall be "concluded for the following periods of time: first, for the years 1213, 1214, "and 1215 fusily; secondly, for the years 1216, 1217, and 1218 fusily; and "thirdly, for the years 1219, 1220, 1221, and 1222 fusily."

51. But in passing these strictures on our conduct, Regulation X, 1807, to which we had the honour to solicit the particular attention of your Honourable Court,

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 July 1813.

Court, in our dispatches from the Revenue department of the 31st July 1807, 30th January and 15th September 1808, appears to have been entirely overlooked. The following is the provision of that Regulation, which is chiefly applicable to our present purpose.*

52. "The provision contained in Section 29, Regulation XXV, 1803, prescribes, that at the expiration of the existing settlements in the provinces "ceded by the Nuwaub Vizier, a new settlement shall be made for the period "of four years. In like manner, the rules contained in Sections 4, 5, and 6, "Regulation IX, 1805, require, that at the expiration of the existing settlement in the Conquered Provinces and in the zillah of Bundlecund, two "more temporary settlements shall be made in the said Conquered Provinces, "and in the zillah of Bundlecund respectively. The Governor-General in "Council, however, hereby notifies to the Zemindars and other actual proprietors of land in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, that the jumma "which may be assessed on their states, in the last year of the settlement "immediately ensuing the present settlement, shall remain fixed for ever, in "case the Zemindars shall now be willing to engage for the payment of the "public revenue on those terms in perpetuity, and the arrangement shall "receive the sanction of the Honourable the Court of Directors"

53. The settlement then depending (that is, at the period of passing that Regulation) was for 1213, 1214, and 1215: the settlement next ensuing would, of course, be for 1216, 1217, and 1218. In saying, therefore, as quoted by your Honourable Court, that the assessment fixed in the last year of the latter period should be considered permanent, with the reservation of the approval of the Honourable the Court of Directors, it is manifest, that instead of having openly departed from our own Regulations, we have acted in the strictest conformity to them: even the very terms of the orders employed on that occasion, correspond almost verbatim with the provision of the Regulation X, 1807, above-cited.

54. Of course, the question is not here, whether the enactments of that Regulation were right or wrong, but whether we have really committed the inconsistency ascribed to us, or whether our conduct was strictly conformable to the Regulations passed by us, and already thrice submitted to the consideration of your Honourable Court.

55. We may now, we believe, conclude the discussion of this serious and important subject. We have not omitted to elucidate, to the best of our ability, the several points noticed by your Honourable Court, and such other questions of a general nature as are connected with the permanency of the settlement: at the same time we are sensible, that almost endless details might be added on a topic the most extensive and complicated. If any point of a general nature appear to be untouched in this dispatch, it is that which relates to the tenures of the landholders; but on that point your Honourable Court will find distinct and satisfactory information in the accompanying minute of Mr. Colebrooke. We have to lament, indeed, that our sentiments on a subject, than which scarcely any more interesting and important can be agitated in this country, have been long at variance with those entertained by your Honourable Court. That consideration has not, however, restrained us from discharging the duties of obedience, in rescinding Regulation X, 1807, although at the hazard of exciting no small share of irritation and discontent, as particularly stated in the letter to the Secret Committee of the 9th October last. We have discharged the no less important duty of stating, fully and unreservedly, our unfeigned sentiments on the subject.

56. The public revenue may be collected without material defalcation, and some partial improvements may even be effected under the restrictions which have been or may be established, in regard to the term of the settlement. But if it be our wish to effect those rapid improvements in the agricultural state of the country, which have of late years taken place in Bengal; to turn the people from those refractory habits which are still too prevalent among them, to the cultivation of the arts of peace and of productive industry; to infuse into the landholders a warm and zealous attachment to the Government, founded on on the solid basis of their own interests; and finally, to ameliorate generally the condition of the natives, it is our firm conviction, that no arrangement or measure will tend so speedily and effectually to the accomplishment of those important objects, as the establishment of a permanent settlement.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sirs,
Your most faithful humble servants,

MR. COLEBROOKE'S MINUTE.

Mr Colebrooke's Minute

THE Honourable the Court of Directors having invited discussion on the important subject of a permanent settlement of the land revenues in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, at the same time that they make known to us the considerations which have induced their refusal to sanction the settlement, provisionally concluded with the reserve of their confirmation, I beg leave to submit in a general manner, but at some length, the ideas which I entertain on that extensive and important subject. The future system for the administration of the revenue of those provinces is still a depending question to be hereafter determined under the directions of the Court. The partial settlement to be now made, in pursuance of the obligation imposed on Government by the unreserved promise of a former Administration, being restricted to such actual proprietors as engaged throughout the preceding settlement of the decennial period, and who having strictly and fully performed their part of the mutual compact, have entitled themselves to demand the exact fulfilment of it on the part of the Government. Such proprietors, it may be presumed, are comparatively few in number. The question then, as it concerns these territories generally, and the greatest number of the landholders, and through them nearly the whole population of the country (yet awaiting the future determination of the Honourable Court), I think it my duty, still entertaining the same opinion which I have before delivered on the principal points involved in that question, to state the reasons of that opinion, and to offer some observations on the objections which are proposed in the letter of the Honourable Court.

The system which was carried into effect in Bengal and the adjacent provinces is thought to be liable to this objection, that a permanent assessment of the land revenues limits the resources of the state, while its expenditure is subject to increase by the course of public events, by exigencies rising out of them, and by the progressive depreciation of gold and silver, at the same time that adequate compensation is not obtained from other sources of public revenue.

Although present experience does not exhibit the same depreciation of gold and silver in India which has taken place at home, it cannot be denied that depreciation is possible and probable, and that the effect must be to render the original money assessment less adequate to the purposes for which the revenue is raised, and disproportionate to the resources from which it is levied. But in the period of twenty years past, during which a great change has taken place in Great Britain, we have not witnessed in this country such an advance of the rate of wages, or of the average price of corn, as to indicate a material and permanent alteration in the value of money compared with the necessaries of life: nor in the wider range of two to three centuries does there appear to have been changes, keeping exactly pace with those that have occurred in the same period in Europe. The price of provisions in the time of the Emperor Akber,* and the relative proportions of a money rent and a rent in kind, differ much less from the present prices, than a similar comparison at an equal interval in Great Britain would shew. Still, however, as already acknowledged, looking

* Price of wheat, as stated in the Institutes of the Emperor Akber. 12 dams per maund of 30 dams, =26 dams or 10 anas nearly per bazar maund.—Flour, 22 dams per maund of 30 dams,= 1 rupee 1½ anas per bazar maund.—Revenue of a begah of wheat, in kind, 4 maunds 12¾; in money (average of four provinces) highest rents 102 dams, medium of years 67 dams: 4 maunds 12¾, at 102 dams,=24 dams nearly; at 67 dams,=16 dams nearly, or 13 anas to 1 rupee 3 anas per bazar maund.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute

looking forward to a distant period, depreciation of gold and silver, and consequent inadequacy of a fixed money assessment, may be expected at a future, though probably a remote time.

It will be in the recollection of the Board, that this point was brought under consideration by me, when the measures to be taken in execution of a Regulation which had been passed in 1807 were under deliberation. It was, however, thought unnecessary to deviate from the example of the arrangements which had been adopted and approved in regard to Bengal; and, in fact, whenever it might be judged necessary to apply a remedy to this contingent evil in Bengal, the same remedy would be, in like manner, applicable to other provinces in similar circumstances.

I speak of the application of a remedy to it, conceiving it to be not impracticable to apply a direct one, by inducing the landholders to enter into modified or explanatory engagements, which should provide for the case of a great diminution or augmentation of the average price of corn. This might be effected by converting the existing engagements for a specific amount in specie, wholly or partly into engagements for the market value of a specific quantity of corn (rice or wheat), with such restrictions and stipulations as would be requisite to prevent inconvenience and abuse.

I consider it not unlikely that landholders might be brought to accede to a proposition of this nature, because they cannot but have experience of the fluctuation of the markets subjecting them to loss from low prices: and although progressive enhancement be more probable than progressive decrease of prices, it is by no means certain that such will be the event, nor is it likely to be so within the short period to which the foresight of a Zemindar looks forward; and the prospect of obtaining a reduction of jumma, if there be cause for it, might, in the Zemindar's estimation, compensate for the chance of an enhancement of his assessment.

I offer this suggestion, without going into the particulars of it as a matured plan, merely to show that the contingent evil, consequent on a depreciation of gold and silver, apparently admits of the present application of a direct prevention. I hope to shew that it also admits of indirect palliations, in course of discussing other points connected with this question.

A public revenue, derived, as it here is, chiefly from a direct tax of limited amount on land, doubtless may become insufficient for the public exigencies, not only from the operation of the cause I have been now considering, but also from the necessary calls for increase of expenditure arising from other causes, which give to the Government a fair right to levy the required funds from its subjects, in whose defence or protection the increased expense is incurred. This, it is true, cannot be effected so simply nor so readily by indirect taxes, consisting of imposts on articles of consumption, as it would be by a direct tax, could such be imposed, introducing the Government to share with the landholder in the augmented produce of the land, and increased income derivable from it. But the disappointment said to have been experienced in Bengal, and which is considered to be accounted for by a reference to the habits and disposition of the people, is thought to go further, and to demonstrate that compensation; for the insufficiency of the fixed land revenue cannot be obtained through other taxes.

No doubt, the expectation of an early and great increase of the public resources, by means of imposts on articles of luxury, if such were entertained, has been disappointed: but a close examination of the result of past experience will, I think, show that the Government has received, in other forms, a full proportion of the improvement which has taken place in the land.

The extent and value of the general improvement may be judged from the particular instances which come under the notice of the Revenue and Judicial Authorities, when occasions arise for ascertaining the proprietor's income by regular inquiry, or when it is incidentally made known, or is deducible from other circumstances, such as the price which lands fetch at public or at private sale. From such sources of information there are grounds for reckoning the net income of Zemindars, upon an average, at an amount equal to half the assessment assessment payable to Government. This indicates an improvement in the proportion of one-third of the former produce of the land.* But neither would it be just that the whole, or much the greater part of the increase of clear rent payable to the landholder should be taken for the Government; nor were it enacted would any great improvement take place, since the landholder would have no adequate inducement to promote it; nor under a prospect of even a moderate increase of the assessment, would improvement be so rapid as it has since the permanent settlement was concluded. Upon the whole, considering that the increase of cultivation would have been less, and that a portion of the augmented rent must have been allowed to the Zemindar, it would be a high estimate to rate the proportion in which the land revenue in Bengal might be now raised, were the assessment open to revision, at one-fifth of the original jumma. Some estates might doubtless bear a much greater increase; while others, on the contrary, would not afford any augmentation: but the average would not, so far as can be judged, exceed that proportion. No augmentation, it should be remembered, had taken place in the land revenue, nor in the resources from which it was drawn, in the lapse of an equal space of time which preceded the decennial, now the permanent settlement.

The amount of this estimated produce, supposing a revision of the assessment could be now undertaken, does not exceed fifty-four lacs of rupees.† The resources of the state, in other branches, have been meantime increased in a higher ratio; and the state has benefitted by the augmentation, during the whole period of its progress.

The customs levied at inland stations, which at the time of their abolition was levied at eleven lacs, have since their re-establishment yielded a revenue, within the same provinces, exceeding that amount by five and a half lacs of rupees, being in the year 1811-12, 16,68,336 rupees, and are becoming annually more and more productive.‡

The abkaree, or tax on spirituous liquors, has been raised from the very low valuation at which it was separated from the land revenue, or Rupees 34,602, the sum which it produced in the next following year, viz. 1790-1, to Rupees 8,34,695, the amount realized in the past year, exhibiting an increase of more than eight lacks of rupees. Including Benares, the increase exceeds ten lacks.§ This revenue also is in course of gradual augmentation.

In the salt department a still greater increase has been effected, the net revenue of this branch having been raised from Rupees 65,03,778 in the year 1789-90, to Rupees 1,13,64,064 in the past year, or 1,17,71,302 on the average of the last five, exhibiting an improvement of Rupees 52,67,524. And here, likewise, a very considerable and early augmentation may be confidently looked to, as well from the success of measures in progress for obtaining from our own coast supplies of salt equal to the consumption of the country, as from annually disposing of larger quantities of salt to meet the growing demand of a population becoming more numerous and more wealthy.

Credit will not be taken, in this place, for a similar increase of net revenue in the department of opium, as the whole of this revenue is levied on foreign consumption.

On the other hand, the duties on stamps are a new resource, but not considerable nor likely to become so; for the whole of which, however, credit is to be here taken as additional revenue.

The aggregate of all these greatly exceeds what can be considered to have been foregone of land revenue: and although a part might have been equally expected to accrue if that were not foregone, another portion may be fairly set off in account against it; for the increased expenditure of landholders enjoying augmented incomes does not escape taxation, whether chiefly applied to the consumption of luxuries or bestowed on retinues and dependents, the income becoming more productive in the one case, and the revenue from salt and abkaree in the other; and the increase of these branches of the public revenue must be principally attributed to the diffusion of wealth and general improvement of the condition of the people, which have been the result of the permanent settlement and concomitant arrangements.

Neither does it appear unreasonable, when this subject is considered with reference not to the lapse of a few years, but to a large period (and the question admits of this view), to expect that such a change in the habits of the opulent part of the community may take place, as will induce a more general consumption of luxuries, or of articles fetched from distant places, and will in other respects afford greater scope for the establishment of indirect imports. Some indications of an incipient change of manners having this tendency are certainly perceptible, and it probably will spread.

Should it be otherwise, and should the necessities of the state absolutely require an augmentation of the revenue, for which provision cannot be made by other taxes, the resource is open, after taxing to the utmost tobacco, an article of unusual consumption, to re-establish transit and market duties on corn, and on other articles sold at no great distances from the places of growth. It is certainly not desirable to revive these taxes, which were abolished on account of the exactions and abuses to which they were found liable. But these resources do exist, if the present branches of the fisc cannot be improved to keep pace with the wants of the state, nor new and less exceptionable sources of revenue be devised.

It should always be remembered, that but for the permanent settlement, or some other system of equal efficacy (if other there be), that degree of improvement would not have taken place which we now witness, and which suggests the idea that an available resource of increased land revenue has been foregone; nor in any circumstances would improvement have kept pace with the public wants arising from foreign wars.

A proprietor, as already observed, has no inducement to employ labour or capital to augment the productiveness of his estate, if the fruits of his toil, and recompence of his risk, will after a short interval accrue wholly or chiefly to the state. To obviate this, it has been suggested that the settlement of the revenue should be for a long term of years, or for life or lives.

Either of these modes, it is true, might to a certain degree operate like the permanent settlement in promoting increase of agriculture. A system of leasing the revenue for lives would, however, be subject to the inconveniences and defects which the Honourable Court has noticed; for the reward of toil employed, and the return of capital adventured in improvement, would be very unequally realized, according to the vast diversity in the duration of lives; and the continual occurrence of casualties would annually require revision and adjustment of new assessments for a portion of every district. This, it must be acknowledged, would be an evil of great magnitude, for the reasons to which the Honourable Court has adverted, since all the Revenue officers cannot be equally well qualified for the constant discharge of this duty, and frequent revisions of assessment, attended as they must be by vexatious scrutinies into the resources of estates, would throw into the hands of native officers employed under the Collectors, opportunities for mal-practices, which they would not fail to embrace. It is one of the advantages of the permanent settlement, which cannot be too highly appreciated, that by taking away the temptation to abuse, to which frequent resettlements are liable, the native officers have not the opportunity, which they are so prone to use, of abusing the confidence of their superiors.

On the other hand, if in consideration of these and other objections to assessments for life, the settlement were, for a long term of years, to be followed at its expiration by a new assessment at an advanced rate, in proportion to the increased assets and resources of estates, landholders would practise the artifice which is not unfrequent among them, when their engagements are nearly expired, by contracting the cultivation of the land and throwing great part of it out of tillage, to secure to themselves a reduced assessment at a new settlement. Such artifices would be much more generally and extensively practised, as the inducement would be far greater and the scope wider, in the case of engagements for a long term of years, than for a short one.

Still, however, considering the question with reference exclusively to the interests of the fisc, I apprehend that the assessments of the land revenue for lives, or for long terms of years, would have been more for the advantage of the state, in this view, than a settlement of that revenue in perpetuity. And were the question entirely an open one, to be now determined for the first time, I should incline to recommend the adoption of one or other of these modes, notwithstanding the many and important public benefits appertaining to a permanent settlement.

But the landholders have rights and expectations, founded on promises express or implied, which it can be neither just nor politic to disappoint. They have been formally declared to possess the property in the soil. That recognition was accompanied in the Lower Provinces by a permanent assessment of the revenue exigible from these lands, and in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces by the promise of a future permanent settlement, at the expiration of a certain period, for such estates as might be sufficiently well cultivated. Under this promise, added to the example of the antecedent measures of Government in regard to the Lower Provinces, they have associated with the recognized right of property, a title, which they consider equally acknowledged, to have a permanent settlement, if not at the period first specified, yet whenever their lands shall afterwards be in a sufficiently forward state of culture.

The disappointment of this expectation will be imputed by them to breach of faith, in withholding the fulfilment of a promise, and declining to give effect to rights conferred on them by the British Government. The unequal treatment, in this respect, received by them, of which they will be continually reminded, by comparison with the condition of their more fortunate neighbours in the Lower Provinces, will rankle in their minds. Less grateful for benefits received and for the advantages of peace and protection enjoyed by them, than resentful for what is withheld, they will remain dissatisfied and disaffected.

If we would secure the attachment of the great body of the landholders (and in securing their attachment we command that of the whole peasantry and mass of the population, influenced by them), we must give them a permanent interest in upholding our Government. They must have nothing to hope and every thing to fear from change. They are a people bold, and by disposition turbulent; not to be conciliated solely by protection in the enjoyment of peace, of which they are even impatient, but by the strict fulfilment of the word of Government, to their entire conviction of its good faith, and by giving them a deep and vital interest in its stability.

When

When the landholder's property in the soil was first declared, had the recognition been then accompanied by the declaration of a system, not of permanent settlement and fixed assessment, but of temporary engagements subject to eventual or periodical revision, the feelings of the people might have been different: they might have been reconciled to a limited boon, though yet envious of their happier neighbours in the Lower Provinces. But I apprehend that it is too late, consistently with policy and good faith, to retrace our steps, and that the Company can no more withhold from its subjects in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces the expected permanency of assessment, according to the fair and liberal construction of the original promise, than it can withdraw from those of the Lower Provinces the permanency granted to them and so solemnly ratified and confirmed.

Mr Colebrooke's Minute

But although I think the Zemindars might have been reconciled to a system of temporary assessment, subject to revision and increase in proportion to the augmented resources of estates, had that been originally announced to them, I cannot think it would have been consistent with the declaration of a property in the soil, nor with the policy which dictated that declaration. The great proportion of the net collections claimed for Government was hardly compatible with the notion of such a property, if future improvement were also to be similarly shared. We cannot call him proprietor of an estate, who is allowed to retain but the tithe of its income; nor is that a property, the possession and enjoyment of which will promote the prosperity of the people, and one that will secure to Government the easy and punctual realization of the revenue reserved from the land.

It was a fundamental principle of the plan, under which the proprietary right of the Zemindars was declared, that the land should be security, and the only requisite security for the revenue; and that the complex system, and harassing expedients of attachment of crops, requisition of surety, restraint of person, carried even to actual imprisonment (not to speak of other coercion), and distraint and sale of personal effects, should be disused. The discontinuance of means so obnoxious, so grating to enforce and so oppressive to suffer, is hardly less a relief to the people than to the authorities placed over them; but would be very imperfectly, if at all attained, by any thing short of a permanent assessment, expectant at least, if not actually concluded. The property of the land is little valuable to a purchaser of it, if it be liable to variation of assessment, postponed but for the life of the former possessor, a person probably of ruined fortunes and broken heart; or if the settlement were for a term of years, it becomes of little value when the expiration of that term approaches. We have seen, in the early experience of the settlement in the Lower Provinces, that the land was an insufficient security for the revenue in the first half of the decennial period, before the proprietor's income had been generally raised to a greater proportion than at first it bore to the public assessment.

If the occupants and cultivators were the real proprietors, according to notions which have been entertained of the ryottee tenure, and the Zemindar were merely a public officer collecting the dues of Government, the tithe might have been a sufficient allowance, as the recompense of an official duty. But, in that view, it was the occupant and cultivator with whom the assessment should be adjusted, and on his tenure the revenue secured. A proprietor surely should have more than the tithe, or twice the tithe of the net income of his estate. Scarcely any value can be considered to attach to a property, the net receipt from which is hardly more than equivalent to the trouble and responsibility of realizing for Government its very large proportion of the produce.

I do not mean to contend, that previously to any assurances given on this point, it was indispensably necessary to fix a money assessment in perpetuity. But it would have been right, and if finally the system of temporary assessments be adopted it will be proper, to limit to a moderate proportion the share of Government in the assets, upon future revision and adjustment of enhanced assessment.

I pass to the consideration of other objections. It is observed, that after the conclusion of permanent engagements fixing the land revenue, the Government

ment can no longer undertake, at the charge of the state, works of general utility, the benefit of which would accrue exclusively to the people, while the expense would be borne by the state, without compensation or reimbursement. It is also thought, that unless undertaken by the Government, conformably with ancient practice, works of this nature will remain unexecuted and unattempted, the people being unused and indisposed to such enterprises.

The observation is true, as it regards works of great magnitude; such as the dykes of large rivers, bridges, roads, and causeways between distant towns, and canals of great extent. These are far above individual enterprise, whether incited by motives of pious liberality or by views of lucre: but works of less extent, which are those most required for purposes of agriculture, such as dykes of moderate extent to prevent local inundation, and canals intended for the same purpose, or for irrigation, and ponds, wells, and reservoirs designed for the latter object, are quite common and familiar to the people, continually executed by opulent persons or by parties interested, under a generous impulse or from a personal motive. But in the present state of society in our Indian provinces there is neither the spirit nor the science requisite, nor a disposition to co-operation, sufficiently extensive for greater undertakings; and these must remain unattempted, unless by Government, or under its influence and direction.

These considerations have not been overlooked by us in the particular case of a work actually in contemplation. I allude to the projected canal in the upper part of the Dooab: in regard to which we recommend to the Court of Directors to except from permanency the assessment of that part of the country which will be benefited by the intended canal. No doubt, rational plans of future enterprises of great magnitude, not now foreseen, may be hereafter devised, which, were they now anticipated, would be fit objects of a similar exception.

This subject, as it concerns another description of public works, continually recurs to our notice, and has been a frequent topic of deliberation: I allude to high roads. No funds now exist for the construction of them, nor even for their repairs; and the state of the communications by land is, generally speaking, extremely bad, to the great inconvenience of travellers and detriment of commerce. It cannot be expected that much should be done by the Government out of a limited land-revenue, not more than adequate to other urgent calls which more immediately concern the state; and the resource of tolls on vehicles and carriage and cattle is in this country of doubtful efficacy and policy, though very fit to be tried, and if practically successful, to be generally introduced.

I do not, however, apprehend that this matter, on the supposition of the failure of tolls, is yet wholly without remedy. It falls within the limits of the legislative powers of this Government to authorize an assessment on the parties who will benefit by a public work, to defray the expense of it. However, lest such an impost, levied principally from landholders or their tenants, should be deemed an infringement of the promise and engagement by which Government is bound not to raise the jumma, it might be right to make it a condition, requisite to the imposition of a direct tax on income from land, intended to defray the expense of some public work approved and authorized by Government, that the consent of the majority of landholders, in number or in amount of jumma, should be signified by a written document or razunamah. Their consent might be readily obtained for such an impost of moderate amount, appropriated to works of evident and unquestioned utility, to be executed in their vicinity (for example, the construction and repair of principal roads, with requisite causeways and bridges, in the district in which they reside, or in which their lands are situated), especially if they be satisfied, from the checks which may have been provided to that end, that the money will be strictly and exclusively applied to the intended purpose. It will only be requisite to declare that the assent of the majority (reckoned by number or by amount of jumma) to the amount which is to be raised, or to the rate of assessment by which it is to be levied, shall be binding on the rest, after having received the sanction of the Government.

Upon

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

Upon this principle, with subsidiary rules, into the particulars of which it is unnecessary to enter at present, provision might be made for the execution of public works, without expense to the Government, and at the sole charge of those who are to reap the principal advantage of them.

Taking a general review of that branch of the subject proposed to be treated in this minute, which has been already discussed, namely, the expediency and policy of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, and adverting to an experience of more than twenty years in Bengal, it may be affirmed, that the liberal policy on which that measure was founded, though it may not have been at once rewarded with immediate success, owing to causes which having been since rectified it is now unnecessary to discuss, has ultimately been followed by the benefits which were expected to result from it. The land revenues are realized with unexampled skill and punctuality, no longer requiring the harassing process of attachment of person or crops, and rarely needing recourse to the severe measure of a sale for the recovery of arrears, the threat of that measure generally sufficing for the enforcement of the public dues. No remissions, or next to none, are now necessary, and but few suspensions of demand by reason of calamity of season. No diminution has taken place in the general assessment from the unproductiveness of particular estates, which has not been more than compensated by increase on others that have been subject to a re-settlement. The present landholders (I use this expression, because a considerable revolution of property took place, which was not however necessarily connected with the system of permanent assessment) are opulent and prosperous. Increase of agriculture has proceeded with rapidity surpassing expectation, and in the greatest part of the country has already reached its limit, unless it receive new impulse from the introduction of improved modes of husbandry.

Other branches of the public revenue have mean-time become more productive, and been increased in a greater degree than the income of landholders has been augmented: I apprehend, therefore, it cannot be here said, that the relinquishment of Government's share of increased land-rents has been uncompensated. Under a system of frequent temporary settlements, improvement would have been null: under that of assessment for lives or for long terms of years, it would have been very inferior to what is now witnessed under that of permanent assessment. Through the encouragement this has afforded, it has been great beyond expectation, but does not appear to have raised the landholder's income to a higher ratio to the public revenue payable for his lands, than an owner's net-rent ought to bear to the direct tax which is imposed on his estate.

Upon the whole, the trial which has been made in Bengal and the contiguous provinces, I consider to exhibit a result favourable to the system of permanent assessment; and without insisting that the system, as it was here framed, was perfect, and would not have admitted of amendment on the extension of it to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, when promised for a future period by the Proclamation of 1802, or in anticipation of that period by the Regulation of 1807, I am strongly impressed with the opinion, that good policy requires, with reference to the expectations of the people and to many important benefits accruing to the state, that a system of permanent assessment, either copied from that of Bengal, or with such emendations as may be determined on, should be generally introduced, whenever the sanction of the Honourable Court of Directors can be obtained for it.

This brings me to another branch of the subject intended to be discussed in this minute: whether the time taken was rightly chosen for the execution of the measure; or treating the question prospectively, whether the measure, as a general one, be yet seasonable, with reference to the state of cultivation of a part, and to the knowledge possessed of the tenures, assets, and resources of the rest.

I do not apprehend that the knowledge of the tenures, or the means of investigating the resources of the land in the Western Provinces, were deficient, or now are so, any more than in the Lower Provinces, at the period of concluding the decennial settlement, since become a permanent one.

 The

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

The tenures are less various and complex in the Upper Provinces. They consist, for the most part, in the hereditary and acknowledged title of village Zemindar, sometimes held by individuals, oftener by numerous sharers, termed Puteedars. These are very generally the chief cultivators, as well as the sole owners of the land. Some particularities exist, in regard to the manner of adjusting among themselves their respective possessions, and their contributions towards the discharge of the revenue, but throw no difficulty or embarrassment in the way of the public assessment of the entire village.

A comparatively small number of greater estates, consisting of places unowned by village Zemindars, belongs to another order of landholders, called in those provinces Talookdars.

But the intricate claims and pretensions, extending through a long gradation of tenure, from the sudder or pergunnah Zemindar to the village one, and to the subordinate Talookdar, dependent or independent, which occasioned much perplexity and embarrassment in Bengal, are unknown to the Western Provinces.

In regard to the means of ascertaining the resources of the lands, the correspondence which has been submitted to us, in the progress of the late settlement, has satisfactorily shewn that those means were not deficient. The office of Canongoe, and that of Mirdah, were found in full efficiency. The records of collections of former years were forthcoming; and officers were in attendance, trained to the duty of inquiring and reporting the actual cultivation and its value, as well as the proportion of arable land lying untilled, and fully competent to the performance of it.

A sufficient time has elapsed to afford practical evidence of both the moderation and the adequacy, or in one word, the fairness of the assessment. A very great increase was obtained, to which the landholders agreed, in contemplation of advantages which they expected to derive from future improvement under a permanent assessment: but in no instance was the increase of the jumma carried to such an extreme, as to be attended with consequences similar to those which the Honourable Court notices to have been experienced in Dindigul. It has not been necessary to annul settlements which had been ratified, and to reduce the jumma on the ground of over-assessment, as was necessary, in some instances, even in the Lower Provinces.

The collection of this highly-raised jumma has been conducted with greater ease and with less resource to public sales, than under the preceding temporary settlements of the same provinces, and with more facility than that of the decennial settlement of Bengal, in the first years of the decennial period; although the increase of jumma in the Lower Provinces was far less considerable. Nor is there any reason to think that the lands have been under-assessed; for, as already observed, the landholders would not have acceded to the assessment and engaged for so high a jumma, but for the expectation of benefit from prospective improvement, and the apprehension of being excluded from it if their estates should be let in farm.

It is not to be supposed, that in every instance, without exception, the jumma has been apportioned with perfect equality and exactness Such perfection is not to be looked for in this, any more than in any other matter. But there is reason to be satisfied, from what has come officially before us, as well as from other information, that the assessment has been in general equal and fair, and conformable to the rules prescribed for its adjustment; and that the instances of too heavy or too light a jumma are comparatively few, and do not run into extremes; and that, had the settlement been honoured by the confirmation of the Court of Directors, its success, and the public benefits resulting from it, would have been more uniform and complete than in the Lower Provinces.

There is not any ground to believe that resources of the revenue have been concealed, and lands liable to assessment been withheld from the rental, in any other form but that of unauthorized lakheraj. As these, however, are expressly excepted, and the inquiry into the validity of the grants by which they are held can be better undertaken and conducted by the public officers, when at leisure from the pressing avocations incident to the adjustment of frequent quent temporary settlements, the resumption of invalid grants, and recovery of unduly aliened resources, would be assisted, instead of being obstructed, by the conclusion of a permanent settlement. Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

There is, however, another point of view, in which, it must be acknowledged, that some sacrifices on the part of the state, in favour of the great benefits to result from the measure, were made by the perpetual settlement of Bengal, and by that directed, with reservation of the approval of the Court of Directors, by the 10th Regulation of 1807.

I mean, in the instances of estates, in which the cultivated part bore a small proportion to the uncultivated.

In many of the districts of the Lower Provinces, and in some of those of the western, very extensive tracts of forest-land were claimed by, or really appertained to proprietors who had comparatively small portions of land in tillage. Every district contained some instances of scattered estates, in which the untilled lands much exceeded the arable. Many of these forests and wastes are so situated or circumstanced, as to be incapable of culture under any mode of management and husbandry which has been tried, or which may be expected to be introduced. Many of them are barren; the rest so nearly so, that they never can render to the proprietor more than a scanty revenue drawn from spontaneous productions. The greater part cannot be reclaimed, but at an expense which would amply purchase the income they may yield in their most improved state; and this consideration led to the relinquishment of the right which Government might have reserved, of assessing these lands when brought into cultivation.

But some wastes there were, I may say there are, which though capable of tillage, had remained, or yet remain uncultivated, solely for want of hands, in consequence of a scanty neighbouring population. In these instances, and in the case of dispersed estates which contain a disproportionate quantity of untilled land capable of culture, the proprietor, whose assessment is fixed on a small portion of cultivated ground, arrives, when the whole is reclaimed, to the condition of an owner paying a quit-rent or nominal due, rather than land-tax.

The instances being either few or unimportant in most of the districts, and frequent only in frontier districts, and for the most part confined to frontier lands, which are least likely to become valuable, the sacrifice does not appear to have been great, provided the vast tract called Sunderbunds be yet at the disposal of Government, which I trust it will be found to be, notwithstanding the pretensions of the bordering Zemindars, who are stated, in a correspondence which passed in 1780, to claim the property of those forests up to the shores of the sea, grounding their pretensions, I presume, on their having been used to make collections from wood-cutters, and from persons resorting to those forests to gather the spontaneous productions of them. But as the right of Government to make grants has never been relinquished, nor the practice of making them by the Board of Revenue been discontinued, unless recently, I conceive it to be still in the option of Government to resume the design of claiming the Sunderbunds; and judging from the avidity with which grants have been sought on the island of Saugur and adjoining part of the main, a disposition to enterprise now manifests itself, which if properly directed, may forward the great object of reclaiming from waste, and settling and peopling that vast tract.

It may be inferred, from what has been here said, that it would not have been unadvisable, at the time of making the permanent settlement of Bengal, to have excepted at least the extensive tracts of waste which were so circumstanced as to be capable of being brought into cultivation, if not the scattered estates also, in which the proportion of waste land, fit for cultivation, was excessive: and such exceptions may be very fitly made, if the Honourable Court of Directers should authorize generally a settlement of the land revenue of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces: and if to this be joined the measure of reckoning the revenue at the value in corn, the chief objections of the Honourable Court to a settlement in perpetuity will, I trust, be obviated.

Dated the 2d October 1813.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

Letter to, dated 29th Jan. 1813. (Par. 21 to 37.) Respecting the settlement of Etawah and Allyghur. Remarks relative to the ryotwar and zemindarry settlements.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 2d Oct. 1813.

Par. 13. THE questions discussed in these paragraphs may, we believe, be reduced for the most part to three heads: 1st A review of the settlement of the districts of Etawah and Allyghur; 2d. The comparative advantage of khas management, as it is termed in this country, and of the farming system; and 3dly. The general expediency of permanent settlements.

14. We are not aware that the observations made by you on either of these questions, important as they no doubt by their nature are, require, at least at present, any detailed reply.

15. The settlement which was provisionally concluded of the above districts in perpetuity, will, of course, undergo revision, conformably to the orders contained in your dispatch of the 27th November 1811, to which we had the honour of replying on the 30th October 1812, and on the 17th July last.

16. The observations contained in the sixth and subsequent paragraphs of our address of the 19th June last, together with the letters from our Secretary, dated the 22d June and 11th September last, enclosing copies of reports from the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners, will put your Honourable Court fully in possession of the sentiments entertained by ourselves and those Boards respecting the prejudicial and ruinous effects of khas management.

17. The dispatch to which we have already, more than once, referred, respecting the permanency of the settlement, contains our sentiments on that subject, and the arguments on which those sentiments are founded.

18. In this place, therefore, we shall only venture to offer one suggestion, viz. that great circumspection should be observed in adopting the practice existing in the territories dependent on the Presidency of Fort St. George, or the result of that practice, as the basis of any arrangements in Bengal; for, from what we can discern, the local circumstances of the two countries differ very materially. Certain at least, it is, that the most intelligent and respectable officers at the two presidencies, respectively, appear to entertain sentiments diametrically the reverse of each other, on questions of primary importance to the security of the public revenue and the general improvement of the country. We are by no means disposed to dispute the authority of Colonel Munro, in regard to any matter which may have fallen under his observation in the course of his official duty; but we cannot think that it would be safe to attempt to reduce his opinions to practice in this country, in opposition to the sentiments of Sir Edward Colebrooke, Mr. Rocke, Mr. Lumsden, and Mr. Deane. But even admitting, for the sake of argument, the ryotwar system to be applicable to both presidencies, the great extent of the collectorships and the paucity of revenue officers would render the successful adoption of it in these provinces absolutely impossible.

19. A copy of the documents which accompanied your dispatch has been forwarded to the Board of Commissioners; and if they should see grounds to alter the sentiments which they are known to have hitherto entertained on the subject, they will, of course, address us for the information of your Honourable Court.

SIR:

IN continuation of the remarks contained in the sixth to the sixteenth paragraph of the despatch from the Governor-General in Council to the Honourable nourable the Court of Directors, of the 19th instant, I am directed to request that you will lay before the Court the accompanying copy of a letter and of its enclosures, from the Board of Revenue, respecting the management of lands, of which a settlement may not have been concluded with the actual proprietors, or which they may be incompetent, from their tender age or other circumstances, to manage themselves. A copy of the Board of Commissioners' report on the same subject will be duly forwarded to the Honourable Court when received.

Report of the Board of Revenue, dated 15*th June* 1813.

To the Right Honourable Gilbert Lord Minto, Governor-General in Council, &c. &c. &c. Fort William

My Lord:

1. In conformity to the instructions communicated in a letter from the Chief Secretary, under date the 27th of March last, we have the honour to submit our sentiments on the system of farm and khas management, after having attentively considered the extract from the Honourable the Court of Directors' letter which accompanied that from the Chief Secretary.

Report Board of Revenue, 15 June 1813.

2. This question has frequently been discussed by the several Members of our Board at different periods; and every practicable expedient having been resorted to, without success, to improve the system of khas management, or detailed collection of the revenue from the cultivators of the land, it has been, in almost all cases, changed for that of farming. The practical results of each system will be clearly seen from the accompanying statements.

3. We shall briefly state the causes which appear to have rendered the due collection of the public revenue, under a system of khas management, impracticable.

4. In the first place, we beg to express our entire concurrence in the opinion expressed by the Honourable Court, that a local survey ought ever to form the ground-work of this system of collection. That no such survey have been made of the tract under our controul is well known to your Lordship in Council: but even if they had existed, we much doubt whether the system of management in question could be generally adopted, with any reasonable prospect of success.

5. The disposition of the natives of this quarter of India to deceit and fraud on all occasions, renders it almost impossible to ensure a faithful execution of any trust committed to them; and it is obvious that, in a khas collection, a great deal must depend upon the conduct of the native officers employed in making it. The regulations of Government, indeed, prescribe the attestation of accounts on oath; but experience proves, that the obligation of an oath is very little, if at all, regarded by the natives. It may be said, that the same Regulations direct the infliction of severe punishment on those who deliver in false accounts on oath; but the means of proof are so difficult, that the rule has proved almost nugatory.

6. We are fully aware that the frauds which are so generally committed by the natives, who must necessarily be employed in the details of a khas collection, may be very much checked by the superintendence of a vigilant and intelligent Collector; and we must admit that much of the loss which has accrued under this system, may be ascribed to a want of exertion and efficient controul on the part of the Collectors. However, as it is evident that a high degree of qualification cannot be expected in all the public officers of this description, we think there can be no doubt of the inexpediency of reverting to a system, under which so much loss of revenue has been experienced.

 7. We

Report Board of Revenue 15 June, 1813.

7. We are not aware of the circumstances under which the system of khas management appears to have been so successfully established, in the territories dependent upon the other presidencies alluded to by the Honourable Court; but we apprehend there must be some favourable peculiarities, which do not exist in the provinces under the Supreme Government, at least not in that part of them the revenues of which are placed under our controul.

8. Of late years, it has not been necessary either to let in farm, or to hold under khas management, estates to any considerable extent, except those belonging to disqualified landholders. In the year 1804, a particular report was called for by the Government, on the subject of the estates of that description. From a statement furnished by the Board of Revenue, under date the 13th April, 1804, the arrears then outstanding on account of those estates, up to that period, embracing a term of twelve years, appeared to amount to Rupees 14,16,912, upon a demand of Rupees 2,06,94,236. Of that sum, Sicca Rupees 3,95,146 were expected to be realized, leaving a balance, including remissions already authorized, of Sicca Rupees 10,21,766, or somewhat less than five per cent. on the demand. As estates of this description are not liable to sale for arrears of the public revenue, the balances in question were of course irrecoverable.

9. The Governor-General in Council, observing that the heavy arrear had accrued under serbarrakaree-management (or the system of administering the estates under the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards through the agency of a Serberakar, or manager, in the mode of khas collection) was pleased to direct that, from that time, the estates under the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards should be let in farm in all possible cases, a preference being given to the relations and connections of the person to whom the estate belonged.

10. The following statement shews the result of the system adopted under the abovementioned orders.

11. The sudder jumma of the mehals under the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards, from the year 1209 to 1218, a period of ten years, is Rupees 80,91,387, on which a balance of 12,402 has accrued, or about eight and a half annas per cent. It is also to be observed, that the sum of Rupees 5,98,524 has been collected in excess to the jumma of Government, which has been appropriated for the benefit of the proprietors.

12. The statements before noticed exhibit, in so forcible a light, the practical advantages of the farming system over that of khas collection, with respect to the security of the public revenue, that we shall now only consider the opinion given by the Honourable Court, "that the farming system is oppres-"sive to the contributors, and must be ultimately injurious to the resources of "the country."

13. There can be no doubt that the evils contemplated by the Honourable Court are likely to exist, in some degree, when an estate is under the management of any other person than the proprietor; but we apprehend that, in general, the existing Regulations afford the cultivators reasonable protection against the exactions of farmers, and we have no reason to suppose that complaints, on the score of exactions, are more frequent against that class than against proprietors.

14. Admitting, however, that a greater degree of oppression is practised by farmers than we conceive to be the case we do not think that the management of a Serberakar or Aumeen is likely to be attended with much better consequences in this respect; and both modes are liable to an objection, which has sometimes come under our notice, that is, the alienation of some part of the land of the estate. This is sometimes effected by the collusion of the farmer with the neighbouring landholders, or by a farmer whose own estate borders on that which he has farmed, and to which he attaches some portion of the farmed lands; but the latter may be avoided, by guarding against the offers of any person who is in a situation to practise this fraud. The same object is sometimes accomplished by the connivance of the native officer in charge of a khas estate, the property of government, or of a disqualified landholder. This is an unavoidable evil under any system of administration, when estates are not directly managed by the proprietors, and we have no reason to believe that it has existed in any considerable degree. Report Board of Revenue, 15 June, 1813

Report of the Board of Commissioners, dated the 23d August, 1813.

To the Right Honourable Gilbert Lord Minto, Governor-General in Council, Fort William.

MY LORD :

1. WE have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Lordship's orders of the 27th March last, calling upon us for our sentiments in regard to the practical effect of khas management, which the Honourable the Court of Directors have recommended in the ninth paragraph of their letter of the 9th September 1812, as a general substitute for the usual practice of letting lands to farm, in cases where a settlement may not be made with the actual proprietors. Report Board of Commissioners, 23 August 1813.

2. Our experience, in the several gradations of a long service through which we have passed to the stations which we have now the honour to fill, and the insight derived from that experience into the character of the instruments to whom a khas collection must necessarily be entrusted, might have justified our submitting to your Lordship, at an earlier period, our decided opinion of the inexpediency of dispensing with formal engagements for the payment of a specific rent in any instance. But the respect due to a proposition emanating from so high an authority, sanctioned with their approbation, and recommended by the successful adoption of it at the other presidencies, imposed upon us the obligation of a deliberate reflection, which the question would otherwise not have appeared to call for.

3. In that experience, which has included, with more or less intimacy of acquaintance, the greatest portion of the British dominions under this presidency, we have met with few instances where a khas collection, whether in consequence of a settlement not having been made, or an attachment for the default of the party under engagements, has not been attended, sooner or later, by a considerable defalcation of the revenue. We have also found that, in many instances, this defalcation has annually increased, so long as the lands continued continued khas; and that, in some cases, it has rapidly extended, to a nearly total annihilation of the revenue.

4. But while we state the fact, we must at the same time add, that we know of no reason for its existence, except in the dishonesty of the native agents, and the impossibility of the Collector's affording a direct attention to the superintendence of the khas mehauls. Could the Collector personally superintend the kunkoot, the jumoke, the mussait, the nuzurundaze of the khas lands, or by whatever other technical term the adjustment of the landlord's share in each crop, and the mode of securing its realization into the public exchequer, may be denominated, we are not aware of any thing which could prevent Government from deriving the entire benefit of those assets, of which, in making engagements with the landholders, they are content to take little more than three-fourths.

5. We conceive, however, that the general duties of every Collector must make it scarcely possible for him to spare time and attention to the local details of the khas villages, dispersed, as they probably must be, through every part of his zillah. In these provinces, we may safely assert it to be physically impossible. Your Lordship is aware, that a greater revenue than what in the Lower Provinces employs twenty-two collectors is here committed to twelve only; that the Collector of Benares has a charge of nearly forty lacs, that six other districts either exceed or nearly approach to thirty lacs each; and that, exclusive of Furruckabad, which equals the average amount of the Bengal districts, no zillah in these provinces falls much short of the highest Bengal districts, with the single exception of Burdwan. Local management of the petty details of collecting the rents from the tenants of khas lands must, of necessity, be left to native agency; and your Lordship's records will afford adequate proofs of the character of such agency, in frequent instances of resettlements of khas estates, where engagements have been obtained for the immediate re-establishment of the full jumma, with a retrospective reimbursement of the defalcation which had accrued on khas management.

6. For facts in proof of this statement, we might content ourselves by appealing to your Lordship's records for the numerous cases of resettlement of khas estates in Benares which we have had occasion to submit to your Lordship, and to our own proceedings, for equally numerous instances in these provinces, where, in consequence of the incomplete state of the settlement, we have assumed a discretion of not troubling your Lordship with each individual case But, with a view to exemplify the subject more forcibly than by such insulated cases, we beg leave to annex the general statement of the result of khas collections in the district of Barelly on the expiration of the second settlement, and the annual accounts of such collections in the province of Benares for the three last years.

7. We are fully sensible, that farms on short leases to persons unconnected with the soil are not likely to encourage improvement, and on the contrary, may frequently tend to the impoverishment of the estate, particularly in the last year of the lease. We have accordingly, in all the settlements formed under our instructions, avoided, as far as possible, having recourse to farmers; and wherever the proprietors declined to engage or were not forthcoming our next object has been to obtain engagements from the Mokuddums or Purdhans for the individual village of each man's respective residence. This class of the higher order of peasantry are found to possess, from the hereditary lead which they hold among the tenants, as much influence in the estate, and as much attachment to the soil, as the proprietors themselves; and we have invariably found the settlements with them to be the most successful and substantial of all engagements. Khas management, by which we understand the direct interference of the officers of Government in the collection of the rent of his petty jote from each individual tenant of the village, even if it could, under the impediments which we have stated, be successful, can never, in any degree, be so substantial, and we doubt whether it would prove so beneficial to the tenants themselves.

8. The objection to farms in general, on the grounds of the want of interest of the farmers in the soil, does not exist in Benares, where the leases are for life.

life. A lease which is to continue as long as the lessee himself, connects him with the soil nearly as much as the actual property in it. But a serious objection remains against such life-tenures, and against all other long terms of lease to casual farmers: the long exclusion of the hereditary proprietors debases them ultimately into the mass of the tenantry of their own estates, and tends to the extirpation of a valuable class of subjects in the village Zemindars. The large talooks in these provinces may, accordingly, be all traced to this origin; and the Talookdars will be found to have held, in the first instance, as mere farmers, the lands from which they have finally succeeded in excluding altogether the hereditary proprietors, on the strength of real or pretended sales, mortgages, or other transfers of the property. As a large farm, comprising many villages, affords facilities to similar acquisitions by the farmers, even at the present moment, another principle on which we have proceeded, in cases where the Purdhans and Mokuddums could not be brought forward to engage, has been to obtain distinct farmers for each separate village where possible, and where not, to restrict the engagements of any individual farmer to as few villages as may be practicable. Report Board of Commissioners, 23 August 1813.

9. Your Lordship is aware, nor can it escape the Honourable Court, that the local usages, the habits and characters, the state and condition of the peasantry, and the tenures of the immediate cultivators of the soil, may vary so essentially in different parts of India, as to require a different mode of management. Circumstances materially distinct from what our experience has met with, may have given success, at the other presidencies, to the most minute subdivision of detail in a ryottee collection from the individual tenants; but, in the present constitution of these provinces, we may venture to assert that, were it practicable, it would not be expedient to extend the subdivision of the Collector's personal superintendence, in any minuteness of detail, beyond single villages, or distinct portions of villages forming separate estates.

We have, &c.

"to administer summary justice in revenue cases and attachments," for the purpose of checking the abuse to which attachment has been perverted, we understand to intend a summary inquiry, in cases of claims to arrears of rent, previous to a levy of distress, as authorized by the Regulations now in force.

10. On this subject we have recently had occasion to submit our sentiments to your Lordship in Council, in our remarks of the 31st May, upon the Report of the Senior Judge of the Calcutta Court of Circuit. We are convinced that some qualification of the power now vested in the landholders, farmers, and under-renters, to recover alleged arrears of rent by distress, without any previous investigation of the claim of arrear, is indispensably necessary, to secure the tenants of land from oppression and ruin. The principal question seems to be, what check can be established, consistently with the punctual realization of the just rents due to the landholders and farmers of land? And another question of some difficulty is, by whom the summary inquiry, to ascertain if the arrear claimed is due, should be made? We are not prepared to offer a final opinion, or any specific proposition on these points, for the consideration of your Lordship in Council, but hope to be able to do so at no distant period: and we, in the mean time, expect a report on the subject from the Magistrate of zillah Rajeshahy.

Extract of Letter to the Register to the Nizamut Adawlut, dated the 22d July 1809.

9. The Governor-General in Council has, for some time past, had under his consideration the best means of expediting the trial and decision of revenue causes, and for relieving the different courts of judicature from a part of the business with which they appear to be so generally overloaded, in a great measure, it is presumed, by means of causes of that description. On the most mature deliberation which the Governor-General in Council has yet been able to give to the subject, it appears to him that the most efficient remedy which could be applied to the existing inconvenience would be, to invest the collectors with the power of deciding, in the first instance, on claims to arrears of rent and complaints for excess of collection, leaving the party which may be dissatisfied with the decision of the Collector to bring the case before the Adawlut by a regular suit. The following reasons may be assigned in support of such an arrangement:

First. Material convenience was experienced by the public from the powers exercised by the Collector, with respect to revenue cases, during the existence of the Maul Adawluts, previously to the establishment of the system of 1793.

Secondly. The courts of judicature are not, by their constitution, well adapted for the discussion and elucidation of disputed accounts, which form ordinarily the basis of the causes in question.

Thirdly. Should the case, after it shall have been tried and decided by the Collector, come before the zillah or city Judge, in the form of a regular suit, the Judge will have the benefit of all the information which can be drawn from the Collector's offices, in most cases well arranged and digested, to facilitate and expedite the decision.

Fourthly. The course of proceeding now suggested does not establish any new principle at variance with the existing Regulations, it being provided by Section 13, Regulation VIII, 1794, that, "in cases concerning rent or revenue, &c. the Judge is empowered to refer to the Collector, for his report, any accounts the adjustment of which may be necessary towards the decision of the suits."

10. It will naturally occur to the Court, that the arrangement now suggested is closely connected, on the one hand, with the existing provisions,* respecting the powers vested in the landholders, farmers, and others, of distraining for arrear of rent; and on the other, with the rules respecting the trial of summary suits,† both which the Governor-General in Council has long thought require reconsideration and revision.

11. Should

* Regulation VII. 1799. † Ditto.

11. Should means be afforded to the Zemindars, farmers, and others, of recovering, without any material delay, arrears due to them, the power of distress may be modified. On the other side, by the power now proposed to be vested in the Collectors, the zillah and city Judges may be relieved from all the business occasioned by the institution of summary suits for rent. If there be any foundation for the remark made by the Magistrate of Nuddeah, that the abuse committed of the power of distress "has been partly the cause of the "excess to which dacoity has arisen," the evil urgently demands an early remedy.

Letter to Register to Nizamut Adawlut, 22 July 1809.

12. The Governor-General in Council requests that the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut will take the foregoing suggestions into their consideration, and that they will furnish him with their sentiments on the subject, in the form of a Regulation, or in such other mode as may appear to them most convenient.

Extract Letter from the Acting Judge of Circuit, Moorshedabad, dated 1*st August* 1810.

Par. 10. I CONCUR, in some respects, with what the Magistrate has said relative to the exactions and oppressions of the Zemindars and their adherents; but it is to be observed, on the other hand, that instances occur of the Ryot refusing to come forward to execute engagements when invited to do so by the Zemindars: and, generally speaking, there appears a want of confidence between them, which in the end produces those abuses which the Magistrate has so strongly marked. The Zemindar, his farmers, and Amlah of all denominations, abuse the powers with which they are vested, to exact from the Ryot to the utmost extent of his ability. He is thus often deprived of the means of complaint; and this system carried on from year to year, reduces the Ryot to the extreme of poverty, frequently the cause of commission of crimes, not it is to be hoped from any inherent depravity, but driven thereto by necessity to obtain a precarious and insecure subsistence.

Letter from Acting Judge of Circuit, Moorshedabad, 1 August 1810.

Extract Letter from the Magistrate, Zillah Dinagepore, to the Acting Judge of Circuit, Moorshedabad, dated 24th July 1810.

Three causes are pretty apparent to account for this poverty.—1st. The general character of the Zemindars. They are low people: low in their original character, and not since raised by their fortunes. Heretofore dependents on the Rajah of the district, and who occasioned the dismemberment of his estates by their plunder, and which again enabled them at the public sales to concentrate in their own persons the estates of their master.—2nd. Another class of the Zemindars are men of great wealth, whose sole object is to add daily to their store. They are resident in other parts, &c., draw from hence their lacs annually, to the impoverishment of the district.—3rd. What is the natural effect of the other two? A general system of rack-renting, hardheartedness, and exaction, through farmers, under-farmers, Kutkeenadars, and the whole host of zemindarry Amlah.

Letter to Acting Judge of Circuit, Moorshedabad, 24 July 1810.

Even this rack-renting is unfairly managed. We have no regular leases executed between the Zemindar and his tenants. We do not find a mutual consent and unrestrained negotiation in their bargains. Nothing like it: but instead, we hear of nothing but arbitrary demands enforced by stocks, duress of sorts, and battery of their persons.

There is also an intermediate class, the money man, in every village, who first relieves, then aggravates the evil by his own usurious practices, and enforces them by like means.

The

Letter to Acting Judge of Circuit, Moorshedabad, 24 July 1810.

The general consequence is general poverty.

The evil is of difficult remedy. It might perhaps be relieved by the compelling of the Zemindars to grant pottahs to their Ryots, and by establishing a register office for recording them; but it is to be feared that any arrangement requiring so much detail, and consequently so much superintendence, would fall into disuse.

In order, therefore, to secure the Ryot against the Zemindar and his myrmidons, it would be desirable to relieve him, by reducing or modifying the legal power of the Zemindar in the distraint of property; for reduced to poverty by distraint, the Ryot can neither spare his time (and as for money he has none) in pursuit of justice.

All distraint and sale should be prohibited, except for a balance claimed on a regularly registered pottah. Perhaps the present Regulations might admit a construction not very different: but the investigation thereof is not entrusted to the Cauzee or officer conducting the sale, but is open for a future discussion on a future prosecution, which the Ryot, by the very act of the distraint, is generally disabled to pursue. I am not, however, an advocate for giving power to commissioners, who are ever too open to improper influence, and therefore can only look to a proper remedy in the abolition of distraint and sale in toto. I do not write this without being equally prepared for clamour on the part of the Zemindars, that they cannot pay the Government revenue because they cannot collect their own rents.

If the Zemindar will give fair terms on a lease for three years, the Ryot will pay; but if, instead of a lease on fair terms, a nominal jumma is hinted to be hereafter heaped up with cesses of various kinds, extorted by duress, the Zemindar may not be able to collect, and who will lament if he suffers in consequence? But I will venture to say that the actual value of lands would be little affected by such abolition.

Extract of a Letter addressed to the Judge of Zillah Nuddea by the Register of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, under date the 16th August 1810.

Letter to Judge of Zillah Nuddea, 16 August 1810.

The Court observe, that Section 5, Regulation IV, 1794, declares the right of a Zemindar, Talookdar, or farmer of land, who may have publicly tendered pottahs to his Ryots, in conformity with that section, "entitled" to recover the rents due to them from such Ryots, either by the process of distraint laid down in Regulation XVII, 1793, or by suit in the Dewanny Adawlut. From this declaration, considered with Section 61, Regulation VIII, 1793, it might be inferred, that the right of recovering arrears of rent by distraint was meant to be restricted to arrears due on engagements executed in conformity with the provisions of Regulation VIII, 1793, or pottahs tendered in pursuance of Section 5, Regulation IV, 1794: but this question being of considerable importance, and the Court not having before them the plea which might be urged for a different practice, under established usage, or particular local circumstances, they decline offering any opinion upon it, until it shall come before them judicially.

However desirable it may be that the sale of distrained property should be suspended in certain cases, when the arrears claimed may not appear due, the Court are of opinion, that such authority is not vested in the Commissioners by the Regulations in force, which allow distrainers to cause the sales at their own risk for all arrears demanded by them, subject to the penalty declared in Section 6, Regulation XVII, 1793, if it shall afterwards appear, upon trial in the civil court, that the arrear claimed was not due.

Letter to Register of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, 18 June 1810.

Sir:

I have the honour to submit a statement, exhibiting the fees received by the native Commissioners in this district, for the year 1809, and beg to call the attention of the Court to the very inadequate amount of the receipts, and to the prejudicial effects of retaining such establishments.

The low and petty intrigues carried on at these courts may be more readily conceived than described. It may, however, be necessary to bring to the notice of the Court the mode in which the district is plundered through their means.

To each of these Commissioners there are attached a set of pettifogging Vakeels (to none less than four, and to others as far as ten), who are obliged to have recourse to all sorts of dirty actions to maintain themselves, and who in fact live on the public.

 It

Letter to Regist. of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, 18 June 1810.

It has been the practice in the district, either from ignorance of the power they possess, or from apprehension of incurring the penalty of transgressing, or of meeting with opposition, for the Zemindars to apply to the Commissioner to distrain the property of their Ryots, and not, as empowered by the Regulations, to distrain themselves, and then apply to the Commissioner to sell the property; and in order that this application may be done in form, a Vakeel steps forward, who exacts a fee, equal to one-fourth of the established fees on regular suits, for making the application. This being received, it becomes necessary to depute an Aumeen to distrain the property, and no person is considered more proper for the purpose, or less likely to infringe the Regulation, than a Vakeel; and the man who made the application is fixed upon and receives for his trouble five per cent., to which sum the expenses of distraint were limited by an order of the late Acting Judge. The property being then sold, the Commissioner receives his one ana in the rupee, as a compensation for his trouble. The Ryot remonstrates against the justice of the demand, and the enormous expense of upwards of twelve per cent. to the Commissioner, who sagaciously suggests that he has acted agreeably to the Regulations in selling the property, but that there is a section by which the Ryot can get redress, by prosecuting for an illegal distraint. Under such authority, the Ryot, assisted by another Vakeel, who has probably been watching all the time for a retainer, commences an action against the Zemindar, and if there is no bribery in the case, generally gains his suit, right or wrong; for this plain reason, that if the Commissioner did not pass a decree in favour of the plaintiff, in most cases, few would come to his court for justice, and he would consequently get no fees.

The above is a simple case between the Zemindar and Ryot; and it is obvious that the intention of the XXVIIIth Regulation of 1803 is defeated, and that instead of affording the Zemindars a ready mode of realizing their rents, it involves them in numberless petty law-suits.

A common plea set up by the Ryot in a prosecution for illegal distraint before the Commissioner is, that the land belongs to another village, and that he has paid his rent to the Zemindar of that village. The consequence is, that the Zemindar who distrained in the first instance, on being cast in the suit, is under the necessity of appealing, even though the decree against him may be for a sum not worth giving himself further trouble about; for if he does not, his land in fact becomes decreed the property of another.

In this district, the greater part of which has been waste for many years, there is, of course, great disputes respecting the boundaries of the different estates, and the various modes adopted for obtaining possession are deserving of notice. The disputed land, hitherto waste, being brought into cultivation, one Zemindar commences against the Ryots, by an application to the Commissioner to distrain. This frequently involves an affray, in the first instance; and at all events, a number of petty prosecutions before the Commissioners, with appeals, &c. The other Zemindar has also recourse to the same Commissioner, and commences a suit against the Ryots for the rent of the land.

The revenues of that year being settled, some how or other, without the real matter at issue being finally adjusted (namely, to whom the land belongs), the next business to be maneuvered by the respective claimant is, who shall cultivate the next year. One party ploughs, the other sows; the first party sows over again, and the other ploughs and sows again; and both parties, probably, on the strength of the Commissioner's decrees. While this is going on, an affray sometimes happens; but that is more frequently postponed till the harvest time. Each party then tries to outwit the other; but as that is not easily done, they come to blows, and each carries off what he can, and that frequently in presence of the police peons. All parties are then brought into the foujdarry court, and committed or punished by the Magistrate, according to the extent of the affray. But notwithstanding the most patient investigation, it seldom happens that it can be made out clearly who was the aggressor; and both parties being in the wrong to a certain degree, both receive equal punishment.

The next mode adopted is, for one party to prosecute under the XXXIId Regulation for forcible dispossession; and from the previous disputes and contradictory dictory decrees of the Commissioners, a case cannot generally be made out. These prosecutions take up more time than regular suits, and are most cautiously worded; for in no instance that I have seen, does the plaintiff state himself that he has been dispossessed, but simply that the other party had assembled a large body of armed men, and carried off part of the crops by force, with intent to dispossess. The object of this cautious wording is, that in case of the suit being dismissed, the party still retains his claim to being actually in possession.

Letter to Register of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, 18 June 1810.

All the above modes failing, one party commences a regular suit, when the various orders and decrees are brought before the court at one view, and present a scene of confusion and contradiction not easily described.

To strike at once at the root of the evil, I beg to recommend, that the Commissioners to the Munsiff be withdrawn, and that the Cauzees of the respective pergunnahs receive commissions for the sale of distrained property, and be strictly restricted to the sale of such property as may be due from Ryots that have entered into engagements; and that without the production of the kabooleat signed by the Ryots, and the wasil baukee signed by the Putwarry of the village, they do by no means sell any distrained property.

The number of causes decided by the native Commissioners are few in number; and were those only taken into the account that are strictly cognizable in their courts, and do not originate in the decrees and orders of the Commissioners themselves, the number might be reduced probably to a fourth. With the view, however, of preventing any inconvenience being felt by the public, I beg to suggest, that on the present Munsiffs being done away, that the Court, under the 5th Section of Regulation XV of 1805, might authorize the appointment of another Aumeen to reside at Azimgurh, and decide all causes that may be referred to him for decision.

To J. T. Shakespear, Esq. Register to the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Fort William.

Sir:

In submitting the accompanying papers to the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, it may be necessary, in explanation, to observe that it has been the practice for the Zemindars in the district, instead of distraining the property of their defaulting tenants themselves, to apply to the Commissioners for the sale of distrained property, to depute a person, in the first instance, to make the attachment, although the Zemindars have been made acquainted with their right of distraining property themselves, without applying to the Commissioners. The refractory spirit of the Ryots, and their own poverty and want of authority, induce induce them, almost invariably, to adopt the mode mentioned above; and as the presence of an officer of Government, on such occasions, tends greatly to preserve regularity and prevent resistance on the part of the defaulters and their relations, often constituting almost the entire population of the village, it has been encouraged and authorised by several perwannahs from Mr. Ahmuty, and from different gentlemen who have officiated as judges.

Letter to Register of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, 30 November 1810.

Letter to Register of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, 30 November 1810.

It was, however, found that numerous affrays took place, in consequence of the Zemindars of different villages, with their relations and followers, going in large bodies to distrain each other's property for the rent of disputed land; and it was thought necessary to issue an order to the Commissioners, not to distrain property for arrears of rent, unless the Zemindar could produce a cabooleat from the defaulter. The Court will perceive, from the accompanying papers, that this order has proved injurious to the Zemindars, who are exposed to have their estates sold for arrears of revenue, at the same time that they are restricted from distraining for the rents of undisputed lands, unless the Ryots choose to subject themselves to it by giving cabooleats, which they frequently refuse to do.

Being, however, aware that its unqualified revocation will give rise to numerous affrays, I have deferred rescinding it for a month, in hopes of being favoured, before the expiration of that time, with the orders of the Court on the subject, and under an impression that it may be thought expedient to impose some restrictions on distraining property for the rent of land in dispute. Adverting to the circumstances mentioned in the beginning of this letter, it would not be difficult to carry any restrictive order into effect in this district, in which the boundaries of estates are in general very imperfectly ascertained.

The distraint, in such cases, being considered as an attempt, on the part of the opposite party, to establish the point of their being in possession of the land, in which the greater part of the inhabitants of the village are often more or less interested, they are not to be restrained from taking part with the supposed defaulter, and proceeding to acts of the utmost violence.

Goruckpore, (Signed) D. SCOTT,
30th November 1810. Acting Judge.

To D. Scott, Esq. Acting Judge of the Zillah of Goruckpore.

Letter to Acting Judge of Goruckpore, 27 December 1810.

Sir:

I am directed by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, with its enclosures, and to communicate to you the following instructions in reply.

2. The Court are of opinion, that proprietors of lands and others entitled to distrain, being authorised to attach the property of defaulters by their agents, there is no objection to their employing the Commissioners for the sale of distrained property, and officers for that purpose; and under the circumstances stated by you, entirely approve of the encouragement which has been given to the practice in your district.

3. The Court are further of opinion, that persons entitled to distrain are not bound by the Regulations to produce the cabooleats of defaulters to the Commissioners for the sale of distrained property, on requiring them to proceed to a sale.

4. But the Court remark, at the same time, that the provisions for distraint suppose that the distrainer is in actual possession of the lands, on account of which the distraint is made; and consequently, when the fact of the possession of lands is disputed, it is the duty of the Commissioners for the sale of distrained property to refuse proceeding to a sale, and to refer the claimants to the Dewanny Adawlut, where they may either lodge a regular action against any persons disputing their title, or bring a summary suit against the alleged defaulters.

5. That

5. That should, as is most probable, the latter course be pursued, the Judge will summarily investigate the fact of the claimant's possession, giving any persons who may set up adverse claims to the land and allege their possession of the same, an opportunity of being heard. That according as the claimant's possession shall be established or disproved, the Judge will dismiss his claim or adjudge him entitled to recover the arrear, and of consequence to levy the rent of the contested land, and to distrain, until the summary decision be superseded by a regular judgment. That the possession being thus provisionally determined, no embarrassment can be afterwards experienced.

Letter to Acting Judge of Goruckpore, 27 Dec. 1810.

6. By following the course above explained, the Court are of opinion that no inconvenience will be experienced from recalling the proclamation mentioned in the second paragraph of your address, and they desire that you will recal it accordingly. You will, at the same time, issue perwannahs to the Commissioners for the sale of distrained property, in conformity to these instructions, and will direct the Darogahs of police to refuse their aid to the attachment of property on account of arrears of disputed lands.

I am, &c.

Fort William, the 27th December 1810. (Signed) J. SHAKESPEAR, Register.

To J. T. Colebrooke, J. H. Harington, J. Fombelle, and J. Stuart, Esqs. Judges of the Court of Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, Fort William.

Gentlemen:

I take the liberty to make the representation to your Court, that the people of this district do not seem to have acted on the general rules of the VIIth Regulation of 1799, for the attachment of property for arrears of rent, till very lately; but that they seem now to compensate their previous tardiness by an unknown vigour in its enforcement, oppressive to many from the demand being unjust, and if not on that account to all, at the best relentless and obdurate to the remainder. It is not, of course, the province of a court of justice to interfere in the latter case; and in the former, their duty under the laws seems to have for its object to afford redress in damages after the act.

Letter from the Judge of Dinagepore, 29 March 1811.

2. But it happens that the attaching party have the aid of the police, and that the party, if it resists and a scuffle ensues, pleads in vain the injustice of the demand.

3. As a general provision, I do not mean to think it avoidable, but as liable to the utmost abuse. I think the facilities afforded for its execution should not be unlimited.

4. When a distraint happens without resistance, or when a punishment for resistance is merely the prelude to a more vigorous restraint, the object of it in this district, where the wretchedness of the lower classes is excessive, is precluded, even in a larger proportion than one in a thousand, from the means of redress: so that a causeless distraint is generally a greater hardship than what is called an open robbery, as in the one instance, opposition is criminal, and in the other meritorious; and in the latter, the chance of redress is comparably more encouraging, and even its evil, speaking generally, far less extensive than in the former.

5. The general nature of this evil has also been aggravated, by the circumstance of the very lowest zemindarry officers acting as attaching agents, while the Zemindar, in some cases, is himself attending to give the appearance of all its rigour to the attachment of his agent, but keeping himself in the back ground, equally to avoid responsibility and to obviate the hopeless case of any appeal to his moderation.

6. There is still one further aggravating case. I have, on an average, about five hundred prisoners in the jail here; but I have no doubt the daily prisoners in the district would amount to five thousand prisoners, of which I would attribute one thousand to the illegal duress of Mohojuns for debt, five hundred dred to the usurped restraint upon people on suspicion of criminal offences, and the remaining three thousand prisoners I would attribute to the illegal duress of sundry kinds by the zemindaree Amla upon the bodies of their Ryots, in order to compel some kind of engagement from them which may be hoped to give a shadow of justice to their future distraints.

7. It may be observed, that this duress is not less irredressable than the distraint; for what with citations, proclamations, or the mere tool attending and the principal offender going away to see his affairs in another quarter (no coercive process issuing, or if issued not executed), the man obliged to sacrifice his pursuit of justice in search of his diurnal sustenance.

8. Having thus given a general, but very faint idea, of the extreme misery and extreme oppressions of the tenantry at large of this district, I beg leave to solicit the Court's construction of the Regulations, whether the authority to delegate agents to attach under the VIIth Regulation of 1799, is to be general or particular, and verbal or written, and whether restraint should not be limited to cases where, from the written engagements of the parties, the demandable jumma of the year be indisputable, and the only possible doubt can be whether the payments in the year have fulfilled or fallen short of those engagements.

9. I do hope that the just construction of the Regulations will be found to require a special and written order, that attachments en masse of the property of the people by Putwarries and Munduls may be abolished, and that the general principle which makes every offence of easy execution the more punishable as the more prejudicial to the people, may be found, or if necessary be made to apply, by a new law, to a grievance which, as practised lately in this neighbourhood, menaces to disturb seriously the tranquillity of the country

I have the honour to be, &c.

Mr Dowdeswell.

Previously to the receipt of the above-mentioned papers, I had fully intended to suggest an inquiry respecting the operation of the rules at present established for the recovery of claims to rent, on the part of proprietors, farmers, and managers of lands, and of their local agents, from their tenants and Ryots. The proposed inquiry was of course founded on the apprehensions which have long been rooted in my mind, that great claims are made, and oppressions are committed by the Zemindars and others, under the powers at present exercised by them, with respect to the distress and sale of property for the recovery of claims of the nature above stated. Those apprehensions cannot but receive confirmation from the circumstances stated in the foregoing papers.

I am sensible of the importance of the question generally, and that in protecting the Ryots and others from oppression, we must be extremely careful not to preclude the Zemindars, farmers, and managers of estates, from the means requisite to enable them to collect their rents. The natural consequences of such injudicious restrictions would be, the accumulation of heavy arrears to Government, and all the serious ill effects heretofore experienced from the constant sales of lands.

The circumspection, however, necessary to be observed on the occasion, need not, and ought not to preclude discussion and inquiry. If my apprehensions shall appear to be well founded, no doubt can remain of the propriety of modifying the existing rules respecting distress. On the other hand, if those apprehensions which are, I know, entertained by many other persons as well as myself, shall appear to be imaginary, the satisfaction of knowing that they are so will not be very dearly purchased, by the trouble incident to the proposed investigation.

It may be inferred from the foregoing observations, that however urgent an inquiry into the abuses above noticed may appear to me, I am by no means prepared pared to suggest any rules for the practical adoption of the Board in the present stage of the business. Mr. Dowdeswell.

Should the result, however, of the proposed inquiry be such as I am led to apprehend, two provisions occur to my mind, which I think might, in that case, be adopted with public benefit.

1st. That no proprietor, farmer, or manager of land, or the local agent of such person, be authorized to distrain the property of his tenant or Ryot, unless he can produce a caboolcat from such tenant or Ryot, shewing the rent which the former is intitled to receive; and 2nly. That all property attached with a view to the sale of it be released, on the owner giving security, either in the court of the Judge or Register, for the payment of the balance, if it be undisputed, and for such sum as may be eventually adjudged against him, if the claim to the balance be contested between the parties. The case to be tried as a summary suit, under Clause 4, Section 15, Regulation VIII, 1799.

I am perfectly aware, that the production of the caboolcat would not furnish any proof of the payment or otherwise of a contested claim to rent, when the question in agitation was only the amount of that claim; but it would effectually prevent the Zemindar, farmer, or manager of an estate or pergunnah from exacting rent from persons who were not his Ryots. It would necessarily tend to promote the general delivery of caboolcats from the Ryots to the Zemindars and others, and by a claim of necessary consequence of pottahs from the latter to the former. Were this object once accomplished, we should probably hear of few disputes or contested claims regarding rent

The latter proposition is nothing more than a suggestion in Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII, 1793; with this difference, that the suits which may be instituted under it be decided on a summary investigation, instead of a regular suit. It proceeds much on the principle of the English law of replevin. In adopting it, therefore, we have the best authority and surest guide in matters of a judicial nature, in all cases in which a natural operation of the wise and beneficent principles of the English law is not opposed by the peculiar institutions and usages of the natives. It is to be apprehended, that in abandoning the guide, or in other words, in repealing the salutary provisions contained in Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII, 1793, as was done in the year 1795, we have opened a source (as already noticed) of great abuse and oppression.

In effect, it appears to me at variance with every principle, to vest in the Zemindar the power of selling his tenant's property for the recovery of an alleged balance, at the very moment that the parties are disputing whether the claim be well founded or otherwise.

I am aware, indeed, that with the rules as they at present stand, the Ryot, if he deem himself aggrieved by the distress and sale of his property, may seek redress in the Adawlut. But a suit at law must, at best, be deemed a very imperfect means to a man thus reduced to a state of beggary, of obtaining any adequate reparation for the injury which he may have sustained.

It may be advisable, that the purport of the foregoing remarks and suggestions should be communicated to the Collectors subject to our authority. It is, at the same time, essential that it should be clearly understood by the Collectors, that the object of communicating them is only to require their unreserved opinions on the expediency of adopting them, supposing, as already noticed, that the abuses committed, under cover of the existing rules respecting the distress and sale of property, are such as to require a legislative remedy. The Collectors will, of course, offer such other suggestions themselves as they may deem necessary.

In the foregoing remarks, I have only spoken of the conduct of the Zemindars and others on the one side, and of the oppression supposed to be experienced by the Ryots on the other. In order, however, to render the proposed investigation complete, it is essential that the Collectors should report their sentiments on the conduct of the Cauzies, native Commissioners, and other persons sons invested under the Regulations with the power of selling distrained property for the discharge of claims to arrears of rent. I strongly suspect, not only that the Zemindars and others make illicit and excessive demands of that nature, but that the officers above-noticed are the ready instruments of enforcing such exactions in a very illegal and oppressive manner.

I would also recommend, that the Collectors be further required to report their sentiments on the conduct of the native Commissioners in the decision of revenue suits, in which I also apprehend that great abuse and malversation are committed. In restricting the discussion to revenue suits, it is not that I think that an inquiry into their conduct, with respect to other suits, would by any means be superfluous, but because the proper duty of this Board is obviously confined to cases of that description.

I am perfectly sensible that any present propositions are liable to encounter considerable opposition from some of the Revenue Authorities, and that the argument which will most generally be opposed to them is the unexampled punctuality now established in the collection of the land revenue, and the consequent danger which is to be apprehended from any alteration of the existing rules. The attainment of that punctuality is certainly a great and important object: it evidently is not, however, the only object. Until we can combine with it the security of the peasantry from illicit and burthensome exactions; until we can remove the apprehensions which I know are entertained, that the Ryots are not unfrequently driven, by the oppressions of the Zemindars and farmers and their local agents, to the commission of the worst of crimes, dacoity, the purpose of our revenue laws must be deemed to have been very imperfectly accomplished.

(Signed) G. DOWDESWELL.

Ordered, that the several Collectors of the Lower Provinces be written to as follows.

(Circular.)

SIR:

Letter to Collectors of the Lower Provinces.

His Excellency the Vice-President in Council has been pleased to direct the Board of Revenue to report their sentiments regarding the operation of the existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of rent. That reference appears to be founded on the apprehensions entertained by Government, that considerable abuses and oppressions are committed by the Zemindars and others, under the powers at present vested in them with respect to that point.

2. The Board conceive that substantial grounds exist for those apprehensions: but previous to furnishing the required report, they have deemed it advisable to desire your sentiments on the subject generally, and likewise on the expediency of adopting such suggestions as the Board are at present prepared to offer, with the view of obviating the evil in question.

But however desirable it is that the abuses above noticed, if they really exist, should be in future prevented, you will no doubt be sensible, that in protecting the Ryots and others from oppression, the greatest care should be taken not to preclude the Zemindars, farmers, and managers of estates, from the means requisite to enable them to collect their rents. The natural consequences of such injudicious restrictions would be, the accumulation of heavy arrears to Government, and all the serious ill effects heretofore experienced from the constant sale of lands.

With a view to the attainment of the proposed object, two suggestions occur to the Board.

First. That no proprietor, farmer, or manager of land, or the local agent of such person, be authorized to distrain the property of his tenant or Ryot, unless he can produce a cabooleat from such tenant or Ryot, shewing the rent which the farmer is entitled to receive.

Secondly.

Secondly. That all property attached, with a view to the sale of it, be released, on the owner giving security, either in the court of Judge or Register, for the payment of the balances, if it be undisputed; and for such sum as may be eventually adjudged against him, if the claim to the balance be contested between the parties. The case to be tried as a summary suit, under Clause 4, Section 15, Regulation VII, 1799. Letter to Collectors of the Lower Provinces, 7 June 1811.

The Board are perfectly aware, that the production of the cabooleat would not furnish any proof of the payment, or otherwise, of a contested claim to rent, when the question in agitation was only the amount of that claim; but it would effectually prevent the Zemindar, farmer, or manager of an estate or pergunnah, from exacting rent from persons who were not his Ryots. It would also tend to promote the general delivery of cabooleats from the Ryots to the Zemindars and others, and by a necessary consequence, of pottahs from the latter to the former.

The second proposition is nothing more than a suggestion for reviving the rules contained in Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII, 1793; with this modification, that the suits which may be instituted under it be decided on a summary investigation, instead of a regular suit.

In communicating to you the foregoing suggestions, you will clearly understand that the object is to desire your unreserved sentiments on the expediency of adopting them, supposing that the abuses committed under cover of the existing rules, respecting the distress and sale of property, are such as to require a legislative remedy. You will, of course, offer any other suggestion yourself which you will propose to be adopted.

In the foregoing remarks, the Board have only adverted to the conduct of the Zemindars and landholders, on the one side, and to the oppression supposed to be experienced by the Ryots, on the other. In order, however, to enable them to form a comprehensive opinion on the subject, they desire that you will submit to them your sentiments on the conduct of the Cauzies, native commissioners, and other persons invested, under the Regulations, with the power of selling distrained property for the discharge of claims to arrears of rent, as the Board are led to suspect, not only that the Zemindars and others make illicit and excessive demands of that nature, but that the officers above-noticed are the ready instruments of enforcing such exactions in a very illegal and oppressive manner.

You are likewise desired to communicate your sentiments on the conduct of the native commissioners in the decision of revenue suits, in which the Board also apprehend that great abuse and malversation are committed.

In conclusion, I am directed to acquaint you that the Board expect that your reply to the present reference will not be founded on the information obtainable from a few opulent individuals, but from local and personal communication with the class of people, the peasantry, for whose benefit the present inquiry has been undertaken.

 To

Letter from Collector of Bhaugulpore, 9 September 1811.

To G. Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

1. I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your Secretary's circular letter of the 7th June last.

2. The punctuality with which the revenues of this district have been paid for the last six years is, I conceive, a very substantial reason for abstaining from any interference, on the part of the officers of Government, between the Zemindar and the Ryot, excepting in cases when it may be absolutely necessary. This opinion, I beg to observe, is applicable solely to this district.

3. That oppressions have existed, and do exist, in the distraint and sale of property, I am well inclined to believe; nay, I apprehend that they extend even to personal cruelty. Much, if not the whole of the former might be prevented, by circumscribing the power vested in the native officers, of proceeding to the actual sale of property at the instigation, or more properly speaking, on the representation (for it is really nothing more) of the Zemindars; for the latter recourse must be had to the criminal court.

4. I do not feel myself competent to give an opinion on the conduct of the native commissioners in the decision of revenue suits. It would be necessary to inspect their proceedings. I have never seen one cause of their deciding, but I think that all revenue suits belong properly to the jurisdiction of the Collector; and indeed it is, in some degree, directed by Regulation VII of 1799: but it seldom or ever occurs, that any of these causes are turned over by the court for investigation to the Collector. I have had none for these six years and a half that I have been Collector. There are many advantages likely to accrue to the individual, from the enactment of a Regulation excluding the trial of revenue suits from the courts, and transferring them to the Collectors; the least of which is not a more speedy determination of the point at issue, thereby allowing the Ryot to return to his field, instead of compelling him to dance attendance on the court for an indefinite period. The gentlemen in the judicial line have so many important subjects to engage their attention, that with every good intention the trial of petty revenue suits, of whatever denomination, can scarcely be brought under their notice; or if brought, probably not before the ruin of the Ryot is accomplished. The peasantry, with very few exceptions, are too poor to entertain an attorney at the court: the natural consequence is, that they must attend themselves, and that too, perhaps, at periods when they should be particularly engaged in the cultivation of their fields. Hence arise neglect, dishonesty, and many other evils on the part of their under Ryots, by which they are ultimately involved in ruin. Another source of oppression exists in the peremptory sale, by the officers in whom the power is vested, of the Ryot's cattle. Buffaloes or bullocks, of the value of six, seven, or eight rupees, are sold at the native cutcherry for a rupee or eight annas, when perhaps the unhappy man owes not more than three or four. No objection occurs to me to the adoption of the measures suggested by the Board in the fourth paragraph; and any other step which can accelerate the decision of revenue suits is highly desirable: none more likely to effect it than the enactment of a Regulation on the grounds proposed in the sixth paragraph of your Board's letter. The Judges, too, would be relieved from a great deal of work, by making over the trial of revenue suits to the Collectors, by whom I should suppose that the business might be satisfactorily done: at least, no physical reason exists why it should not, though probably a political one may.

5. I understand, generally, that the Zemindars are supposed to possess too much influence over the persons invested with the power of selling distrained property: but I cannot write on this subject from personal experience; for though I have, for some years back, annually taken a circuit of the district, no complaint has ever been brought before me. I will, however, mention two or three things known to exist. A Ryot is probably indebted to the Zemindar, ten, fifteen, or twenty rupees. The Zemindar attaches, of his own authority, property to the amount of one or two hundred rupees (this often occurs). He gives in a list of this property to the officer empowered to sell, be he Commissioner, Cauzee, or any other: this latter, without any previous inquiry into the real state of the case, sells off the whole at a price infinitely below the real value; value; and though the surplus be refunded to the Ryot, still it is so little as to render him utterly incapable of setting himself up again. Nay, I believe that this vexatious sale (to call it by no harsher name) is sometimes converted into a source of emolument to the distrainer and to the seller, as it enables them, by a fictitious purchase, to buy things for their own use, at a price far below the real value: it may also serve as a vehicle for private resentment, on the part of a Zemindar, to a substantial Ryot, against whom he may entertain ill will. To this assumed position it may be objected, that our established courts of justice offer redress. I admit it: but with this reservation, that all law-suits involve considerable risk at the best, and certainly great delay and expense, which, in my opinion, are equally destructive to the well being of the Ryots.

Letter from Collector of Bhaugulpore, 9 September 1811.

6. Another, and a more grievous source of oppression, will be found in the following statement. A landholder possesses an estate compact in all its parts save one: this one part involves a boundary dispute with a neighbouring landholder. Each party obtains and retains possession the best way he can. Each party looking upon himself as the rightful proprietor, engages his Ryot, under assurances of protection, to cultivate this disputed land. When the time comes for the collection of the rents, each party makes good his own demand upon the Ryots indiscrimately: hence the Ryots have to pay double rent. This is what comes under the vulgar denomination of screwing the Ryots. The introduction of vulgar trite expressions in a public address is hardly admissible; yet, in the present case, I hope to be excused for using it, as it really is a very impressive one. This induces me respectfully to suggest an amendment to your Board's first suggestion, which is, that the prohibition to the farmer, manager, or local agent, to distrain the property of his tenant or Ryot, be extended to those who have the power to sell such distrained property, without a previous investigation of the nature of the case, and this too under severe penalties.

7. A third case is this. A substantial Ryot engages with a Zemindar or proprietor, sometimes verbally, sometimes on a vague indefinite engagement, to cultivate some land for a fixed sum. He has done so for a year, probably two: he then finds that the produce is inadequate to his trouble and expense, and discontinues. Notwithstanding his declining it, the Zemindar, at the time of collecting the rents, still conceives this man to be his Ryot, because he had once cultivated his land, and on his refusing to pay the demand, his property is immediately distrained, and sold by the native officer, as before-mentioned, without any previous inquiry.

8. In fact, if the Commissioner's power to sell property was restrained, almost all the oppressions of the Zemindars would be effectually done away.

9. Having obtruded my sentiments thus freely on one side of the question, I conceive it but fair to take a view of the other side.

10. It cannot be denied, that there are many Ryots of so obstinate a disposition, and so ready to take every advantage of the Zemindar, that unless he be possessed of some power over them, he will find the realization of his rents, and consequently the revenue of Government, a very difficult thing; and your Board have wisely observed, that in attempting to effect an amelioration of the state of the peasantry, the landholders should not be precluded from the means requisite to enable them to collect their rents. The wisdom of Government will doubtlessly apply the proper remedy.

11. I trust to the liberality of your Board to excuse any thing seemingly improper in this report: I do not intend it. I have given my sentiments in the spirit in which they were required, freely and unreservedly.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Letter from Collector of Burdwan, 10th Sept 1811.

Gentlemen:

In reply to your circular orders of the 7th June last, I have the honour to state, in reply to the first paragraph of those orders, that I have no means whatever whatever of procuring any accurate information of the abuses practised by the Zemindars and others, authorized to sell distrained property under the provision of Regulation VII of 1799, as the investigation or adjustment of such suits do not come within the duties of my office, and that I have still fewer means of judging of the conduct of the native Commissioners on the trial of revenue suits by them. At the same time, I have reason to believe that the Zemindars are guilty of great and heavy oppressions in their general transactions with the Ryots, and that the powers they possess of distraining the property of their tenants for alleged balances, is one of the principal sources of these oppressions.

Letter from Collector of Burdwan, 10th Sept 1811.

In reply to the fourth paragraph, I beg leave to observe, that as cabooleats are at present frequently extorted from the Ryots by a prolonged detention of their persons by the Zemindar, under the powers he possesses of compelling their attendance, by preventing their cultivating the ground or cutting their crops at the proper period, by unfair measurements, by threats of criminal prosecutions, and many other methods, which the power and influence of a Zemindar will almost invariably enable him to exercise, I should apprehend that the remedy suggested might render it an instrument of greater oppression than ever. I must also add, that these cabooleats are frequently extorted without any corresponding pottah being given to the Ryot, and that, should the remedy suggested by your Board be adopted, I should apprehend it might give the Zemindars stronger motives and greater powers to extort unfair cabooleats than before.

The second remedy proposed by your Board would, I think, be attended with advantage; but to render the operation more efficient, I would recommend that the interval between the attachment and sale should be prolonged beyond the period now established, and that the Monsif or Cauzee should be authorized to judge of the responsibility of the security tendered. It is well known, that the Ryot will often deposit the sum demanded in order to defer the sale; and they would do it constantly, if they were allowed to prosecute the landholders in a summary suit for excess. In all such cases of deposit, the amount and responsibility of the security tendered by the Ryots might also be constantly a subject of delay and abuse; I would therefore recommend, that the Ryot be required to deposit the sum demanded in the hands of the Monsif, who should send it to the Court; that the property attached should be immediately released, and the tenant allowed a summary suit against his landholder to try the actual balance, and if it should be proved that an excess had been demanded by the Zemindar, the Ryot should receive, as now, double the excess from the landholder.

In reply to the eighth paragraph, respecting the conduct of the Cauzee, native commissioners, and others, persons invested under the Regulations with the power of selling distrained property, no individual instance of misconduct has come to my knowledge. They certainly have the means of oppression and exaction in their power. They can make exorbitant charges for storing and cutting crops, for the expenses of sale; they can practise frauds respecting the time, place, and mode of the sales; but these are all guarded against and punishable by the Regulations.

The Cauzees have, at present, no option to suspend the sale of distrained property when the Zemindar calls upon them to sell. They have no authority to make any inquiry: they have only to act; and they must sell property so distrained, although they know the case to be one of injustice and oppression.

In conclusion, I beg leave to state that the delay that has attended answering your orders has arisen from a desire to make myself acquainted with the subjects on which you required my report, and gaining information from those sources on which I could rely.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Letter from Collector of Chittagong, 15 August 1811.

To George Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, &c. and C. Buller, Esq. Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

The Board having been pleased to call for my sentiments regarding the operation of the existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of revenue, under the powers vested in Zemindars and others, I have no hesitation in saying, that the apprehensions entertained by Government, as to the abuses and oppressions committed under those powers, are founded on substantial grounds, of which incontrovertible proofs daily occur in this district. There cannot, therefore, be a question, as to the expediency and justness of applying a legislative remedy to correct the evils in question, which bear so hard upon the cultivator of the soil; and the two suggestions which the Board have in contemplation to submit to Government,* appear well calculated to produce so desirable an end, viz.

"That no proprietor, farmer, or manager of land, or local agent of such "person, be authorized to distrain the property of his tenant or Ryot, unless "he can produce a cabooleat from such tenant or Ryot, shewing the rent "which the former is entitled to receive."

2dly. "That all property attached with a view to the sale of it be released, "on the owner's giving security, either in the court of the Judge or Register,† "for the payment of the balance if it be undisputed, or for such sum as may "eventually be adjudged against him."

Revival of Sections 9 and 10 of Regulation XVII 1793, with this modification.

"On the other hand, if the claim to the balance be contested between the "parties, the case to be tried as a summary suit, under clause 4, section 15, "of 1799;" whereby all the attendant evils of a more procrastinated process are avoided, especially in party suits.

2. In order to give full effect to the first suggestion, I conceive that the pottahs and cabooleats, henceforth to be interchanged between the Zemindars and other independent landholders, or their Naibs, accredited Vakeels, Gomastahs, or Moocktarear, on the spot, and his under-tenant or Ryot, should be executed on the cheapest kind of stamped paper,‡ to be regularly attested, in the presence of and in the open cutcherry of the principal police officer of the pergunnah (independent of the Cauzee, native commissioner, and others vested with the power of distraining and selling for the discharge of arrears of rent), whose duty it should be to keep a numerical register of all pottahs and cabooleats so executed, which he should also number,§ date, sign, and seal, ex-officio, and as a further check, the parties themselves should sign the Darogah's register in a separate column for that purpose. Such mofussil pergunnah register, eventually to take effect from any period Government may judge proper, would in all cases be easy of reference to the commissioners or distrainers, and all parties concerned, and in its operation would doubtless be of the most salutary effect, in preventing undue exactions by Zemindars, farmers, or managers of estates or pergunnahs, from persons who are not their Ryots; whilst it would, moreover, tend to ensure to proprietors, or their local agents, the fair realization of their dues from their under-tenants or Ryots, and by a necessary consequence also tend to the security of the public revenue.

3. Copies of such registers should be transmitted quarterly to the zillah court, where it would become a very useful record of reference to the Judge, the Register, and Sudder Aumeens; and after the completion of the first year, it would be sufficient to send an abstract of the mutations, with reference to the numbers on the original register.

4. Further advantages to the Ryot would imperceptibly grow out of this rule, if legislated, without striking at the established privileges of proprietary right. It would check the unjust and oppressive practice resorted to on every frivolous occasion, of ousting an established under-tenant or Ryot, to make room, either for a more favoured person, or the temptation and short-sighted policy of a little temporary advance in the rent from an interloper, unacquainted with the best mode of turning the soil to account. It will, moreover, tend effectually to check the frequent and illicit practice of Zemindars granting two pottahs for the same spot, of which possession is actually held, and the rent fairly paid; and thus the evil consequences of affrays, which so frequently follow, in order to establish the right between the contending parties, will be obviated by an easy reference to the pergunnah mofussil register at the Darogah's cutcherry. The prior pottah and actual possession ought, at once, to establish the superior right; but it is not always so. The Zemindar having refused to receive the revenue from the old Ryot whom he wishes to dispossess, from whatever cause, whilst he takes it from the fresh man, the former is made to appear in arrear; and when the case is brought before the commissioner, in his capacity of Munsiff, he (the old Ryot) is in course ousted, and his property distrained, as the first step to a collusive, forced, and excessive sale. This is an evil that calls loudly for a remedy, the landholder and commissioner being equally culpable. If, therefore, in any case the rent due is not received from the Ryot or bonâ fide under-renter, when tendered to the Zemindar, according to the specific terms of the pottah, and if on being tendered to the commissioner he should, through the influence of the Zemindar, refuse to receive it in deposit,* the Ryot ought then to be allowed to pay it to the Sudder Aumeen, who should be authorized to receive the same, whilst it should subject the commissioner to immediate suspension, and ultimate dismission from office, if in the opinion of the Judge he is convicted of such offence. In like manner, the Zemindar should be mulct in a fine to three times the amount unjustly sued for.

5. But in thus protecting the Ryot, his landholders should not be precluded from the inherent privilege of giving him due warning to quit, either at the expiration of any existing lease, according to the terms of the pottah, or at such specific period of the year as would be least detrimental to either party in settling their accounts, which of course would be about the time of the pooneah. This latter rule is not meant to be stated as necessary to be enacted, but with the view of guarding the Zemindar against the hardship of his Ryot being fixed upon him for ever by any new edict, leaving no option if his rent be regularly paid; than which there cannot, I conceive, be a more unjust principle. It is no argument at all to say, that the Zemindar's sudder jumma is fixed, and that therefore the Ryot's should be immutably so. On the contrary, such rule would obviously militate against the tenure upon which the Zemindar holds his estate on the faith of Government.

6. With respect to the second suggestion, and generally as to the misconduct of the native commissioners and persons invested with the power of selling distrained property for the discharge of claims to arrears of rent, the Board very justly suspect that Zemindars and others not only make illicit and excessive demands, as in the case adduced, but that the officers above-mentioned are the ready instruments of enforcing such exactions in a very illegal and oppressive manner. The same observation is strictly applicable to those who are denominated commissioners of land-suits, who exercise a double jurisdiction in this zillah only, and who are notoriously guilty of great abuse and malversation in conducting such trials and decisions; especially in cases of inheritance of, or succeesion to, landed property, where in a ratio of five cases out of ten, the property coming under his cognizance is, though not avowed, of greater intrinsic value than he has authority to decide on, and his douceur is calculated and paid accordingly.

7. It is undoubtedly the wish of Government, and not less so of their officers, that men of property and of the most respectable characters should be selected for these offices;† but people of that description are little disposed to take them. Thus a field is left open to every needy adventurer to become a candidate for the situation, which having obtained, he sallies forth, not "dressed in brief authority," but in the triple capacity of referee, arbitrator, and Munsiff, or judge;‡ in the last of which he acts from his own authority, without without any order emanating from the adawlut, or application thereto made by the plaintiff; and he is, moreover, vested with the additional power of land-suit commissioner. Thus qualified, he thinks only how he shall make the most of an office, which affords no other emolument than a commission on the business done out of hand; and however strictly he may be watched, he still has the power of committing great abuses with impunity under the cloak of justice.

* If the existing law provides for cases of this nature, they are not incorporated in Regulation XL. of 1793, or Regulation XVIII of 1797, for land and money commissioner.

Letter from Collector of Chittagong, 15 August 1811.

8. In addition to the cases already adduced, one other, bearing a close analogy, yet in fact different, will suffice to illustrate this position. For instance, when two Zemindars or other landholders have a dispute about a piece of land, both exact rent from the Ryots upon it; and although he or they may have paid the accustomed rent to the holder of the pottah, yet upon a complaint being lodged against the Ryot in the commissioner's court, the poor man's effects are seized, through the undue influence of one of the disputing parties, and he must either pay his rent a second time or submit to their being sold. Nay, it is no uncommon case that the revenue again tendered is refused, merely because distraining and selling the property affords a great advantage to the rapacity of the commissioner, although there exists a penal law against such malversation.* But it is easy to say that the money was not tendered, yet extremely difficult for the weaker party to disprove the assertion against such collusion. Even the exhibition of the Pottadar's receipt does not avail: its authenticity is boldly denied, and the commissioner leans to that side which will turn to the most account.

9. In this case, as in the former, the commisioners should be compelled to receive the money tendered, under pain of dismission if detected in refusing so to do, with the sinister intention of coercion; and the Ryot should, eventually, be permitted to tender his money to the Sudder Aumeen, until the cause at issue is decided.

10. I understand that the abuses committed by native commissioners are sometimes brought to light by complaints lodged in the Fouzdarry court by the Chupprassies (who have been employed to attack the property of Ryots), for resistance of process, when upon investigation it has appeared that the property attached amounted to four or five times the value of the arrears of rent; and that commissioners are guilty of great injustice and corruption, in allowing Zemindars claiming arrears to buy up property at a price far below its real value.

11. From the foregoing premises it would appear, that the abuses and malpractices complained of do really exist, and are committed under cover of the existing rules, and that they therefore require a legislative remedy. To assist in applying that remedy, I have, under the Board's orders, with deference hazarded a few suggestions, which if considered applicable, may in more able hands be reduced to legislative form, and submitted to the consideration of Government.

12. There is, however, one very material point to which I would call the Board's attention. It is, the rules prescribed (Clause 3, Section 5, Regulation XL, 1793) for the selection of landholders to be commissioners or referees, in all cases, whether of land or money, made applicable (by Section 2 of Regulation XVIII, 1793) to the selection of commissioners for land-suits. That this is obviously objectionable, because incompatible with an impartial discharge of the duty of the land-suit commissioner, seems to be clearly illustrated by the 15th clause of the 9th Section of the same Regulation, which very properly interdicts "any "clause from being referred to or tried by a commissioner, in which he, or any "of his immediate dependants, may be a party, or in any-wise interested." The land commissioner, therefore, in the spirit of this clause, ought, it should seem, to be one who has no landed property within the scope of his own jurisdiction; and if such interdiction be adopted, it should form part of his oath when appointed. Neither should he, I conceive, exercise the power of Munsiff, which in fact makes him an independent judge, and in all petty suits in reality so, although he has not the power of enforcing his own decrees;† but the appeal from his decision must be made within thirty days, and the expense and trouble attending ing such appeal must, in very many cases, prevent its taking place, especially if the occurrence happens at a distant part of the zillah. At any rate, his quadruple powers, and the influence he may have, or be thought to have, with the head commissioner, may naturally be supposed to operate in deterring those, who most need support, from making any appeal. I offer this hypothesis doubtingly, having never observed any reluctance on the part of the people of this district to litigate; but the duties of my office being extra-judicial, they of course afford no practical knowledge upon which to ground it.

13. It is, of course, assumed as a fixed principle, under the reasons given in the preamble to Regulation XVIII. of 1797, that land-suit commissioners (and others appointed under Regulation XL. of 1793) are indispensably necessary in this district. This being the case, might they not, under the patronage of Government, be in future chosen from amongst the most respectable of the students of the Calcutta Native College, which would operate as a stimulus to the study of the Regulations, and eventually to the formation of a little code, defining the duties of commissioners, which they are now for the most part ignorant of, and have copies of the existing rules, and the Sudder Aumeens alone have the opportunity of referring to them.

14. In conclusion, it may be useful to the Board to be informed, that there are in this district eighteen commissioners, who by their several sunnuds are designated Aumeens, Salisman, Munsiffs, and land-suit commissioner, four Cauzies holding the same powers, and two Sudder Commissioners,* who one and all are invested with, and exercise the full powers applicable to each. This number is, I presume, apportioned to the rules prescribed for posting them according to local circumstances, so that the plaintiff need only travel a distance of five coss.†

15. The Board will, I trust, excuse my not having taken up the subject sooner, owing to other more pressing avocations.

I have the honour, &c.

Chittagong Collectorship, 15th August 1811. (Signed) C. SHAKESPEAR, Collector.

To Richard Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Letter from Collector of Dacca, 20 November 1811.

Gentlemen:

I have the honour to acknowledge your Secretary's circular letter of the 7th June last, and in reply beg leave to offer the following sentiments, which have only been so long delayed in consequence of the great press of business which has lately necessarily occupied my hands.

2. I have not the slightest doubt that considerable abuses and oppressions are committed by the Zemindars, &c. under the powers at present vested in them; nor that they very often take advantage of that power in an unjustifiable manner, if they have any real grounds of complaint, and also when there is no just cause, but merely to satisfy private resentment or to extort money.

3. It appears to me that the first suggestion is very well calculated to be a check on the undue influence of power in the Zemindars, Talookdars, &c.; and if, in every instance, the delivery of these cabooleats was enforced, and always called for and attended to, the benefits expected from the measure would be realized.

4. The second suggestion appears to me to embrace many advantages to the Ryots, and to promise great relief to them against unjustifiable persecution; but I would still further limit the authority of the Zemindars, Talookdars, &c., which I do not think would entail the evil consequences apprehended, in case of encroaching too much on their power. My sentiments on this head are as follows: To guard against any serious oppression of the Ryots in cases of distraint, I conceive it would be advisable to allow the Zemindars, &c. to make application to the Thannadar, under whose jurisdiction the premises may be situated, to attach property for the realization of any sum not exceeding ten rupees; and in

* In all twenty-four commissioners.

† Clause 2, Section 5, Regulation XI. of 1793.

in case of any controversy, that a reference be made to the Court, and the suit tried in a summary manner. The Thannadar being on the spot, would be sufficient authority to adjust disputes of such little consideration; but in all cases where the amount to be realized exceeded ten rupees, I think application ought immediately to be made to the court for summary decision. In all cases, the delivery of cabooleats by the complaining party appears to me an advisable plan.

Letter from Collector of Dacca, 20 November 1811.

5. To prevent the Ryots making away with their property in the interval of the application to the Thannadar, or ultimately in case of controversy to the court, I should propose that the police officers be authorized temporarily to hold the property of the defaulter, or a part of it, under attachment, till the result of such application is known: but it is actually necessary that the summary suits should be brought forward and decided upon without delay; for if the decision is procrastinated, the Ryots are placed in a very unpleasant predicament.

6. The observation respecting the delivery of cabooleats I entirely agree in; for I believe many abuses are practised, which such a mutual confession of authority and dependance would entirely remedy. I have been informed, that it is no unusual practice for Zemindars to threaten an application for the attachment of property of persons who have no landed property in reality, for the purpose of extorting money from them, which they are obliged to pay, while their complaints, if they make any, are disregarded, in the supposition that such a threat from a Zemindar, &c. could not have been vaguely preferred.

7. That the Cauzees, native commissioners, and other persons, invested under the Regulations with the power of selling distrained property, generally abuse these powers, I cannot doubt, from the assurance of some of the inferior class of people themselves, and from the general appeal against their decisions, and that the same complaints are made against the native commissioners in the decision of revenue suits. But although it is fair to conclude, from these general accusations against the native commissioners, that some grounds exist for suspicion, it is by no means, in my opinion, a criterion for judging of their conduct, because a native always considers, or at least expresses himself injured, if a decision is not passed in his favour, without weighing whether he has or has not justice on his side. If the authority could be taken out of their hands, there is no doubt that justice would be more attended to, and oppression considerably diminished.

Dacca, the 20th November, 1811. (Signed) C. DOYLEY, Collector.

To G. Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

I have the honour to acknowledge your Secretary's circular letter of the 7th ultimo, and beg to report to the Board, that it seems to be the prevalent opinion in the district, that much vexation and oppression is occasioned by the abuse of power of distraint vested, under the Regulations, in the Zemindars and their officers.

Letter from Collector of Dinagepore, 10 July 1811.

2. The power of distraint could not, I think, be abolished, without materially endangering the public revenue; but I am inclined to think that the rules might be so modified as to remove many of its abuses.

3. It certainly seems to me, that the suggested arrangement by the Board of prohibiting distraint, unless a cabooleat be produced, would be very desirable. It would, however, be necessary to lay down some rules to give effect to that arrangement, and the following may perhaps be calculated to do it.

1st. Notice should be given to the police Darogha, and a copy of the cabooleat filed with him.

2dly. Distraint of property, if a copy of the cabooleat be not previously filed at the police, should subject the distrainer to a criminal prosecution, the same as any merchant would be liable to, if he seized the property of any man against whom he had a claim.

3dly. The

Letter from Collector of Dinagepore, 10 July 1811.

3dly. The cabooleat should be produced before the Cauzy, &c. by the distrainer, upon making application for the sale of the property, and the Putwarry's accounts should be produced, in order to discover whether the balance was due; and if not due, agreeably to the Putwarry's accounts, the Cauzy should remove the distraint.

4thly. The power of distraint might be limited to the Zemindar and his head manager (or say two or three of his Amlah) of the estate; or when the estate was comprised in several pergunnahs, to the head manager in each pergunnah.

5thly. A register of persons so empowered should be filed by the Zemindar annually, in the Adawlut, or in the Collector's office.

6thly. Any person distraining property without such authority, should be liable to a criminal prosecution for plunder.

7thly. The authority should be in writing.

4. These precautions are calculated, in my opinion, to remove what seems to be considered the principal evil: attachments of the lowest description of Zemindaree officers, and without any written authority from the Zemindar, or any other principal Amlah.

5. There seems to be much doubt in this district regarding the intent of that part of the IVth Regulation of 1794, which declares that the Ryots, on the expiration of their pottahs, are entitled to have them renewed, agreeably to the established rules of the pergunnah. As a general position, the established rates of the pergunnah will be those specified in the expired pottah; so that, under one interpretation of this passage, the tenant is virtually a Mukwowreedar, and whatever improvement may be made in the value of the produce of the land (and a great many improvements might occur, I conceive, independent of all exertions of the tenant), the Zemindar could have nothing to do with it; nor if he were disposed to be industrious, could he take any land in his own hands upon the expiration of a pottah, if it be renewable at the option of the Ryot.

6. I think it doubtful whether this passage in the Regulations is meant to preclude the Zemindar from all option regarding the renewal of the lease, and the terms of it, to the holder of the expired pottah, who might also, upon many accounts, be justly considered a very objectionable tenant by the Zemindar.

7. The second restriction suggested by the Board appears to me to be a necessary one; but its effects will be limited to under-farmers, or to very substantial Ryots, for the common class of people could not be at the expense of coming in from a distance, and if he is to be the plaintiff he could not afford it.

8. If, however, the Zemindar were to be the plaintiff, and the Board shall see no objection to allowing those suits to be preferred to the Commissioners (of course under the prescribed limits), the provision would operate as a great check. The Ryots might get security on the spot. At all events, the property attached would remain, or the attachment might continue under the rules for attaching property in civil suits, that is by proclamation.

9. It does not seem to me that this power could be more liable to abuse, than their present power of receiving and deciding regular suits; and though instances of partiality might and would, of course, occur, the operation of the rule would be so general and frequent, that great advantages may reasonably be expected to arise from it.

10. In this case, however, the suit (in which the Commissioner would receive his fee) is appealable to the Judge. The Commissioner, however, might be required to decide suits of this description with dispatch, without reference to their order on his register, and if appealed, the business might be considered a summary appeal before the Judge.

11. I have not been able to learn any impropriety, on the part of the Cauzies and others, in the sale of distrained property. The Regulations at present give them no discretion or judgement in the business: they are mere instruments in the hands of the Zemindars to bring attached property to sale.

12. With

12. With regard to any abuse, on the part of the Commissioners, in the decision of revenue suits, I have not been able to learn of any in this district: indeed, it does not seem that revenue suits to any number are instituted before the Commissioners. On a reference to the Judge of this Zillah on this point, he found, on an examination of the monthly reports of six different Commissioners, for three or four months together, the proportion of revenue suits decided to be no more than three in one hundred, and that the proportion of revenue causes undecided, or on the file, was still less.

Letter from Collector of Dinagepore, 10 July 1811.

13. I have only to add, that the peasantry in this district complain loudly and grievously of the oppressions of the Zemindars and their officers, in regard to surplus exactions, abwaubs, deductions and distraints; that I understand half of the complaints in the fouzdarree are by Ryots against the zemindarree Amlah, for false imprisonment and other duress, in order to compel payments, or to obtain security or bonds from them; and that, at present, the people are precluded, by their poverty, from prosecuting for their grievances with any prospect of success.

I have, &c.

Zillah Dinagepore,
Collector's Office,
10th July, 1811.

To George Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

With much deference I now beg permission to transmit my sentiments, as required by your circular address of the 7th June, on the operation of the rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of rent.

Letter from Collector of Jessore, 31 July 1811.

2. Respecting your Board's suggestion, that no proprietor, farmer, or manager of land, be authorized to distrain, unless a caboolcat is produced, for the reasons stated in the first and fifth paragraphs, would, I can conceive, be very desirable; and it may tend to the execution of these instruments (which are seldom delivered), could they be required to be taken and immediately registered in the mofussil at the nearest thannah, or if more convenient to the parties at the sudder station.

3. Your second proposition, of reviving the rules in Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII. 1793, I am afraid will create delay and embarrassment to the distrainer; for on executing the bond, the defaulter and security gain that time, with no intention, probably, of ultimately prosecuting his claim. Though a summary suit may, in a measure, remedy this (which mode should, I think, whenever practicable be adopted), yet the distrainer's attendance with witnesses will be necessary; and if, at last, he succeeds in his suit, I do not think it will repay him for the inconvenience he may be put to in defending prosecutions, which may be the means of his falling in arrears to Government: therefore reviving these rules, in my opinion, will infringe on the interests of the landholder, and by creating difficulties in levying his rent, be the cause of the sale of his lands.

4. As few or no revenue suits have been decided in this zillah by native Commissioners of late years, no abuse and malversation of office have come to my knowledge. The 8th Section of Regulation XL. 1793, and 5th Section of Regulation VII. 1799, provide for oppression and unwarranted acts committed by them, which acts may further be prevented by summary investigation, and immediate fine and punishment, by a vigilant magistrate.

5. In conclusion, however desirable it is to protect the under-tenants and Ryots in their just rights, and prevent the abuses and oppressions alluded to in your letter, which undoubtedly exist, yet I regret much it is not in my power to point out measures to obviate the evils. All circumstances considered, and from information I have been able to collect, I do not think (though I am convinced the under-tenants are much oppressed, especially by the agents of the Zemindars) greater relief than what is specified in Regulation VII, 1799, they they can well possess, except it be summary judgment, for fear of affording them opportunities, by combination, of protracting the discharge of just demands, possibly at a most unseasonable period to the landholders. The general improvement of waste lands of late years, and speedy realization of public rent, would also make me cautious in recommending measures which had been once tried with unsuccess, in the room of those enacted in the present Regulations.

I have the honour to be,

Zillah Jessore, 31st July 1811. (Signed) T. POWNEY, Collector.

To George Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter from Collector of Moorshedabad, 7 September 1811.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your circular orders of the 7th June last, requiring my sentiments on the abuses and oppressions supposed to be committed by Zemindars and others, under the powers vested in them by the Regulations for the distress and sale of property, on account of arrears of revenue, and also on the expediency of adopting such suggestions as your Board are at present prepared to offer, with the view of obviating the evil in question.

In reply, I beg leave to acquaint you, that as I have never received any complaint against the Zemindars and others of this district, for an undue exercise of the powers vested in them by the Regulations, for the recovery of the arrears of revenue, I am led to suppose that the abuses and oppressions alluded to do not generally exist. There may, no doubt, be some instances of undue exactions by the different descriptions of landholders from their Ryots, but of this I have no personal knowledge; and judging from the well-known litigious disposition of the natives of Bengal, it is more than probable that they would not be backward in complaining to me, if the grievances alluded to really existed to any serious extent.

I therefore presume to think, that the abuses and oppressions ascribed to the Zemindars are by no means general in this district; and as the Zemindars and others are liable to heavy penalties for any infringement or abuse of the powers vested in them for the recovery of arrears, on a complaint being instituted against them in the dewanny adawlut by the person aggrieved, I conceive that the Ryots and others are sufficiently protected, and may always obtain ample redress of their grievances, under the provisions of the existing Regulations, and that any diminution of the powers now vested in the Zemindars, &c. might be attended with much difficulty and loss to them, and ultimately to Government, in the realization of the public revenue.

The general delivery of cabooleats from the Ryots to the Zemindars and others, and, by a necessary consequence, of pottahs from the latter to the former, is no doubt very desirable, and is, I believe, in pretty general practice in this district. But in many places the introduction of the system would militate against local custom, and be attended with inconvenience, where the Ryots merely cultivate the lands without entering into any specific engagements, and give a certain portion of the produce, in lieu of rent, to the Zemindar: a practice, I understand, by no means uncommon in several parts of this district. In regard to the suspicions entertained by your Board, relative to the conduct of the Cauzees and others invested with the power of selling distrained property, I can only say that I have never received any complaints against them for being the ready instruments of enforcing the excessive demands of the Zemindars in a very illegal and oppressive manner, and therefore I have no reason to suppose that this will really exist. Neither have I any reason to suppose that the native Commissioners are guilty of the abuses and malversations imputed to them, as no complaints of that nature have ever been presented to me: and as the Native Commissioners are under the immediate control of the Zillah Judge, and no decision of theirs can be carried into effect without a special order from him to that that effect, there is less probability, I think, of abuses being carried on by them with impunity, than almost any other description of native officers entrusted with authority. Letter from Collector of Moorshedabad, 7 Sept. 1811.

I have, &c.

Moorshedabad, Collector's Office, Sept. 7, 1811. (Signed) J. LAW, Collector.

To G. Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, and Charles Buller, Esq. Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your circular letter of the 7th June last, requiring my sentiments regarding the operation of the existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of revenue, on the expediency of adopting such measures as will tend to relieve the poorer class of tenants from the oppression of the landholders in general, with the limitation not to preclude the landholders from, or restrict them in, the free and easy means of collecting their rents; and to state my opinion on the conduct of the Cazees, native Commissioners, and others invested with the power of disposing of distrained property, and on their decisions in revenue suits. Letter from Collector of Mymensing, 20 Sept. 1811.

2. In order to form a distinct and competent opinion on the heads severally noticed, I have carefully perused the existing Regulations, and those on which they were founded, which leaves me little to say on the propriety of them, or of the means they insure to protect the tenants from any oppressive or improper conduct on the part of their superiors. But by a people in whom there is little sense of moral obligation, it is not to be presumed that laws framed for the indiscriminate welfare of all will be attended to, except in the case of their serving the purpose of momentary benefit to the party, of cloaking, under the disguise of law and justice, passions to the sacrifice and injury of individuals, or of gratifying the more gross and ardent desire of wealth and riches.

3. It may not be irrelevant to the subject to remark, that from the time of the accession of the Company to the extensive provinces of Bengal, the utmost solicitude has been paid to the rights and immunities of its inhabitants; and that solicitude has been carried to an extent which, possibly, the liberality and avowed principles of the British legislation only would have granted to them. By this virtue, we found them in a state of unparallelled prosperity and independence; and what the prudence of former councils dictated, wisdom and the conviction of their excellence have induced the succeeding to confirm to them. But however studious and persevering our conduct may have been, towards establishing among them internal happiness, and securing to them every rational benefit a government can bestow, it must with sincere regret be observed, that our laws are either inefficient, or the nature of the people is such as to render them of no avail.

4. In tracing the causes of the abuses committed by the Zemindars, it will scarcely be necessary to have reference to the ancient constitution of these provinces, since the research must resolve itself into the primary system observed by the natives in their interior management of the country. Whether that system was correct or otherwise, has long since been determined by our jurisprudence; and we have to lament, under the many acts of exclusion practised by the higher class of the community, at that time, on the poorer, by refusing to them the common offices of humanity, that they have so much reduced them below the nature of men, as not only to have rendered them generally insensible to their own condition, but to have so confined them within that influence as to occasion its operation upon them, even at the present moment, with undiminished effect.

5. Thus situated, and thus exposed to the rapacities and extortions incident to self-interest, which was evidently the principle that induced the policy of former times, is it not reasonable to conclude that the same policy exists in the present? The education which is similar, certainly renders them susceptible of the same feelings and the same habits; and though our code of laws may have, in a great degree, tended to embarrass their usual operations, by defining to them the line of conduct it is proper for them to pursue with their dependents, yet it is plain that the influence I allude to is prevalent, and will continue, until either the rights of the tenants are established to them, or the landholders are made sensible that their property and interests depend upon their moderation and good faith towards their Ryots.

6. Though I am not prepared, from the want of personal communication with the peasantry, to offer to you instances of the many and innumerable oppressions committed on them by the Zemindars, I am not the less assured that they exist. The power the landholder possesses over his tenants, by virtue of his estate, renders them practically subject to many irregularities which the laws will not willingly notice, from its being necessary that a certain degree of subordination shall prevail: still, if that power be supported by the legal delegation of authority to dispose of the property of the individual, without reference to the courts of justice, we ought not to be surprised if it be made the ready instrument of abuse. The vigilance of our laws may do much; but where the jurisdiction is so extensive and the authorities are so limited, much necessarily will remain undone. We can never know of all the crimes that are committed, and can seldom punish all we do know of.

7. The patient and enduring disposition of the lower class may be adduced as a sufficient reason, why discretionary power should not be vested in the hands of the landholder; for, if I may be permitted once more to revert to the character of the natives, we shall invariably find the rich oppressing the poor, the powerful the weak, the natural result of imperfect civilization. With a people thus prone to pursue the impulse of their own desires, without due regard to the motives which actuate them, or to the laws which ought to preserve the interests of all, it cannot be expected that they will make good use of the authority granted them: I should, therefore, consider it eligible to restrain them within the limits of those laws, leaving them as little power as possible over their tenants.

8. This, I should conceive, might easily be effected, without restricting the landholder in the means of his collection, by enjoining him, prior to the distress and sale of property for the discharge of any arrear of rent, to prefer his demand against his tenant in the Adawlut, either in person or by substitute, with one or more witnesses, swearing to the truth of the same, leaving to the Judge the discretionary power to grant the distress, as circumstances may permit. The benefit arising to all parties by this measure is obvious; for if the demand be just, the Zemindar will be empowered, under sanction of the Judge, to levy the distress; the Cauzy, or commissioner, will be legally authorized to attach and dispose of the property of the Ryot; and the Ryot be made to restore the dues he unlawfully withheld. On the other hand, it will effectually check the abuses committed under the present rules of distress, by preventing the realization of the unjust demands that are so frequently practised upon the tenants: it will also tend to the general delivery of pottahs and cabooleats, and restrain the licentious participation of the Cauzies and Commissioners in the exactions of the Zemindars.

9. It will naturally be the duty of the Judge, in summarily determining on the necessity of the distraint, to apply to the Zemindar or his accredited agent, or whoever may in consequence attend, for a statement, specifying the amount of his demand, the date on which the arrear became due, the cabooleat received from, and a copy of the pottah delivered to the tenant; and to inquire into the cause of the default, and as to the property the tenant may possess to meet that demand, either in crops, goods, chattels, or otherwise. Thus, by ascertaining the particulars of what is due, and the supposed value of the property, he will be enabled to direct the proportionate quantity to be sold, and preserve to the tenant the means of his future subsistence, or at least relieve him from undue exaction. In all other respects, the Judge will conform to the Regulations; and should he not have leisure to attend to the application, refer it to the Collector for a report upon the same.

10. As the foregoing proposition for the protection of the Ryots fully comprehends the wishes your Board expressed in the first suggestion of the fourth paragraph of your letter, I shall only remark, that it is intended that no proprietor, prietor, farmer, or manager of land, or local agent of such person, shall be authorized to distrain, except upon his showing legal proof of his capacity so to do, by having strictly adhered to the letter of the Regulations in his arrangements with his tenants, and by producing the copy of the pottah granted to the tenant, as required by Section 59 of Regulation VIII of 1793; in failure of which, he is to be subject to the prescribed fine. And in regard to the second suggestion, it appears to me to supersede the necessity of reviving the rules contained in the 9th and 10th Sections of Regulation XVII of 1793, as it will be far from likely that the landholder, or other person, will cause a false distraint to be procured, when the penalties attending the parties forswearing themselves are so heavy, and when the means of discovering such falsehood are so explicit.

11. It, however, occurs to me, that the same objections may be ascribed to the proposed measure, as those which induced the repeal of certain parts of Regulations XVII of 1793, and XXXV of 1795, which were stated to have been in consequence of considerable delays having been experienced in the receipt of the public revenue. In answer to this, I shall observe, that no greater delay will take place in the practice of this, than in the reviving of the sections before-mentioned; for the landholders will be careful to adjust their conduct to the prevailing system, and make timely application to the Judge for the power to distrain. I am, therefore, inclined to give little weight to this objection, when opposed to the interests and property of the tenants, and the material advantages that will result to them by the revocation of Section 2 of Regulation XVII of 1793, and Section 2 of Regulation IX, 1799. Partial alterations will be made in other sections, as may be found necessary.

12. Of the general conduct of the Cauzies and native Commissioners, under the powers vested in them to distrain and to decide upon revenue suits, I feel myself unable to speak, never having held official communication with them. That there is reason to believe they are subject to the control of the Zemindars, and act far from conscientiously in any of their proceedings, is apparent, since their agency has long been questionable, and their principles are decidedly corrupt. For information upon these points, however, I must beg leave to refer your Board to the judicial authorities, under whose immediate superintendence they are placed, and who are competent, from daily observation, to form a just and impartial opinion.

13. In thus offering to you my unreserved sentiments on the subject of distraint, I feel it incumbent upon me to mention that I have been influenced to do so, partly by the license granted to me by your Board, and partly by the conviction of the necessity of a reform. The mode I have pointed out, to relieve the tenants from the existing oppressions, is no doubt imperfect, and little worthy of consideration: but I have acted in obedience to your command, and in so doing I have performed my duty. I therefore transmit it to you, with the deference and submission due to your superior judgment, and in the hope that, if it fail to contribute to the advancement of the object proposed, it will, at least, receive your usual indulgence.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Mymensing, 20th September 1811.

(Signed) R. MITFORD, Collector.

To R. Thackeray, Esq. Secretary to the Board of Revenue.

Sir:

1. I have been duly honoured with your letter of the 7th instant.

Letter from Collector of Nuddea, 29 June 1811.

2. The existing Regulations respecting distress and sale of property for demands of arrears of revenue I do not consider defective, except in the instance of making all property liable to distress; whereas, in my opinion, it ought to exempt plough cattle, and implements of husbandry, without which the cultivator can neither support his family, subsist himself, or have an opportunity of paying his rents.

3. The instances of extortion committed by the landholders, and that with impunity, impunity, are innumerable and well authenticated. A glaring one, which came under my own personal observation a very short time since, appearing immediately to embrace the object of the Board's inquiries, I will here insert it. Seeboo, a blacksmith in my employ, came to me in May last, in a state of considerable agitation, and represented that the farmer of his village had, on an unjust demand, not only seized his brother's plough, but had driven off, in distress, the whole of his own cattle and sheep, entreating my interference in their release, or he and his family would be reduced to inevitable ruin. The tale was told with so much feeling and apparent truth, that I did not hesitate to request the attendance of the farmer, who lives near me, which he complied with, accompanied by his Gomastah, when an act of such oppression and injustice was disclosed that quite astonished me. It appeared that, during the past year, Luckon, the brother of Seeboo, had taken from Ramjoy Sing, the farmer of the village Pinalla, &c., a tract of land that constitutes part of the northern bank of the Jellinghy river, and was then under water, on the stipulation of paying for it in kind, and the proportion of two-thirds of whatever it produced was to go to the farmer, and the remaining third to the cultivator. The land was regularly ploughed and sown as the waters receded. But unfortunately, they did not subside sufficiently fast to admit of more than one-fourth of the land being brought into cultivation at the proper season: the remaining three-fourths, consequently, continued uncultivated, and of course unproductive. The rapacious farmer, irritated, most probably, by his disappointment, not contented with seizing on the whole of the crop produced from the one-fourth, now demanded eighty rupees, as the estimated value of his share of the crop that might have been produced from the remaining three-fourths of the land, had it been brought into cultivation; and to enforce the payment of this unjust claim, dignified by the appellation of a claim of arrears of rent, the farmer applied to the Thannadar of Noparrah, who granting him a police-officer, the implements of husbandry belonging to Luckon, forty-seven head of cattle, and a flock of twenty-five sheep, the property of Seeboo, were seized and carried off in distress. No part of these circumstances being denied by the farmer, I pointed out to him not only the gross impropriety of his conduct, and the disagreeable consequences that would probably result therefrom, but recommended the property's being released. Finding, however, five days after, that the distress still continued, I desired the blacksmith to present the petition to the court, which I sent with a note; and an order was passed that the property should be released, on the amount being deposited in court. The poor man having paid his little all in discharge of his rents for the year just expired, had not the means of depositing the amount; and the influence of the farmer deterred every one from lending him the money. In this exigency he again came to me; when, extremely incensed at the villainy of the farmer, I agreed to deposit the amount, provided the injured party would faithfully promise to prosecute for damages, which he acceding to, I intended to advance the sum: but the circumstance coming to the knowledge of the farmer, he instantly released the property, relinquished his demand, and ultimately prevailed upon the blacksmith and his brother to enter into a razinamah. On reproaching these men, some days after, with breaking their faith with me, they candidly acknowledged they had been induced to a compromise, under the influence of personal apprehension; for if they had refused, the farmer, in revenge, would most probably have bribed a Goindah to give in their names at Budmaushes, or have sent them himself to the magistrate as such, in which case they would have been committed to the Fouzdarry jail, where they might have remained for years, unheard and untried, and either have died there or become outcasts. The farmer might also have ruined them by a fictitious claim in the Dewanny Court, under Regulation VII, in which case they would have been confined in the Dewanny jail until the season for cultivation were past, when falling really in arrears, the farmer would take advantage of the circumstance, and sell the whole of their property for the fourth of its value in liquidation.

Letter from Collector of Nuddea, 29 June 1811.

4. The fears of these poor people were not without foundation; for it is a lamentable but well-known fact, that a great number of Ryots, who have presumed to contest unjust demands, have been made victims of the farmer's revenge. Innumerable instances could be quoted in support of this assertion; and I am persuaded that, had I not interfered in favour of the blacksmith and his his brother, their property would have been sold in satisfaction of this unjust claim.

Letter from Collector of Nuddea, 29 June 1811.

5. The first suggestion proposed by the Board to obviate this evil, takes it for granted that pottahs are applied for by the Ryots, but withheld by the landholders. This, however, is not the case. It is uniformly the Ryot who declines receiving them; and the reason assigned is, that the rate at which their lands are therein assessed is higher than it ought to be.

6. That this objection is, in many instances, but too well founded, cannot be denied, though it is not by any means universally the case. For example, the purchasers at auction of pergunnah Shawoojeal, finding, on making a measurement and hustabood, that the Ryots hold their lands at six and ten annas per begah less than the pergunnah rate, tender them pottahs at the standard established by Mr. Redfearne, but which the Ryots decline, on the principle that they are not obliged, in justice, to pay more than they are recorded or assessed at in the totbundy, or statement of lands, that was transmitted to the Board prior to the sale.

7. The same circumstances exist in the whole of the mehals that have been sold at public auction, in liquidation of arrears of revenue due from Rajah Ramkeshen and the Nuddea Zemindar.

8. I am also of opinion, that it would encourage Ryots, already too prone to resistance and evasion, to withhold cabooleats altogether.

9. Under the above circumstances, indiscriminately to exclude all claims to distress and sale of property, in satisfaction of arrears of revenue, unless a cabooleat could be produced against the defaulter, might, I am afraid, be considered by the landholder as somewhat arbitrary.

10. The second suggestion is also, I apprehend, not likely to answer the end proposed; for without calculating on the privation of family comforts, the loss of time, fatigue of journey, great expense, and detention, the Ryots would experience by attending at the sudder station, or on the probability of the landholder's being able to render the object of their journey abortive, either by intimidating or inveigling the security, to make him decline coming forward, or, as a last resource, by instructing his agent at the sudder station to protest against the security, on the score of his not being eligible, the court could not attend to or execute such an accumulation of business as the suggestion would create; and it would also be attended with this bad effect, that it would encourage disaffected Ryots to combine and set their landholders at defiance, by withholding their rents in toto, the probable evil consequences of which are too obvious to require comment.

11. It is a fact well known, that the natives of the three provinces, whether Hindu or Mahometan, from the highest to the lowest, of every sect and avocation, are not only venal in the highest degree, but totally devoid of principle and common honesty. Plutus is the universal idol of their adoration; and every other consideration vanishes at his approach. It is, therefore, not at all to be wondered at, that they should, without remorse, be induced to betray the confidence reposed in them by the Regulations, as often as it contributes to their private emolument; or that native Commissioners, Cauzies, and police officers, should sell their favours to the highest bidder.

12. The instances of the corruption that the native Commissioners have been guilty of, in the investigation and decision of revenue suits, are not only numerous, forming the theme of general execration, but stand recorded in the courts of every district under the British Government; and though the acts of atrocity that are hourly committed may not wholly originate in the malversation of these persons, yet I believe it is the general opinion with men of experience, that it has considerably augmented the number, and often occasioned the perpetration of the crimes alluded to.

13. As the oppression so justly complained of appears to have arisen more in the abuse of power than in any defect in the intent and meaning of the Regulations, the only radical cure that occurs to me is, to transfer the authority of distraining and selling property in liquidation of arrears of revenue, from the persons who now have it to the Collectors of revenue, the executive part to be performed by the pergunnah Cauzies, under the Collector's orders.

14. By vesting this authority in the Collectors, distraint would become less frequent; for an application to the Collector for a perwannah to a Cauzy, directing a distraint to be made, would not be complied with indiscriminately, or without inquiry: and a conviction of this circumstance would deter a landholder from having recourse to such coercive measures, to enforce the payment of an unjust demand. The landholders, also, would be protected and assisted in collecting their just demands from rebellious and turbulent Ryots.

15, The gross abuses practised by the native Commissioners, in the investigation and decision of the revenue causes, as also the baneful effects arising therefrom, have already been commented upon: nor do I see the smallest possibility of remedying the evil, but by transferring the powers of hearing and deciding revenue causes from them to the Collectors of revenue, from whose decisions the dissatisfied party may be declared at liberty to file a regular suit in the Dewanny Adawlut.

16. My opinion on the policy of vesting in Collectors of Revenue the authority of ordering distraint and sale of property in liquidation of arrears of revenue, as also the investigation and decision of revenue causes, is grounded on long experience, and a full conviction that it is totally out of the power of the courts, in addition to their various other occupations, to enter into the discussion, or investigate the merits of the revenue causes, with that energy and promptitude, that is indispensibly necessary to render the wisdom of the Regulations on those subjects in any degree beneficial, particularly to the cultivators and their landlords; and I do not hesitate in giving it as my decided opinion, that the great evils complained of have almost exclusively their source in this very identical circumstance.

17. In conclusion, were the Collectors to be allowed a fee on each cause, proportionable to the amount demanded, to be paid by the party cast, I am of opinion it would operate as a salutary check to that spirit of litigation so prevalent in the inhabitants of the Lower Provinces.

I am, &c.

Zillah Nuddea,
Collector's Office,

(Signed) WM. ARMSTRONG,
Collector.

To R. Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Letter from Collector of Sylhet, 20 Nov. 1811.

Gentlemen:

In answer to your Board's circular letter, under date the 7th June last, I beg leave to state, that during the period of more than three years that I have been in this district, no complaints have been preferred to me regarding unjust distraint of property, as was repeatedly the case in other zillahs where I have been deputed to officiate as Collector. The system of distraining property in this district has been gradually falling off from the year 1805, in consequence of the removal or death of the persons who were authorized by the court in their stead; and the amount of the per-centage on the sale of the property, as a reimbursement for their trouble, being so very trifling, that persons who still hold sunnuds of authority for particular pergunnahs have quitted those pergunnahs, to avoid being called on to dispose of distrained property. These circumstances, together with that of the decisions of the court on suits for unjust distraint and sale being invariably given against the distrainer, have now nearly, if not totally, suppressed the system of distraining in this district. The abuses formerly committed in this district by Talookdars and their Gomastahs, under the powers with which they were invested by the VIIth Regulation for 1799, were not exerted so much to oppress their own Ryots, as it was to distress other Talookdars and their Ryots, with whom they contested the proprietary right of the lands.

The first proposition of your Board, I conceive, will have the happy effect of causing the delivery of cabooleats and pottahs, which will contribute to check check the misunderstanding between the proprietors of land and their Ryots, and will at the same time facilitate the decisions of the court on Malguzaree suits when those documents are produced.

Letter from Collector of Sylhet 20 Nov. 1811.

I fear the second proposition will not prove so beneficial to the Ryots in this, as it undoubtedly must in other districts, as two-thirds of the proprietors in this zillah do not pay a yearly revenue to the amount of six rupees each; consequently, the revenue payable by the Ryots under those proprietors, must be very trifling, and the expense which a Ryot must incur to proceed to the court, to give security for the release of his property, or to contest the claim to the balance, will, in almost every instance, in this district be more than sufficient to defray the amount demandable from him, or even to discharge the whole sudder jumma of the proprietor. It would, therefore, be far more preferable for the Ryots to put up with the unjust exactions of the proprietors, than proceed to the court for redress.

To delegate the same authority to the Cauzies and Commissioners of the different pergunnahs, as is proposed to be given to the Judge and Register, would, I fear, cause more litigation than would otherwise exist; and yet I am not aware of any other more equitable mode towards both parties. I therefore beg leave to suggest, that the Cauzies and Commissioners in this district be empowered with the same authority as is intended to be given to the Judge and Register, and the decisions passed by the Cauzies and Commissioners on contested claims of balance of revenue be made applicable in the courts of the Judge.

The Cauzies and Tehsildars in this district do not appear to have ever interfered with or disposed of distrained property; and the native Commissioners, who were invested with that authority, are not known to have influenced or abetted either party, further than selling the distrained property, but which was most generally the property of another Talookdar.

For the last two years, the native Commissioners in this district have been restricted to the investigation of suits on debts, bonds, contracts, and the like, which they decide with a considerable degree of justness. Revenue suits do not appear to have been established in the mofussil, and very few are filed at the sudder court.

I have the honour, &c.

Sylhet, 20th November 1811. (Signed) J. FRENCH, Collector.

To G. Dowdeswell, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue, Fort William.

Gentlemen:

Letter from Acting Collector of Rajeshahye 16 Aug. 1811.

1. I have to acknowledge the receipt of your Secretary's letter of the 7th of June.

2. The apprehensions of Government, that considerable abuses and oppressions are committed by those vested with the power of distraint, are, I am convinced, but too well founded; but I firmly believe that Government is not aware of one-half of the abuses committed in consequence of this power being vested in the Zemindars. I therefore consider it my duty to point out some of the evils which have most forcibly struck me.

3. In the first place, should a Ryot incur the displeasure of his Zemindar, certain ruin stares him in the face. A false demand is immediately made for rent, and followed up by the distraint of his property, and an application to the proper officers for its sale; and as the Regulations now stand, neither the Commissioner can decline selling the property distrained, nor the Judge himself afford any redress to the poor Ryot. He probably puts himself to the expense of a journey to the court, presents a petition on stampt paper, stating his grievances, and the Judge tells him he must pay the demand whatever it may be, and institute a suit against his Zemindar. The Ryot represents that he is ruined, and cannot pay the institution fee. He is directed to prosecute as a pauper: but in the meantime how is he to live? and what is to become of his his family, probably turned out of their houses, destitute of every comfort, and compelled to resort to illegal practices to save themselves from starvation, or possibly the complainant is assaulted and severely beaten by the Zemindar's orders, for his presumption in having applied to the Court for redress? Indeed, I might venture to assert, that such complainants run a great risk of being disposed of in a manner that may quiet the apprehensions of the Zemindar, of his being further molested by a dissatisfied Ryot; and in such cases, the hold the Zemindar has over his dependants deters them from deposing a syllable before the magistrate contrary to his wishes.

4. The alarming and distressing height to which perjury has risen in this country, is, I firmly believe, in a great degree to be attributed to the power of distraint at present vested in the Zemindars; and I think I may venture to assert, that there are few gentlemen in the judicial line, who do not coincide with me in this opinion.

5. My sentiments respecting the conduct of the Cauzies and Munsiffs, as Commissioners under the Regulations for the sale of distrained property, have also been required. From what I have above stated, your Board will perceive that these officers cannot possibly be the ready instruments of the Zemindars, in enforcing illegal exactions against their Ryots, because, as I have before remarked, as the Regulations now stand, the Commissioners have not the power of making any inquiry into the alleged balances, and cannot decline selling distrained property. The Zemindar takes the responsibility on himself, and calls on the Commissioner to do his duty; and although, at the time, the Commissioner may know and be satisfied that the demand is unjust, still he must sell the property, or the Zemindar threatens him with an action for neglect of duty.

6. Another, and serious evil, arising from the power of distraints, is constant battles between the Zemindars for lands, which they consider to appertain to their estates. The Ryots cultivating for one Zemindar are seized by another, and Peons put over them for rent, and their property plundered, or as it is called, sold under the VIIth Regulation of 1799. The Zemindar for whom the Ryots have cultivated turn out their dependants to protect their property, and affrays ensue, which are not unfrequently attended with bloodshed, and even murder.

7. How much of the Magistrate's time is occupied in the investigation of suits of this nature, is very well and generally known; as also (from the immense number of witnesses which can be brought forward by either party to perjure themselves) how very difficult it is to determine the question of possession.

8. At the same time I make this statement, I think it my duty to observe, that disputes of this nature are by no means so frequent in this district as heretofore; and this I attribute to the well-timed measure of the present Magistrate, compelling the attendance of the Zemindars in all cases of affrays, and considering them as principals, although they might not have been aiding and assisting by their presence. He reasonably supposes, that no serious affrays can possibly take place for disputed lands, but with the connivance of the Zemindars; and this measure has certainly had a most wonderful effect in the suppression of such shameful and illegal practices.

9. Whilst, on the one hand, the abuses committed by the Zemindar against the Ryot, under the rules for distraint, and generally the evils arising therefrom, are brought forward to the notice of Government, it on the other hand becomes necessary to consider how, in the event of these rules being abolished, the Zemindar is to realize his revenue.

10. I am very well aware, that the great landholders, particularly those residing in and near Calcutta, endeavour to impress us with a belief, that the Ryots are unwilling to enter into engagements for payment of rent. In part this is true; for the Ryots certainly object to receiving a pottah for the payment of three times the amount of rent they have been in the habit of paying, but they will not decline taking a pottah for the amount of rent they have always paid.

11. The Regulations have now been printed and published since 1793, a period of eighteen years, and I am convinced, notwithstanding the wish of Government vernment that pottahs should be granted and cabooleats taken, there are as few now as ever there were. It will naturally be asked, how does this happen? The only explanation I can offer is, that the rights of the Ryots have never been determined; or if determined, not well understood. The consequence is, the Zemindar, who pretends to consider his Ryot a tenant at will, tenders a pottah at an exorbitant rate; the Ryot, who considers himself (from the circumstance of having held his lands for a very long period) a species of Mokurureedar, conceives that he is entitled to hold his lands at a fixed rent, and therefore refuses the pottah: the Zemindar distrains and the Ryot is ruined.

Letter from Acting Collector of Rajeshahye, 16 August 1811.

12. The assertion in the last paragraph, that the rights of the Ryots have never been explained, may surprise your Board, but I believe it to be true nevertheless: at least I am not aware of any Regulations by which these rights are clearly defined. By the VIIIth Regulation of 1793, there are no Mokurrureedars, but those with whom a settlement was made, in consequence of their having held their lands for twelve years at a fixed rate, previous to the formation of the decennial settlement. Of those how few there are, must be well known to your Board.

13. By the same Regulation, the khodkast Ryots are not to be disturbed in the possession of their lands, nor to have their rents raised, unless the Zemindar can prove they have held their lands for the last three years at a less rate than the nerrick of the pergunnah. What constitutes the khodkast Ryot is, I believe, little understood. From the best information I can obtain, it may be defined by the residence of the Ryot in the village in which he cultivates. He and his forefathers may have cultivated lands in an adjoining village for hundreds of years; still, as far as regards the lands in that village, he can only be considered as a paikast Ryot, and as such, a tenant at will.

14. These distinctions I point out to the notice of your Board, to shew what description of Ryots may be willing, and even anxious, to take out pottahs and grant cabooleats: and of these I conceive the paikast Ryots are ready to enter into the above engagements.

15. Before the Ryots who consider themselves entitled to hold their lands at a fixed rate, and the khodkast Ryots, can be induced to grant cabooleats (unless it be for the rent they have always paid, and with which, I have already stated, the Zemindars are not satisfied) the rights of these Ryots must be clearly defined; and no doubt should remain, whether these men have or have not a right to hold possession of their lands at a fixed rate.

16. In the event of its being determined that this description of Ryot has the power to hold possession of his lands so long as he continues to pay his rent, it becomes necessary to take into consideration the propriety of continuing in force the second Section of Regulation XLIV of 1793, which restricts the term of the pottahs to ten years; for no Ryot who may have a right to hold his lands at a fixed rent will take out a pottah for any limited period, as this act alone would imply that the Zemindar, at the end of that period, had a right to oust his Ryot or to raise his rents. It is true, that by the seventh Section of Regulation IV, 1794, the Ryots have a right to demand a renewal of their pottahs at the established rates of the pergunnah; but these rates are difficult to ascertain. The lands in one village may be worth three rupees per begah, and in the adjoining villages not worth three anas. Of this the Ryot is aware, and the Zemindar takes advantage; and the khodkast Ryot would only obtain a renewal of his pottah, but at an exorbitant rate, against which it would be useless for him to contend.

17. Your Board will be aware, that confusion in accounts, and indeed confusion in every way, is the object of the Zemindar. It enables him to harass his Ryots, and even to maintain a large body of dependants, by placing them over his Ryots as Peons, to compel their attendance for adjustment of their accounts, which, as I said before, the Zemindar renders as intricate and excessive as possible.

18. Another great source of distress to the Ryots is, their being compelled to pay as rent, not a specific sum for a certain quantity of ground, but for the cultivation of different articles. This mode again authorizes, or at least enables

Letter from Acting Collector of Rajeshahye, 16 August 1811.

the Zemindar, to send Aumeens frequently in the year to measure each species of crop, and the expense of this measurement falls upon the Ryot.

19. With regard to the conduct of the Munsiffs in their decisions on revenue suits, I of course cannot speak positively; but I understand from the Judge of this district, that few of this description are brought before them: on an average, not one in thirty. I apprehend, however, that in these cases, as in all others, their decisions are sold to the highest bidder. This appears a bold remark, but it is, nevertheless, the general opinion: and if your Board had before them an estimate of the fees received by these men annually, it would be seen that, unless they were corrupt, it would be impossible for them to hold these situations, for the fees received by them cannot possibly defray the expense of the establishment it is absolutely necessary they should keep up; and I have ascertained from the Judge, that the fees paid to the Munsiffs in this district amounted in the last six months, on an average, to something less than eight rupees per mensem.

20. It now becomes my duty to submit rules which, if adopted, will I conceive tend to the advantage of the Zemindar, the Ryot, and the public, and consequently without any risk of Government's suffering from a defalcation of revenue. But whilst the Ryot fancies he has a right to retain possession of his lands at a fixed rent, and the Zemindar will not admit this right, it is evident that no rules can be framed which can put a stop to disputes between the Zemindar and his Ryot; and whilst such doubts exist, it is vain to expect that pottahs will ever be taken by the Ryots, or that the Zemindar will not enforce the VIIth Regulation of 1799 to collect the rents he demands. The first rule, therefore, must be a declaration of the rights of the Ryots (if they have any) as cultivators of the soil, and they should be carefully explained and particularized. If they have none, it should be declared they are tenants at will; and then there will be no hesitation on their parts to take out pottahs, however hard the condition imposed on them may be, because they will at once be able to determine whether they can fulfil the conditions of their engagements, and will be well assured that the engagements once entered into cannot be infringed by the Zemindars, and that they cannot enforce the payment of more than they have agreed to pay.

2d. All engagements between Zemindars and their Ryots should be for a specific sum; the pottah should declare the number of begahs, leaving the Ryot to cultivate whatever he pleased; and all engagements on the different kinds of crops, as tending to create confusion and expense, should be declared invalid.

3d. There should be one standard measurement for the whole country; at least for each district. I mention this, in consequence of the measurement being different in almost every village in this district, which is a constant source of litigation and dispute between the Ryot and Zemindars.

4th. Leases may be limited to fourteen years.

5th. The Zemindar should have the option of ousting any tenant against whom a balance has been established, after judicial investigation.

6th. Pottahs and cabooleats should be regularly witnessed, and the parties encouraged, as much as possible, to register them in the office of the Register of Deeds for the zillah in which the lands may be situated.

That pottahs should be regularly witnessed is mentioned, because the Zemindars pretend it is disgraceful for them to have any paper witnessed which they may grant to the Ryots; and I believe it is a fact, that in Bengal not one pottah can be produced with the signature of a witness. The Zemindars and their Amlah carry this farce so far, as frequently to grant pottahs with a mark only, which they admit or deny as it suits their advantage. Although the Zemindars may say they never deny the pottahs granted by them, and some are probably honest enough to admit them, yet it must be recollected, that in the present rack-rent system, this mark or signature alone will not satisfy the Ejaradar, Dur-Ejaradar, and host of under-farmers.

7th. In no instance should a Zemindar be allowed to place a Peon or Peons over a tenant. He should call on him for the payment of his rent, and if the Ryot neglect, after such notice, the Zemindar might then distrain; but if the Ryot contested the demand, and tendered security to the Commissioner, the Commissioner should immediately return the property, and stop the sale, leaving the Zemindar to apply to the court of judicature, under the VIIth Regution of 1799.

Letter from Acting Collector of Rajeshahye. 16 August 1811.

I am aware that this rule would be increasing the business in the Judge's Court, and that the Judges have already too much to attend to; but may not the propriety of allowing these suits to be determined by the Collectors be taken into consideration? The parties, as at present, would have the option of instituting a regular suit before the Judge; and the Collector, from having less to do than the Judges, would be able to attend to their decision as soon as brought before him.

8th. To prevent, as far as possible, the Ryot wantonly withholding the payment of his rent, and tendering security to prevent the sale of his property, I would recommend that the Judge or the Collector, should the trial of these suits be entrusted to him, be authorized, in all such established cases, to compel him to pay the same fee on the amount decreed against him, as is levied on the institution of regular suits.

9th. The production of the Ryot's caboolcat should always accompany the application for the sale of distrained property to the Commissioner, and no sale should take place without it.

21. Whatever may be ultimately determined by Government on this subject, I earnestly hope, for obvious reasons, that no power of investigation or inquiry will be delegated to the Commissioners empowered to sell distrained property, not even if the Ryot were to produce receipts in full for the rent demanded. The disputes before them would be endless, and their cutcherries become mal-adawluts; and I must again repeat, that if the demand be contested, the Commissioner should, on the Ryot's tendering security for the payment of the amount of rent claimed by the Zemindar, in the event of its being substantiated before the Judge, stop the sale of the Ryot's property, and immediately report the circumstance to the Judge.

22. For this purpose, one general form might be adopted, which would effectually prevent any unnecessary long report from the Commissioner, and be useful as a record.

23. I beg leave to submit a form, which I think would answer every purpose.

I have the honor to be, &c.

To R. Thackeray, Esq. Secretary to the Board of Revenue.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your circular letter, under date the 7th ultimo, requiring of me my sentiments regarding the operation of the existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of revenue, and in reply beg leave to submit the following suggestions.

Letter from Acting Collector of Rungpore, 5 July 1811.

1st. The Zemindars, Moostaziers, &c. in many pergunnahs in this district, neither give pottahs to the Ryots, or receive caboolcats from them. When pottahs and caboolcats are regularly exchanged, the Ryots do not experience any any very great distress, as in that case both parties generally act fairly and honestly towards each other; but where such an exchange does not take place, great distress ensues, as the Zemindars, &c. without written agreements collect their rents and distrain at pleasure the property of their Ryots: it might, therefore, be advisable to oblige all Zemindars, &c. to tender pottahs, under a severe penalty, to their Ryots, which pottahs should not be for a less term than three years; it also might be advisable, for a means of security, that the kistbundie should be drawn out on the back of the pottahs and cabooleats, both agreements being on stampt paper, and attested by two witnesses.

2d. I understand some Zemindars are in the practice of collecting more than agreed for in the pottahs and cabooleats. To prevent such exactions, I would advise that they should be most severely fined when guilty of such oppression.

3d. Upon the Ryot paying his first instalment agreeable to his kistbundy, let the Zemindar, or his local agent, grant his receipt. If he refuse to give it, let the Ryot cause two or three men to witness the transaction, and when the second kist is demanded, refuse payment, until he receives his receipt for the first. If the Zemindar ill-treats the Ryot, let him complain to the Darogah, who, unless the dispute is amicably settled during that or the next day, might report the case to the Magistrate, who would take immediate notice of it. But again, if the Ryot should refuse to pay his kist when required, or should refuse to pay his second kist on receiving his receipt for the first, and there happens to be no crops on his field, let the Zemindar realize the balance according to the existing regulations; for if regular pottahs, cabooleats, and kistbundies are enforced, the Ryots will know exactly the demand against them, and will consequently avoid the distress of the Zemindar by paying their revenue when due.

4th. As disputes frequently arise from the Ryots losing their pottahs, and as they do not take the precaution of having them registered, on account of the greatness of the fees, it would be advisable to have books kept solely for the registering of pottahs, and that one rupee should be the amount of costs, allowing out of that sum a fee to the Register, the price of stamped paper, and a fee to the Mohurees for copying such papers; and in order to make the Mohurees responsible for the papers they may copy, it might be advisable that they should have sunnuds from Government, and attest each copy with their signatures.

5th. As far as the conduct of Cauzies and native Commissioners have come under my notice, I think that they are frequently guilty of malpractices. But I look upon the distraining of property, on account of realizing the arrears of Revenue, as a necessary evil; and the only method eventually to render it less frequent is to look to the origin of the evil, which is the want of proper agreements between the Zemindars and their Ryots, and to enforce pottahs on the part of the former, and cabooleats on that of the latter, both agreements declaring the full amount the Ryots are to pay, and that whatever else may be claimed by the Zemindars, over and above what is mentioned in those agreements, shall be deemed exactions.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Letter from Collector of Rungpore, 1 August 1811.

Sir:

In compliance with the Board's orders, contained in your circular letter of the 7th June, I have held a personal conference with some of the peasantry, as well as with several Zemindars, on the subject in question. The former appear to be strenuous advocates for abolishing that part of the Regulation VII of 1799, and XVII of 1793, authorizing the Zemindars to attach and cause to be sold the personal property of their tenants on account of arrears of revenue, as they often convert that power to an improper use, by screening themselves, under cover cover of it, in the commission of rapine and oppression. On the other hand, the Zemindars and their agents positively assert, that should they be prevented from exercising the authority at present vested in them by the above-mentioned regulations, they would be entirely ruined, and nearly the whole of their estates would fall in balance, and in a short space of time be sold by Government. The truth of their assertion cannot be disputed, no other power whatever having been granted to them by Government for the purpose of enabling them to realize the arrears of revenue from their respective tenants; it would be therefore advisable to adopt such rules as would not interfere with the interest of either party.

2. I perfectly coincide with the Board in the opinions expressed in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of your letter, with respect to the general delivery of caboolcats written on common country paper, and also with regard to the release of the property, upon the owner giving security to the court, as well as to the modification of Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII, 1793; and I beg to make two additional proposals, viz. 1st. That a summary statement of all caboolcats should be annually delivered by each Zemindar to the Collector, which would prevent them from making any alteration in the articles of the caboolcats, and which, by enabling the Collector to ascertain the exact mofussil produce of each estate, would materially assist him in the formation of the totbundy for the partial sale of estates, and in the obtaining the necessary information (when applied to for it by the Judge) relative to the jumma and lands of the different tenants. 2dly. In case the balance due from the Ryots is undisputed, the security given by the owner, as proposed in the second article of the fourth paragraph of your letter, should be bound to pay it within a limited period, which should not exceed a month or five weeks, so that the Zemindar may not sustain the loss consequently attendant upon a delay, on the part of his Ryots, in the payment of their rents.

3. With a view to prove the certainty of payment having been made by the Ryot, I beg to propose that the Zemindar, farmer, or manager of an estate, should cause their respective tenants, at the time of their paying any part of the rent, to deliver before two witnesses an invoice or challan on plain paper, signed by the tenant or by his agent, for the payment of the revenue, stating the sum which has been paid, and the balance then remaining due: and should it be proved that the Ryot refused to give the proposed challan, or the Zemindar to grant receipts, both the one and the other should be liable to such punishment as the Magistrate may think proper to award; and I doubt not but that the production of the caboolcats and challans on the part of the landholders, and of the pottahs and receipts on the part of the Ryot, will be a satisfactory proof of the reality or falsity of the demand.

4. With respect to the conduct of the native Commissioners and Cauzies, I am sorry to say that I have great reason to apprehend that, in their decisions, they are often influenced by corrupt or otherwise improper motives; I have therefore to propose, that the revenue regular suits, and those which are to be decided on by a summary investigation, should be decreed by the Collectors, subject to an appeal to the Judge, whose decision may be considered final,

I have the honour to be, &c.

Letter from Officiating Collector of Tipperah, 9 September 1811.

Gentlemen:

When I received charge of this office on the 10th ultimo, I observed that your Secretary's letter, under date the 7th June last, had not been replied to; but conceiving that the Collector would be much more competent than myself to answer that address, from his experience and from the local knowledge he must possess of the circumstances referred to in that letter, as they relate to this district, I had wished to defer making any reply until the return of Mr. Wemyss.

2. Having,

Letter from Officiating Collector of Tipperah, 9 Sep. 1811.

2. Having, however, received the orders of your Board of the 24th ultimo, I presume it is incumbent upon me to submit my sentiments on the subject. Vague and unfinished as my observations must necessarily be, your Board will, I trust, receive them with that indulgence which the short opportunity I have had to collect them may probably appear to deserve.

3. I have made inquiries respecting the operations, in this district, of the existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of revenue, and there does not appear to me much cause for apprehension that the Ryots are oppressed in this respect by the landholders. I am given to understand, that it has been the practice for the persons invested with the power of selling distrained property, to require documents from the distrainer, before the attachment is authorized or the sale carried into effect, and that these documents are invariably forwarded to the Judge, for his consideration and final approval of the case. That when no papers can be produced by the distrainer to shew his right, or when the Ryot denies the balance, or possesses papers shewing it to be false, the Cauzie or native Commissioner does not proceed to the sale, but reports the case for the orders of the Judge, when it is customary, I understand, to refer the party for redress under the summary trial described in the 15th Section, Regulation XVII, 1793.

4. A great many cases of the latter description are, I learn, brought before the civil court of this district; but I find only one instance on record in this office, during several years past, of any of those suits being referred to the Collector for adjustment and report, as authorized by the fourth clause of the section and Regulation above mentioned, as they have always been decided by the Judge in person.

5. Abuses and exactions, of the nature described in your Secretary's letter, by landholders, can best be suppressed, I should conceive, by the efficient control and personal exertions of the Judge; and, as far as I can learn, the Cauzies and Munsiffs in this district are under such check and arrangement, that they cannot materially support the Zemindars in their illegal practices. At the same time, there can be no doubt that the suggestions contained in the fourth paragraph of your Secretary's letter, if carried into effect, would be attended with the most important advantages, and would put an effectual stop to illicit and excessive demands on account of arrears of rent.

6. In reply so the ninth paragraph of your Secretary's letter, I beg leave to mention that I am informed, that very few, if any, revenue suits are decided by the native Commissioners in this district, but that causes of that nature are generally preferred at the sudder, and referred for trial to the Register and head Commissioner of the court. My short standing in the service, it must be supposed, cannot have given me experience sufficient to judge of the system in general. I can only speak with respect to the district which is under my charge; and I am of opinion, where the same plans and arrangements are pursued, the oppressions and exactions of the Zemindars over their Ryots, and the corruption of the Cauzies, Commissioners, &c. must be comparatively trifling.

7. From the foregoing remarks your Board will observe, that as none of the circumstances relative to this report came officially before the Collector or his officers, any information respecting them must be derived from very defective and uncertain sources; and as my local and personal communication with the peasantry here has been necessarily extremely little and confined, I could not presume to offer as argument any vague or interested reports, the truth or falsehood of which I have not had the means or opportunity to ascertain.

I have the honour to be, &c.

9th September 1811. Officiating Collector.

Letter from Collector of Twenty-four Pergunnahs, 9 July 1811.

To R. Thackeray, Esq. Secretary to the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen :

In answer to your circular letter of the 7th ultimo, I have the honour to state, for the information of the Board, that I have long considered that the existing existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of revenue have been much abused, and consequently have been the cause of much oppression to the under-tenants and Ryots; and nothing has prevented my addressing the Board on the subject, previous to this reference, but the extreme difficulty of finding a remedy for the grievance, without being the occasion of heavy arrears to Government and injury to the landholders. Under this impression, it is with great deference I beg leave to propose, in addition to the first suggestion of the Board, that a notice of fifteen days for the sale of attached property, with an inventory of it with the seal of the Cauzy, shall be on all occasions of attachment delivered to the defaulter (as was directed by former Regulations, rescinded by Regulation VII of 1799), a copy of which should also be forwarded to the Collector, with a view of enabling the Ryot or tenant to attend at his cutcherry, and give in security for the demand made against him, which might be refused by the distrainer though fully sufficient, after which the property attached should be released; and if the balance be contested between the parties, the case to be tried by the Collector in a summary way, as is directed to be done by the Judge, under Clause 4, Section 15, Regulation VII, 1799. Should the defaulter not give security within the prescribed time, the Collector shall then direct the Cauzy, or other public officer, under his seal and signature, to proceed to the immediate sale agreeably to the inventory; but should the sale of a part of it prove sufficient to pay the amount due, the remainder should be immediately returned to the defaulter, and an account of sale, with every particular, transmitted to the Collector.

Letter from Collector of Twenty-four Pergunnahs, 9 July 1811.

2. Such is my opinion of the abuses and malversation of the native Commissioners, that I should be very happy to hear they were entirely done away. I have often conversed with Zemindars and proprietors of land on this subject, and I have never met with one of them that did not state the abuses to exist in every other talook but his own. This leads me to suppose that the oppression is general; and I must confess that I am unable to point out any remedy, short of their entire dismission. All revenue suits, in my opinion, may be decided by the Collector, and all other suits by the Registers of the Zillah Courts.

I am, &c.

To Richard Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

I have now the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Secretary's letter of the 7th June last.

Letter from Collector of Behar, 5 Dec. 1811.

2. Conscious inability, from want of experience, to offer any general opinion on the subject therein contemplated, will necessitate me to confine my remarks almost exclusively to the propositions of your Board, which appear in the fourth paragraph of the above letter, and only as to their operation if adopted in this district.

3. First suggestion.—The reciprocal execution of pottahs and cabooleats by the Zemindars and Ryots, if I may judge from the inquiries I have been enabled to make, prevails very generally in this district; but as it undoubtedly is not universally observed, the adoption of the rule proposed by your Board appears adviseable, inasmuch as it would generalize the delivery of cabooleats, and thereby essentially conduce to the security of the tenant, and facilitate the adjustment of his accounts with his landlord.

4. With respect to the further object of this suggestion, (namely, to prevent Zemindars and others from exacting rents from persons who are not their tenants), it appears to me to be preparing a remedy for an evil almost imaginary: for to suppose its existence to any obviable degree, we must pre-admit that the courts of justice are inaccessible, that the peasantry are unacquainted with our laws, and that they submit in silence to wrongs. It is unnecessary to to say that the first is not the case: the spirit of litigation, for which the people of Behar are notorious, forbids the latter presumption.

5. To exact the rent, the landholder moreover must attach; and he could not effect the object of distraint, which is the sale of the Ryot's property, without the assistance of some of the public officers empowered to dispose of distrained property, and who, should they league with the landholder to wrest a trifling sum from the Ryot, become themselves liable to a prosecution in the courts, and on proof to heavy penalties, for carrying into execution an illegal sale.

6. Second suggestion.—The unqualified adoption of the first part of this suggestion, it appears to me, would be upholding the interests of the Ryot, to the great prejudice both of the Zemindar and the public; and I would, therefore, humbly recommend the following modification, namely, that in accepting the security given by the owner of the attached property, the Judge or Register prescribe a specific, and as short a period as possible, for the discharge of the balance due from him: for otherwise, as the proprietor or farmer seldom proceeds to distraint until the time approaches for fulfilling his own engagements with Government, should the defaulting Ryot, availing himself of the omission of the condition just mentioned, protract his payment beyond that period, the landholder must unavoidably fall in arrear; and then succeed the various inconveniences to obviate which Regulation XXXV of 1795 was expressly enacted.

7. The foregoing objections are not totally inapplicable to the second part of the suggestion now considered; as should the issue of the suit prove favourable to the landholder, if provision be not made for the immediate payment of the amount of the contested balance, the evils above alluded to must be the consequence.

8. On the abuses supposed to be practised by the landholders, under the powers vested in them, and the oppressions experienced by the Ryots, I do not consider myself competent to deliver an opinion. From the complete occupation of my time at the sudder station, I have had no opportunity of visiting the interior of the district, and my sole source of information must consequently have been derived from the Zemindars, with whom alone I have any intercourse, and in whose communications on this subject I, of course, could place no confidence. If oppression or abuses do exist, the sufferers will not fail to apply to the courts for redress; the Judges therefore, I should presume, would be most capable of affording information on the subject. I beg permission, however, to observe, that from the preamble of Regulation XXXV of 1793, and Regulation VII of 1799, it appears that it was deemed necessary to ameliorate the former rules of distraint, as much difficulty had been experienced by the landholders in realizing their rents, from the want of faith, on the part of the Ryots, in fulfilling their engagements, and the powers which the former were authorized to exercise had been found insufficient for enforcing the payment of the rents due to them. Unless, therefore, it could be established, that the moral character of the lower classes of the people of this country has materially improved, the revival of rules, limiting the landholder's powers, would be most inexpedient.

9. With reference to the eighth paragraph of your Secretary's letter now before me, I can only state, that if the penalties prescribed by Section 5, Regulation VII of 1799, for collusion or misconduct on the part of the persons empowered to dispose of distrained property, fail to ensure a faithful discharge of the trust reposed in them, the evil must be submitted to as irremediable.

10. On the conduct of native Commissioners in the decision of revenue suits, I, as a Collector, can have no opportunity of forming an opinion. Parties dissatisfied with their awards invariably appeal to the courts, where they are either confirmed or reversed; and further the case cannot proceed. To the Judges then, I conceive, if information be required, reference should be made for their sentiments on this subject.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Zillah Behar, 5th December 1811.

(Signed) J. M. MACKNABB, Acting Collector.

To

To R. Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Secretary's letter of the 7th June last, requiring my report on the abuses which are apprehended to exist in the distress and sale of property for arrears of revenue, and desiring me to state my sentiments on the remedy proposed by your Board for that evil.

Letter from Collector of Purneah, 29 Nov. 1811.

2. From the information I have been able to procure, I have good reason to believe that the powers at present vested in the Zemindars are often employed by them, and still oftener by the farmers, as the means of extortion. I imagine, however, that the practice might be greatly diminished, were the sufferers always certain of speedy redress; but such is the delay in the zillah courts, occasioned by the accumulation of business before them, that a Ryot, after being stripped of the greater part of his property by the Zemindar, may often wait for years before he can obtain redress, and the knowledge of this deters the one from prosecuting, and encourages the other in his exactions.

3. With respect to the Regulations proposed by your Board, I do not think they can do any harm, or impede in the smallest degree the realization of the revenue; but I am afraid they will prove ineffectual. If, however, it is intended that the second suggestion shall apply to Mustagers, or farmers of the revenue, and shall entitle those people to have their property released on giving security, whenever attached by the Zemindar for arrears of revenue, it may often happen that the lands will be sold, in satisfaction of the demands of Government, before the decision of the court can be obtained, even in the summary process. Confined solely to the Ryots or cultivators of the soil, the Regulations proposed may be of some benefit.

4. I have not heard any complaints of the persons authorized to sell distrained property for the discharge of the arrears of rent, or of the native commissioners in the decision of revenue suits. I have no doubt that those persons may sometimes abuse their power; but the occurrence is rare, and may easily be prevented from running to excess, or of being productive of any serious oppression, by the vigilance of the court.

I have the honour to be,

To Richard Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Secretary's letter of the 24th of August, directing me to furnish the report required by your Board's circular orders of the 7th June last.

Letter from Acting Collector of Sarun, 22 Oct. 1811.

2. In the tenth and last paragraph of the above orders, I am informed that your Board expects that my reply will not be founded on the information obtainable from my native officers, or a few opulent individuals, but by local and personal communication with the Ryots themselves. As I received the orders at a season of the year in which it was impossible for me to proceed into the interior of the country, where alone the information required by your Board was procurable, I thought it more desirable to defer making any reference until I had it in my power to make a tour of the district, which it was my full intention to have done in the months of November or December next. From the Ryots in the vicinity of the sudder station little information of importance is to be acquired. They are in general, I believe, more leniently treated by the Zemindars and farmers, than the same description of people in the mofussil. This is to be ascribed to the greater facility they possess of representing their grievances to the Judge and Magistrate, and to their acquaintance with the Vackeels and Amlah of the court, in whose power it in some measure lies to expedite the delivering of their complaints.

3. That

Letter from Acting Collector of Sarun, 22 Oct. 1811.

3. That the VIIth Regulation of 1799, which empowered the Zemindars, Talookdars, farmers, &c. of land to distrain and sell the personal property of their under-tenants for arrears of rent, is greatly abused by them, cannot I think be doubted; but to find a remedy for the relief of the Ryots, that shall not virtually operate against the Regulation in question, which was framed under the necessity there existed of affording the proprietors of land the means of facilitating the realization of their rents due from their Ryots, and consequently the more punctual discharge on their part again of the demands of Government, is an object more desirable than perhaps easy to be effected.

4. With respect to the two suggestions contained in your Secretary's letter, I beg leave respectfully to offer the following remarks. The enforcing of the first would certainly be productive of the desired effect of preventing proprietors and farmers of land from distraining, and causing to be sold, the property of persons who are not actually their Ryots, which I believe frequently occurs, particularly in estates which are disputed; but to render the adoption of this plan expedient, it must, I think, be first ascertained, that that part of the VIIIth Regulation of 1793, which directs mutual written engagements to be entered into between the landlord and his tenant, be carried into execution, as many of the Ryots would wilfully keep back their rents, knowing that their landlords had never received cabooleats from them. Owing to the courts, in general, being so overloaded with business as to preclude the possibility of summary investigations, under Clause 4, Section 15, Regulation VII of 1799, the permitting the Ryots to release their property, on giving security for the payment of the contested demand, would be productive of the ill consequences which your Board are so desirous of avoiding, for notwithstanding the cause remaining undecided, the Zemindars must either pay up their revenues or be subject to the constant sale of their estates.

5. In reply to the eighth paragraph of your Secretary's letter, respecting the conduct of the Cauzies and native Commissioners in selling distrained property, it appears to me that as it does not rest with them to investigate into the claims of the Zemindars, they have it not in their power to commit oppression; and I am of opinion that the empowering of them to make a summary inquiry, previous to their proceeding to the sale of any distrained property for arrears of rent, though it might give them opportunities of oppressing, would yet, on the whole, be productive of more justice to the Ryots, than the present mode of leaving to the Zemindars, as they please, to distrain and cause to be sold the property of their tenants.

6. With regard to the conduct of the native Commissioners in the decision of revenue suits, I have to observe, that as they never come under my cognizance, it is impossible for me to give any opinion on the subject, without making, as mentioned in the second paragraph of this letter, a tour into the interior of the district.

I have, &c.

Sarun, 22d October, 1811. (Signed) F. LAW, Acting Collector.

To Richard Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and the Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter from Collector of Sarun, 5 Dec. 1811.

I have the pleasure, in answer to your instructions, communicated in Mr. Secretary Thackeray's letter of the 7th of June, to submit to you, as required, my opinion on the propriety of carrying into a legislative law the suggestions pointed out for consideration.

1. There does not appear any objection to this: on the contrary, it may, as remarked by the Board, be a check to undue exaction, and induce the landholders to grant their Ryots pottahs consonant to their cabooleats.

2. This would be of use, if the other avocations of the civil courts did not impede immediate and summary adjustment; but the delays of the courts render it objectionable, and the resulting consequence would be, the serious effects effects heretofore experienced from the accumulation of arrear and the sale of land.

Letter from Collector of Sarun, 5 Dec. 1811.

3. If we are to judge from the present state of cultivation throughout the country, it certainly may be presumed that the existing rules, vesting a specific power in the landholders, have not been attended with those serious consequences that are so much apprehended; and as it is difficult to draw the line of distinction, I have no hesitation in declaring I am averse to innovation by a legislative rule on the above, though I would give the opening to Ryots to obtain immediate redress, by allowing them an appeal to the Collectors from those who are empowered to decide revenue suits; and that, in the event of the Ryots being dissatisfied with the Cauzies and others vested with the power of deciding suits, the Cauzy or others shall transmit his or their proceedings to the Collector, with the objections, in a statement delivered by the aggrieved, and the Collector shall have the power of reversing or confirming the decision, and that his (the Collector's) decree shall be final, as far as relates to these decisions.

4. This will be a complete check to the impropriety of decisions, and being a matter of account, the Collectors are better adapted to decide thereon: nor would it be any additional expense, as the present establishments are adequate to be employed in these inquiries, in those districts which are denominated the Company's provinces. At all events, as these representations are to be on stampt paper, the increase of the demand in that article will be equivalent to any additional establishment required.

5. In large demands, where the complaint is beyond the amount authorized to be tried by the Commissioner, the complaint should be made immediately to the Collector, who is to decide summarily thereon, and that award to be final, till a regular suit is instituted, investigated, and decided.

6. That which relates to the impositions in sequestrations ought to be left entirely to be settled in the judicial courts, as they are more competent to determine points of this nature, and are better able to check the oppressions more immediately under their authority and jurisdiction.

7. I have endeavoured to make a local inquiry, but can derive no information on which I would wish to hazard an opinion. The best criterion, as before stated, of the existing rules, is the actual state of the country. If doubts still arise, reports from the judicial courts should be made, by which it may be ascertained how far the abuses from their investigation have actually existed.

I remain, &c.

5th December 1811. Collector.

To R. Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter from Collector of Shahabad, 11 Dec. 1811.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th June, with your letters of the 24th August and 8th November 1811, and am very much concerned that you should have been put to the trouble of repeating your orders concerning the situation of the peasantry of this district. A variety of occupations compelled me to defer replying to your first favour; and the nature of your instructions requiring particular attention and inquiry from different people, I considered it rather as a work of slow progress, to be obtained by degrees, and from occasional and unguarded expressions dropt by the injured parties themselves, than by any direct investigation for an avowed motive.

As the Board seem now desirous of early information, I will endeavour to come at the truth by more direct means, though I confess that I am apprehensive that it will be taken in a wrong light by the very persons it is intended to serve; that they may be tempted to consider it as an authorized encouragement to complain against authority they have from early life been accustomed to submit to with respect and with obedience: and this fancy, if they really happen happen to be impressed with it, may tend to unhinge the present system of obedience and dependence on superiors of every description, and be the cause of great jealousy and discontent, and the landholders may seize it as an excuse for withholding or delaying their regular payments.

In obedience to your instructions, I will make every inquiry that can tend to elucidate the question, and hope shortly to be able to address the Board again on the subject. In the mean time, as the Board require my candid opinion, I beg leave to mention that the peasantry of this country, or the labouring cultivators of the soil, when they imagine that their assertions will be attended to, will in all probability, if they have the smallest excuse for doing so, bring heavy charges against the Zemindars, and those that have jurisdiction over them; though the Judge of the zillah court never refuses them justice, when they have any fair grounds of complaint: and the natives in general are so proud and pleased with the name and the credit of having a cause in the Adawlut, that they seldom, if ever, lose an opportunity of bringing it forward, if they have any plausible pretence, plea, or excuse, for doing it, and tell the particulars of their complaints, as they saunter idly through the streets, to as many idlers as are disposed to listen to their tales, whom they quit in haste, to repeat their story to the next person that happens to pass near them.

I therefore, with due submission to the judgment of the gentlemen of the Board, conceive that some Adawlut regulations, that the wisdom and experience of Government may deem requisite, will best answer the Board's wishes, and bring every object of public justice within the reach of the meanest and poorest Ryot in the zillah.

This desirable object may possibly be obtained by separating the Fouzdarry from the Dewanny Adawlut; for it is almost impossible for one and the same person to give entire satisfaction, and fully to perform the duties of both departments, which require men of very different, if not the most opposite characters and dispositions: for no one man existing (if the Board will have the bounty to pardon the terms) can at one and the same time be a saint and a sinner. Still, when one man has to perform a double and an opposite description of duty, double and opposite qualities are sometimes highly requisite. The indulgent, the good, the forgiving man, and the placid philanthrophist, whose serene countenance displays the tranquillity of his breast, and proclaims peace with all men, may be taken advantage of, and his kindness abused; while the stern, the firm, and harsh countenance of the prompt and determined magistrate, full of the fire and animation of youth, will cause surprise, intimidation, dismay, or dread; will disturb and bewilder the faculties; will unhinge the secret, the previous, the evil and the malicious intentions of the vicious, and inspire them with a disposition to obedience, and patience under restraint, with a respectful, resigned, and humble submission to the Magistrate's mandates: for conscious guilt is ever a slave to its own apprehension, and becomes in a manner panic-struck and rivetted to the ground, at the steady and penetrating aspect of the decision of the awful Magistrate.

It might not be proper for one in my humble situation and line, to attempt to set forth at large the qualities that I conceive to be requisite in a Magistrate. Such an attempt might give offence to some one, and render me liable to the blame and to the censure of many, who have (and perhaps justly too) a a good opinion of themselves. The judicious sagacity of the gentlemen of the Board will best enable them to descry the description of characters that may be most proper to perform the active, the imposing, the imperious, and the domineering duties of a civil Magistrate. The old adage, of the dial telling the tale of truth, without disturbing the minds or meditations of men with harsh and annoying sounds, perhaps may be admitted as a pardonable allusion, on the present occasion: for the thread of opinion, however tender, is not wilfully or easily snapped; and when skilfully held and guided, proves to be the strongest reigns than can be yoked to the great car of state.

The Judge of the Dewanny department, and the decider upon the rights of others, I humbly and with due submission to the superior judgment of the Board, conceive ought, in preference, to be a person of natural gravity, rather advanced in life, and already passed (if the terms may be allowed) the fire, irritation, tation, choler, or impatience, so common in youth, so natural to early life, possessed of great steadiness and mildness of manners, with a command of temper, of a good natured and forgiving disposition, the power of suffering and concealing discontent, slow and temperate in replies, and extremely loath to quarrel; for the man that can attain the happy habit of commanding himself, his superiors may delegate and entrust with unshackled authority, with unlimited power. Letter from Collector of Shahabad, 11 Dec. 1811.

The man of mature age, or past the meridian of life, or who from long residence in the country is assailed by infirmities, is certainly not the most eligible man to be chosen for a Magistrate; though, at the same time, he may be equal to every act requisite for the serious administration of civil justice between man and man; and from his time of life and infirmities, become daily more and more convinced of the duty incumbent on him, of doing as he would be done by, to those whose interest and welfare the bounty and good opinion of Government have consigned and let to his keeping.

Should the separation of the office of Magistrate from the duty of the Judge not meet the approbation of Government, who alone can determine what plans are most proper, and what measures are most eligible to be chosen, the object may perhaps be obtained by increasing the number of Assistant Judges, or rather the number of Assistant Magistrates (suppose two, three, or more, according to the size and business of the zillah), and stationing them in the vicinity of some of the largest towns in the district.

Or increasing the number of the Registers and their Assistants, with each a separate jurisdiction in different parts of the district, or such causes referred to them as the Judge may think proper to consign to their investigation.

The Zillah Judge may still keep his title of Magistrate, with this additional descriptive denomination of his duty, Judge and senior Magistrate; to whom the Assistant Magistrates, however numerous, may refer their proceedings for approval, before any serious measure is carried into effect.

Some regulation of this kind, or some measure similar to what is alluded to, would be a great relief to the heavy, constant, laborious, and united duties of the Zillah Judge and Magistrate; and be highly gratifying to all classes of people who have business with the Adawlut, or may, on any occasion, deem themselves aggrieved by any person, or injured in any way whatever.

I have the honour, &c.

To Richard Rocke, Esq. Acting President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Sir:

I have now the honour of submitting my answer to the suggestions contained in the Board's letter of the 7th June, viz. Letter from Collector of Midnapore, 29 Nov. 1811.

1st. That no Proprietor, farmer of land, or local agent of such person, be authorised to distrain the property of his tenant or Ryot, unless he can produce a cabooleat from such tenant or Ryot, shewing the rent which the former is entitled to receive.

The Ryots of chucklas Midnapore and Julessore, whose annual collections amount to Sicca Rupees 1,056,515 : 1 : 7, will object to this measure, as these lands do not admit of any specific cabooleat being executed between them and the Zemindars, for the following reason.

The revenue, according to ancient usage, has been collected from the Ryot at the close of the season, according to the actual produce of the land, and not agreeably to the number of begahs: for instance, supposing a Ryot at the commence of the season agrees to rent ten begahs, if the whole actually yield crops, he pays accordingly; if, on the contrary, five begahs are productive, and the remaining five, from the failure of season or any other cause, are unproductive, in that case the Zemindar suffers the loss.

Under

Letter from Collector of Midnapore, 29 Nov. 1811.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that it would not be advantageous for the Ryots to have this suggestion carried into effect.

The Zemindars, to protect themselves from fraud, depute an Aumeen to the Mofussil when the crops are ready to be housed. This person draws out a statement on the spot, in the presence of the person immediately concerned, as likewise of the village Mookhea.

Agreeably to this statement, the proprietors call on the Ryot to sign the justness of the demand; which, if not liquidated, the Zemindars proceed to levy it, as directed by Regulation VII, 1799.

The Ryots of pergunnahs, tumlook, mysawdul, bugree, brawmunbhoom, and chitwa, whose annual jumma amount to Sicca Rupees 4,43,096: 2: 1: 1, would derive considerable benefit from the measure.

2. That all property attached, with a view to the sale of it, be released, on the owner giving security, either in the court of the Judge or Register, for the payment of the balance, if it be undisputed, and for such sum as may be eventually adjudged against him, if the claim to the balance be contested between the parties. The case to be tried as a summary suit, under Clause 4, Section 15, Regulation VII, 1799.

I fear this suggestion, if carried into effect, would be the cause of greater distress to the Ryots, owing to the distance they would have to travel for the purpose of giving the necessary security, independent of which the Judge or Register being so fully occupied with more urgent duties, the business of the unfortunate Ryots would necessarily be delayed, perhaps for some days, during which period their domestic concerns would remain at a stand, and the person being separated from his family would incur a double expense. In addition to this, he would experience much difficulty in obtaining the necessary security, owing to his circumstances and mode of life being unknown at the Sudder station; and besides, I am confident, if he is fortunate enough to obtain security, it will not be without the sacrifice of a large sum, in comparison with the demand against him.

The many years experience I have had in the mofussil, leaves not a shadow of doubt in my mind, but that the Cauzies, native Commissioners, and other persons invested under the Regulations with the power of selling distrained property, and likewise the decision of revenue suits, are the ready instruments of enforcing every illegal and exorbitant demand possible for the Zemindar to prefer against the Ryot, who, in many instances, is instigated by the Cauzies, &c. to dispute any demand for the arrears, under a promise of being befriended by them, in order that they may barrass the Zemindars and extort some pecuniary reward from them. This expense, with contingent charges of Peons, makes up a large demand against the Ryot, which is liquidated by the sale of his property, which is seldom allowed to be sold for more than enables him to discharge the arrears of revenue and all illegal charges.

By this means, the Ryot is so much reduced in his circumstances, that he is deprived of the means of complaining against these oppressive acts; and the remaining Ryots, seeing the fate of one of their body, are disheartened, and become subservient to the wishes of the Zemindar.

With a view to remedy the above abuses, as likewise not to preclude the Zemindars, farmers, and managers of estates from the means required to collect their rents, I am of opinion that the first step towards it should be that no authority ought to be vested in the Cauzies, native Commissioners, or other persons, for selling distrained property on the mere statement of the Zemindar.

2. All demands for arrears of revenue from the Zemindar on the Ryots should be submitted in a detailed statement, specifying every item to the Collector.

The Collector, on receiving the complaint, should be authorized to summons the defaulter, and distrain his crops and products of the earth of every description, the grain, cattle, and all personal property.

The person deputed into the mofussil for this purposeshou ld grant a written acknowledgment acknowledgment for the same, which should be countersigned by the Ryot, and a duplicate transmitted to the Collector.

Letter from Collector of Midnapore, 29 Nov. 1811.

On the Ryot appearing before the Collector, a copy of the Zemindar's demand should be given to him, and an investigation take place respecting its justness; in the presence of both parties. Should it appear to the Collector that the Zemindar's demand is just, the amount, of course, should be immediately discharged with interest, and all charges, by the sale of the whole or a sufficient part of his distrained property; and, to prevent litigation, a fine, or a few months imprisonment, should be inflicted.

On the other hand, should it appear that the demand is litigious on the part of the Zemindar, that the defaulter's property be immediately released, and all expenses attending the distraint should be defrayed by the Zemindar; with the addition of such fine as the Collector may deem just, to reimburse the Ryot for his attendance at the Sudder station.

I am aware that if the Collector is authorized to interfere between the Zemindar and the Ryot, that the former will make it a plea for not discharging his revenue with punctuality.

The gross collections, however, of the land are now so great, in proportion to the jumma assessed on them, that he can easily, in the first instance, pay to Government the amount in dispute between him and the Ryot, from the profits of his zemindarry, and wait the issue of an investigation.

I have the honour to be, &c.

To H. T. Colebrooke, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter from Collector of Hidgelee, 21 Sept 1811.

I duly received your circular orders of the 7th June last and 24th ultimo, and should have replied to the former at an earlier period, had circumstances allowed of my forming any decided opinion on the subjects therein referred to me.

2. My experience in the revenue line has been entirely confined to the narrow circle of this collectorship; nor have any events occurred, since I took charge of it, of a nature to impress me with the conviction, that particular abuses or oppressions are committed by the Zemindars and others, under the powers at present vested in them, with respect to the distress and sale of the property of their Ryots for arrears of revenue.

3. Indeed, so far from having witnessed or become acquainted with abuses of this nature, I have found the landholders and public officers, throughout the district, generally speaking, much less given to petty oppressions, than I had expected they would be, from what I have experienced in my commercial capacity in other parts of the country.

4. Under these circumstances, and the want of local grounds on which to form a just judgment, I do not feel myself competent to offer an opinion, which may influence acts of a legislative nature, with regard to the points immediately referred to in your orders above acknowledged.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Sir:

I have to acknowledge your letter of the 7th ultimo.

Letter from Collector of Cuttack, 29 July 1811.

In answer to the first proposition, I have to observe, that in this district cabooleats are very generally taken; and in regard to the second, it seems to promise full security against further abuse.

It may be observed, that it is the Zemindar's interest to get as much as possible, and the Ryots to pay as little as possible. But self-interest will induce the Zemindar to temper his conduct, while no such hold restrains the conduct of of the Ryot: and I therefore apprehend, if the Zemindar's powers be much respected in this district, endless litigations would ensue, and the revenue would be materially injured. The Zemindars who have ill treated the Ryots in this district have soon found their error, and have found it expedient to moderate their conduct. The suspicions entertained by the Board of the native Commissioners and Cauzies are, I believe, as they respect this district, unfounded; but it is necessary for me to state, that the peculiar situation of Cuttack precludes me from having much personal communication with the peasantry during the rainy season.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS,
The 1st May 1812.

(Civil Department.)

Board of Commissioners.

To His Excellency Lieutenant-General George Hewett, Vice President in Council, &c. Fort William.

Honourable Sir:

Bengal Judicial Consultations, 1 May 1812. Letter from Board of Commissioners, 6 August 1811.

We do ourselves the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Excellency's orders of the 14th May last, directing us to submit our sentiments regarding the operation of the existing rules for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of rent.

2. From our long experience of the character and dispositions of the natives of India, we may safely premise that any powers with which they should be vested, under whatever restrictions and precautions it may be possible to devise, will always be abused, and that their ingenuity and low cunning will ever furnish them with the ready means of perverting the wisest institutions, to the gratification of either malice, revenge, avarice, or any other of the worst passions of human nature.

3. The provisions for the distress and sale of property remained nearly a dead letter, from their first promulgation in the year 1791, until the enactment of Regulation VII, 1799. The strict formalities and legal niceties imposed on the distrainer, and the heavy penalties attaching to the slightest deviation, were of themselves sufficient to deter the landholders from having recourse to a measure fraught with such danger. The result of the few attempts which were made by some landlords to avail themselves of the proffered remedy, could only tend still further to discourage the rest, when every step of the distrainer was met on the part of the tenant by a direct charge of robbery, from which the party accused, though ultimately sure of acquittal, was at any rate put to much personal trouble, and in many instances was involved in the disgrace of a long previous imprisonment as a common felon.

4. In securing the landlords from these difficulties and embarrassments, which opposed even the most moderate use of this summary proceeding, the modifications introduced by Regulation VII, 1799, have, without intending it, furnished them with an engine of oppression and extortion, as irresistible as their original powers were ineffectual. The penalties annexed to any unfounded complaints against the distrainer, have operated as a denunciation against all complaint whatever on the part of the tenant, whose mistrust of the result of a long litigation with a powerful and opulent antagonist, is increased by the present danger attaching to a failure; and he is, therefore, induced to submit patiently to every injustice, rather than attempt to seek redress, at the expense of an immediate interruption of the labour on which his family depend for support, and with a prospect of total ruin in the end.

5. Convinced that, as long as the process of distraining is left to the mere act of the parties, any modifications which might be adopted by the existing rules would still leave those rules equally, as at present, liable to perversion, either by the landholders into an instrument of oppression, or by the servants into a source source of fraud, we take the liberty of suggesting, as the only means which appear to us capable of obviating the abuses to which the existing rules are liable, that no distress of property be permitted to take place without the permission of the nearest Commissioner, who shall be held responsible for the legality of the proceedings, and shall be bound to make an immediate and full report of the whole to the Judge: that the Commissioner be peremptorily prohibited from co-operating in any distress, until he shall have satisfied himself, by the production of specific engagements or by some other undoubted document, that the distrainer is in a bonâ fide possession of the land, and entitled to the rents of it; or where, from the information which he ought to possess of all transactions within his jurisdiction, he may know that the possession of the land is in dispute, or for any claim of rent originating above three months before: and that, in addition to the present rules for replevening the distress, the Commissioner be further prohibited from proceeding to the sale of any distrained property, when the production of a receipt, or other discharge, shall satisfy him that the rent claimed has been liquidated.

6. In the event of the re-establishment of the Mal Adawlut, under the superintendance of the Collector of Revenue, the reports above required from the Commissioners of their proceedings in matters of distraint should be made to the Collector, whom it would be expedient to vest with the power of imposing a fine for all neglect or breach of duty; and the Commissioners should be further declared liable to dismissal from office by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, on report of such neglect through the Judge. Such punishment, by fine or dismissal, or both, to be of course without prejudice to the jurisdiction of the courts of justice in offences of higher magnitude, or in actions of damages for acts contrary to law.

7. The operation of distraint would be materially facilitated, if the Putwarries were compelled to keep their jummabundee papers in such uniform and perspicuous manner, as should readily fix the demand upon the tenant, and ascertain the quantum of his payments. But, for this purpose, some modification would be necessary in the constitution of the office. Under the revenue system established by the Emperor Akbar, the Putwarree was an officer of Government, and the office was hereditary. As the old institutions of Hindostan still maintain some footing in these provinces, the Putwarree is still considered here a public officer, entrusted with the general rights of the tenants, and supposed not to betray them; and from what has come under our personal knowledge, we are satisfied that the confidence reposed in the Putwarrees is seldom misplaced. In the Lower Provinces, on the contrary, the Putwarree is become a personal servant of the Zemindar, who has a direct interest in turning him to account.

We have, &c.

Board of Revenue.

To the Right Honourable Gilbert Lord Minto, Governor-General in Council, &c. &c. &c. Fort William.

Letter from Board of Revenue, 31 Dec. 1811.

My Lord:

Your Lordship in Council has already been apprized by Mr. Dowdeswell, of our having called upon the Collectors under our authority for their sentiments respecting the rules at present in force, relative to the distress of property on account of arrears of rent; we have, accordingly, the honour to transmit the letters which have been written by us, with an extract from our proceedings, in consequence of which the Collectors were called upon for their report.

2. It would seem to be generally admitted, that the Regulations, as they at present stand, are open to considerable abuse; and that the powers of distraint vested in the proprietors and farmers are frequently converted into the means of exaction and oppression. The remedy, however, is not so apparent; for as as oppression naturally begets fraud, there is as constant a struggle on the part of the Ryots to elude the just rights of the Zemindars, as there is on the Zemindars' part to grasp at more than their rights: great caution, therefore, must be observed, not to relax too much on a sudden in favour of the Ryots, lest we should run into the other extreme, and afford to them, by an abuse of the protection which the law affords, the means of withholding payment of their just rents. It must be recollected, also, that while Government insists on the punctual discharge of the revenues from the Zemindars, it is but equitable to the Zemindars that they should have sufficient means of enforcing a similar punctuality from their tenants.

3. The above observations have appeared to us proper; because, from the reports from the officers in the Judicial department, which have been forwarded to us, it would appear that they had only considered the evils arising from the oppression on the part of the Zemindars, without taking into consideration what may be expected on the other side of the question.

4. With regard to the rules suggested in Mr. Dowdeswell's minute, recorded on our proceedings of the 7th June last, the first, which proposes that no distress should be taken, unless the distrainer produce a cabooleat from the tenant distrained on, seems to be impracticable, because it appears to be admitted, that the Ryots have frequently as great an objection to receive pottahs and to give cabooleats, as the Zemindars have to grant pottahs.

5. In respect to the second proposition, of re-enacting the provisions contained in Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII, 1793, we conceive that it will be proper to adopt it. But it is obvious that other rules are required for the protection of the poorer classes of Ryots, who have not the means of giving security. On that point, however, we shall hereafter report. The only rules which have occurred to us with respect to the revival of the rules above quoted, we propose in addition, that a concurrent authority to hear suits of the nature referred to in those sections should be given to the Collectors. The two first rules, therefore, which are proposed in the accompanying draft, provide for the revival of Sections 9 and 10, Regulation XVII, 1793, with the addition above proposed, relative to the Collector's authority to hear and decide on the suits in question.

6. The most effectual remedy against the evils complained of, would be a prompt decision of all complaints on the part of the tenants against their landholders for unjust demands. As the courts of judicature are so generally overloaded with business, it would be in vain to expect that the Judges could pay that immediate attention to complaints of the above nature, as is absolutely necessary in justice to the Zemindars, in case their tenants are allowed to replevy their goods. But still the courts may occasionally find time for hearing such causes; and in some of the districts, in which there is more than one court of judicature, though only one Collector, it would seem to be desirable that the tenants should have the means, if practicable, of applying to the courts nearest to them.

7. When a suit shall, in the first instance, have been instituted before the Collector, the tenants instituting the suit under either of the two first rules ought not, in our opinion, to be allowed to remove it to the Dewanny Adawlut, unless by appeal, after the decision shall have been passed by the Collector. There is no reason, however, why the distrainer should not remove the suit into the higher court, if he should consider that the Collector is dilatory in bringing his proceedings to a close, or if he can shew just cause for the removal. In these cases, as the distrained property would have been restored to the tenant, the tenant is the only party who would have any interest in causing a delay in the final adjustment of the suit. However, as in cases in which the tenants may not be able to give security, and thereby redeem their property from distraint, the Zemindars or farmers might have an object in causing delay, we have provided in the third rule for that contingency, as well as for the other matters first referred to in this paragraph.

8. Section 4 authorizes and requires the Judges, in case they cannot give early attention to the complaints of the tenants distrained on, to transfer them to be heard by the Collector.

9. The

Letter from Board of Revenue, 31 Dec. 1811.

9. The fifth rule is intended as some protection for the poorer classes of Ryots, who cannot redeem their goods from attachment, by giving the security requisite. By extending the period at present limited for the sale of distrained property, as suggested by Mr. Treves, and which will be proposed in a subsequent rule, it is to be hoped that the Collectors will, in most instances, be able to hear and decide upon complaints made by the poorer Ryots before the day of sale shall arrive; and if they can effect that, the protection contained in this rule will be sufficient. But we do not think that the Zemindar can, in justice, be debarred from causing the actual sale of the attached property for a longer period, unless the complaint shall be decided against him, or unless, from the proceedings held before the day of sale, there shall appear sufficient cause for considering his demand against the tenant unjust.

10. On the sixth rule we have only to observe, that we conceive that if the decision is passed in favour of the distrainer, either by the Collector or by the Judge, the distrained property should be immediately brought to sale, whether the tenant appeal or not.

11. With respect to the seventh rule, however, it appears to us that if the distrainer shall appeal from the decision of the Collector, he shall be at liberty, provided the tenant distrained on has not replevied his property, to keep it under attachment, until the suit in appeal shall be decided, or the Ryot shall be able to replevy it: for if the distrainer loses his hold upon the distrained property, we apprehend that, if the suit in appeal should be decided in his favour, he would have little chance of recovering the rent due to him. The only remedy against an abuse of this power is to subject the party offending to a heavy penalty.

12. The eighth rule provides for the penalties against unjust and wilful distraint of property, in the first instance.

13. The ninth and remaining rules merely revive the rules formerly in force, relative to the period to be allowed between the attachment and the sale. The time at present allowed (viz. five days) is too short, as it leaves the tenant little or no opportunity of paying the arrear of rent demanded from him, either by adjustment, or by the mortgage or private sale of his property, to avoid the ruinous effects of a public sale at a low price and at a heavy expense.

14. In the proposed rules, your Lordship in Council will be pleased to observe, that we have gone further than the Board of Revenue have hitherto been of opinion that it would be safe to go, in favour of the Ryots. Whether the rules, if adopted, will be abused or not, must depend upon the attention paid by the Collectors to the speedy determination of suits which may come before them. The principal evil to be apprehended is, that at first, at least, the tenants who can give security, and thereby redeem their goods from attachment, will do so in many instances, and contest the demand where it is justly due. If the Collector, however, shall be enabled to decide the suits generally with promptness, such unfounded and vexatious suits will soon cease; and, on the other hand, by the early infliction of the penalty prescribed in cases of unfounded distraints, it is to be hoped that the evil at present complained of will be in a considerable measure remedied.

15. If experience should shew, that the rules are not attended with injurious effects to the just rights of the landholders, and if further provisions should appear necessary for the protection of the poorer classes of the tenants, who are unable to redeem the property from attachment, it may be hereafter advisable to adopt further rules for that purpose: but, at present, we conceive that it would not be safe to make any greater alterations in favour of the tenants, than those we have proposed.

MINUTE of MR. COLEBROOKE.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

I HAVE long had it in contemplation to propose to the Board some material modification of the existing rules concerning pottahs and other engagements between landholders and their tenants, as well as respecting distress, and other summary modes allowed to the landholders for enforcing payment of their rents, and regarding the means left to the tenants of obtaining redress, in cases of extortion and of undue distraint by the landholders.

In the long experience of twenty years since most of those rules were enacted, and more than ten since the principal alterations were made in them, they have been found (as is very generally acknowledged) to be in many respects defective and insufficient, and in others injurious and harassing. Rules devised for the safety of the public revenue have introduced a needless insecurity in the engagements and tenures of the Zemindars and Ryots, and have imposed more than requisite restraints in the exercise of their discretion in forming mutual engagements, and by consequence, on the free enjoyment of property as well as on agricultural improvement. The provisions of Regulations intended to give protection to the rights of subordinate landholders and permanent tenants and occupants of the soil, have been ineffectual for the defence of their privileges against the encroachment of superior Zemindars, and many of the rules designed for their protection have been perverted into engines of their destruction. Rules that have been contrived to preclude and obviate abuses which formerly prevailed, and have been guarded by penalties, became instruments in the hands of dishonest persons to vitiate their engagements and defraud the persons with whom they have dealings.

I shall, separately and distinctly, examine each branch of the existing revenue laws which appear to me defective and susceptible of amendment; and, in each instance, state the imperfection I impute to the subsisting rules, with the remedy I would propose to apply to it.

Section 2, Regulation XLIV, 1793, and corresponding Regulations of 1795 and 1803.

By the Regulations quoted in the margin it is provided, that no lease shall be made for more than ten years, nor leases be renewed except in the last year of their term, and every lease granted in opposition to that prohibition is declared null and void.

Section 5, Regulation XLIV, 1793, and corresponding Regulations.

And by another Section of the same Regulation it is further provided, that whenever lands are sold by public sale for arrears of the public assessment, all leases to under-farmers and Ryots, and all engagements with dependent Talookdars, shall stand cancelled from the day of the sale, and the purchasers may collect from the Talookdars, Ryots, and cultivators, according to the rates and usages of the pergunnah, as if the engagements so cancelled had never existed. The operation of this rule was extended, by a subsequent Regulation, to the entire amendment of leases for lands, of which a part only might be sold for the recovery of arrears of revenue; and was, on the other hand, modified, in cases of sales

Section 3, Regulation III. 1796.

taking place after the second month of the year, so that leases, unless collusive, should remain in such cases uncancelled until the close of the year. Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

These rules were enacted professedly to guard against the imprudence as well as dishonesty of landholders. The preamble to the Regulation recites the injury to which their heirs might be exposed by their imprudent engagements; but the evil against which the Regulation was especially intended to provide was the permanent diminution of the resources of Government, which would be the consequence of the landholders reserving a rent insufficient for the discharge of the public revenue. It was apprehended, that landholders, if vested with an unlimited power of discretion of fixing the amount of rent and the term of the lease, would abuse that power, and would either grant improvident leases at very reduced rents, for a perpetual or at least a long term, with the view of obtaining an immediate supply of funds; or might grant such leases collusively, for the purpose of creating beneficial estates for themselves, under borrowed names, or for relations, favourites, and dependents.

It is to be observed, that no provision is made against the dishonesty of landholders practising such devices with a view to defraud their creditors, their leases and engagements being unaffected by a sale made even under the authority of courts of justice for the recovery of private debts due to individuals.

As this, which no doubt is a much more favourable case than that of heirs, did not engage the attention of the legislature, it is fair to infer, notwithstanding the tenor of the preamble, that the security of the public dues was chiefly, not to say exclusively, considered; and, indeed, there appears no substantial reason for any special case of the interests of heirs in this instance, or for controlling the discretion of proprietors, and guarding against their improvident disposal of their property by lease, while every other avenue is open, by which the property may suffer detriment, and the heir's expectancy be defeated.

For the security of the public revenue, two remedies are provided by the Regulations in question, when one would have sufficed: first, the limitation of the landholder's discretion, in regard to the period of leases; and the cancelling of all leases, whenever recourse has been had to public sale, even of a part of the lands, for arrears of revenue. Both remedies could not be necessary. If the second were so, as the Regulation supposes, the first was superfluous. If the first were sufficient for guarding the resources of the revenue, the second could not be indispensible; and being a very rigorous rule, and a very discouraging one to agriculture, should not have been adopted, so long as no absolute necessity for it was found to exist.

These observations lead naturally to the proposition, that one or other of these rules be abrogated; and that the other, which is retained, be modified and amended. I hesitated long which to recommend should be rescinded, and which retained. Wholesome rules might, no doubt, be framed, on the model perhaps of the restrictions of English law respecting church leases and leases by tenants in tail, or on some other principle derived from the experience of other natives, by which the landholders might be restrained from making away with the resources of the revenue of the lands. Many considerations would seem to recommend this as the least harsh expedient: but to adapt it to the various cases which can be foreseen, and make it efficient for the purpose for which it is designed, the rules to be adopted could not but be in some measure complex; and we have found, in too many instances, how ill suited intricate arrangements and regulations are to the manners and capacities of the people of this country, to enter willingly on the new career of complex legislation. On this ground chiefly, and after mature consideration, I am induced to recommend the simple course of abrogating all restrictions upon leases, in the first instance, and of preserving the rule which cancels pottahs, in case of a sale for the recovery of arrears of revenue; with this modification, however, that it shall not take effect, unless fraud be proved, until the close of the year in which the sale occurs, nor extend to lands not included in the sale.

By this alteration of the existing rules, the landlord and tenant will be at full liberty to form any engagements that may be most for their mutual benefit, according to their own views of their respective interests. Leases for long terms of years, so requisite to the extension and improvement of agriculture, and so conducive to the welfare of both landlord and tenant, will be no longer prohibited, nor be discouraged by any circumstance, but the contingency of the pottah being cancelled by a sale of the lands for the public revenue due from the landholder.

This, I apprehend, must be retained for the security of the revenue of Government. It is well countenanced by the laws of several European nations, in which a change of property annuls unexpired leases. Its effects, in discouraging the employment of capital in agriculture, is to be lamented; but is unavoidable, without incurring greater evil in pursuit of a different remedy.

Regulation VII, 1801, Section 9. Regulation VII, 1799, Section 23, Clause 3. Regulation V, 1800, Section 24. Regulation XXVII, 1803, Section 15.

In the proposed modification of the existing rules, I have inserted the exception "unless fraud be proved." The Regulations at present in force provide, that the suspension of the operation of the rule for cancelling pottahs until the close of the year, is not to be held applicable to engagements, pottahs, and leases evidently collusive; and that the officers in charge of the attached lands shall collect the rents according to pergunnah rates, notwithstanding engagements evidently collusive, and contracted in expectation of the attachment.

Considering the proneness of the natives to abuse any power or authority with which they are invested, the latitude here given seems much too loose and too extensive. Either a judicial inquiry, summary at least, should take place, before sequestrators, and still more purchasers, are allowed to levy from the growing crop a higher revenue than the cultivator or renter has engaged to pay; or a very clear and definite test should be provided, by which the suspicion of collusion may be tried. It should not be left to the discretion of an Aumeen or of an interested purchaser, to say whether the leases of the cultivators of an estate are collusive. The Regulation aims at no more than to do away such leases as may have been made in contemplation of the attachment or sale, with the view of evading or defeating it; the date of possession, and the comparison of the rent to that of the preceding years, would, therefore, furnish satisfactory grounds on which to found a presumption. If the tenant were in possession during one or more anterior years, and the rent reserved be equal to the average rent of preceding years, no just suspicion can be admitted against the lease: but fraud and collusion may be presumed, if a reduction of rent have been conceded to a tenant in possession, or a lease have been granted to a new tenant, for a less rent than has been most accustomarily paid within the last three years.

In cases where pottahs are set aside or cancelled under rules above quoted, as well as in other similar instances, it is provided, that the rent or revenue to be demanded shall be determined by the rates and usages of the pergunnah or district, and the Ryot is entitled to require a renewal of his pottah upon those terms. This would be very unexceptionable, if, as is here supposed by the Regulations, the proportion of annual produce, in money or in kind, constituting the revenue demandable as the due of Government, could be with certainty determined, and if the rent which the landlord may properly ask, according to the established rates and usages of the pergunnah, were accurately ascertainable; for the interests of the cultivator and tenant would be sufficiently protected and secured, and the established rules and rates of the pergunnah, according to which he is pronounced entitled to demand the renewal of the lease, and according to which the courts of justice are required to decide disputes arising between landlord and tenant, were either known or ascertainable.

Orig.

But there is reason to presume that the pergunnah rules are become very uncertain.

In several cases of magnitude, which were perseveringly contested by the parties, it appeared, from proceedings which came before the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut while I sat in that court, that in a district and province in which dependent talooks are particularly numerous, no rule of adjustment could be described, after the most patient inquiry conducted by a very intelligent public officer. From the proceedings held, in numerous other cases, in the courts of justice, justice, the same conclusion may be drawn, respecting the relative situations of Ryots and Zemindars in most districts.

In some, indeed, a rule of adjustment may still be found in full force and actual operation. The Regulations of Benares have maintained the table of rates of 1187 fusily, and the Canongoe office yet exists in that province for its preservation. In the vicinity of Calcutta, the Ryots have been, I understand, supported by the decision of adawluts in their pretensions to hold their lands upon the rents payable by them, or by the persons whose representatives they are, according to the best general measurement which was undertaken by the authority of Government, before the permanent settlement, and of which the record is understood to be preserved in the office of the Collector of the Twenty-four Pergunnahs.

Other instances may exist, but they are few: and the position, as a general one, is unquestionably true, that there is actually no sufficient evidence of the rates and usages of pergunnahs, which can now be appealed to for the decision of the questions between landholder and Ryot.

I apprehend, that when the Regulations in question were framed, no distinct notions were formed of the pergunnah rates and established usages referred to: at least it is evident, that several passages in the Regulations, where reference is made to such rates and usages, were not exactly applicable to the state of the things which then existed. Possibly it may have been owing to caution, suggested by feelings of doubt on that subject, that the Regulations every where look to the courts of justice for the determination of all disputes between landlord and tenant, without providing definite rules for the court's guidance; while, on the other hand, the courts of justice have, in general, and of late years especially, looked to the Regulations alone for rules of decision, without entering into tedious, and possibly vain researches into local usages.

In this state of matters, it would be better to abrogate most of the laws in favour of the Ryot, and leave him, for a certain period to be specified, under no other protection for his tenure than the specific terms of the lease which he may then hold, than to uphold the illusory expectation of protection under laws which are nearly ineffectual. The tenant might thus be rendered sensible of the necessity of obtaining a definite lease from the landlord, and would find it his interest to require such a lease, on the condition of his persisting in the culture of the lands: the landholder would equally find it necessary to grant definite leases, to induce the Ryot to continue the cultivation of the ground. The parties would be thus compelled to come to an understanding; and this result would, on every consideration, be preferable to the present state of uncertainty, which naturally leads to oppression, fraud, and endless litigation.

But if it be thought expedient, in place of abrogating the laws which were enacted for the protection of the tenantry, and especially of the khode-khoost Ryot, or resident cultivator, that the right of occupancy, which those laws were intended to uphold, should be still maintained, and that the Ryot should be supported in his ancient and undoubted privilege of retaining the ground occupied by him, so long as he pays the rent justly demandable for it, measures should be adopted, late as it now is, to reduce to writing a clear declaration and distinct record of the usages and rates, according to which the Ryots of each pergunnah or district will be entitled to demand the renewal of their pottahs, upon any occasion of a general or partial cancelling of leases.

I had it, at one time, under consideration, to propose a plan for the preparation of such records, under the superintendence of the Revenue officers, assisted by the Canongoe office, to be re-established for that and for other purposes, and in communication and concert with the Zemindars and principal Ryots of each pergunnah, and I had made a considerable progress towards maturing the plan of this great undertaking: but after much consultation with the late Acting President of the Board of Revenue (Mr. Crisp) and with other experienced and well-informed officers of the Revenue department, I have been diverted from this project, by the apprehension that the intelligence and activity requisite for the due superintendance of its execution within each zillah are not to be universally nor generally expected; and that, if it were ill performed, formed, it might, not improbably, add to the subsisting evils, instead of remedying them.

Upon the maturest deliberation on this difficult and intricate subject, I am compelled, however reluctantly, to relinquish the idea of restoring a definite and certain standard, to which appeal may be made for determining the rights of persons having dependent and subordinate tenures under landholders in chief, and for settling the disputes and questions which arise between them.

Abandoning this idea, and apprehensive that an entire alteration of the provisions of existing laws, however inefficient, which suppose such a standard, may be productive of alarm, at least, if not serious and real evil, to the tenantry of the country, by abridging privileges of which they yet have an imperfect enjoyment, I shall content myself with merely proposing, that provision shall be made, by Regulation, for cases where the pergunnah rates are not ascertainable, which should regulate the pottahs of khode-khoost Ryots, or of other persons entitled to a renewal of their leases. This will silently substitute a new and definite rule, in place of ancient but uncertain usages.

The following are the rules which I should propose with these views:

1st. In any instance where a khode-khoost Ryot, or other occupant or tenant, may be entitled, under the existing Regulations, to receive a renewed pottah, in consequence of the cancelling of former pottahs by reason of a public sale for the recovery of arrears of revenue, or in consequence of any other circumstance rendering requisite the renewing of pottahs, according to the state of the pergunnah, as well as in every case in which the landholder, farmer, or manager, or other person in charge of the collections, is authorized to collect according to the rates of the pergunnah, in place of subsisting engagements, if, in any such case or instance, it shall not appear that established rates are known in the pergunnah or other local division within which the land is situated, or if these rates shall not be ascertainable, owing to long disuse or insufficient evidence of them, then and in every such instance the renewed pottah shall be granted and the collections made, in the case of an individual Ryot or tenant, at such rate or rates, as near as may be, of the same quantity in the vicinity: but, in the case of cancelling, generally, the pottahs of the Ryots and tenants of a whole estate, or of an entire mouza or other local division of the country, the new pottahs shall be granted, and collections made, at rates not exceeding the highest rate paid for the same lands in any one year, within the period of three years last past, antecedently to the date of cancelling pottahs.

2d. In the case of a dependent Talookdar, if the rent of the land be computed according to the rates payable by Ryots or cultivators for land of similar quality and description, a deduction shall be allowed from the gross rent, on the adjustment of the jumma of such dependent talook, at the rate of ten per cent. from the Talookdar's profit or income, over and above a reasonable allowance for charges of collection, according to the extent of the talook.

In regard to the annulment of leases, or presumption of fraud or collusion, I have already stated the rule which I think should be adopted as to that point. In respect to the more extensive power of annulling all leases when lands are sold for arrears of public revenue, and still more generally, the landholder's right, however vested in him or from whatever cause arising, of enhancing the rent payable by a Ryot or occupant, I am of opinion that further provision should be made for the security of the tenant, in addition to, or amendment of, the existing rule; that pottahs shall not be cancelled before the close of the year, in consequence of a sale taking place subsequently to the second month of the year.

The principle on which the amendment I mean to propose will be founded, is that of a tenant's not being liable to pay a quarter's rent more than he had reason to expect he should be subject to, when he entered on the cultivation of the land, for the crop of the current season. Whether his lease has even expired, or were on any account voidable, if he has been, nevertheless, allowed to commence the cultivation of the ground, at the expense of his money and of his labour, without notice of an enhanced rent, he cannot justly be chargeable with a higher rent than that borne by his former lease, or usually paid by him.

him. More he could not expect would be demanded from him; and if more be exacted, it is a surprise little short of fraud, since he has been deluded into the expenditure of capital and the employment of labour, in the confidence of being only subject to the former rent, and has not had the opportunity of choosing between the relinquishment of the land and the payment of the enhanced rent required of him.

It should, therefore, in my opinion, be made an universal rule, that no cultivator or tenant of land shall be liable to pay an enhanced rent, though subject to enhancement under subsisting regulations; nor any landholder, or renter, or sequestrator, have power to demand it, unless written engagements for such enhanced rent have been entered into by the parties, or formal written notices have been served on such cultivator or tenant at the season of cultivation, viz. in the month of Jeth (or earlier in districts where the cultivation for the year commences at an earlier period), notifying the specific rent, under the landlord's right of enhancing it, to which he will be subject for the ensuing fusly or for the current Bengal year.

Unless the due service of such notification be proved, no greater rent should be exigible by process of distress or confinement of person, nor recoverable by suit in court, than the cultivator or tenant was bound to pay by his previous engagements; and if more be levied from him, he should be entitled to a refund of the excess with damages, on proof of the circumstances before a court of justice.

In the rules here proposed, I have assumed the month of Jeth as a season of cultivation, that being the period at which cultivation is reckoned to commence in the districts which compute by the fusly era. It is, I believe, sufficiently early for the Bengal districts also; and, in that case, the indefinite clause which has been inserted may be omitted, for the very desirable purpose of certainty and precision, which will be best attained by restricting the period of notice to the single month specified.

Another part of the subsisting revenue Regulations, which appears to need amendment, is that which relates to the form of leases, and which annuls such engagements as may not be drawn in prescribed form.

Before the enactment of the Regulations connected with the permanent settlement of the land revenues of Bengal, a practice prevailed among landholders in this province, of imposing on their Ryots arbitrary cesses, termed abwab, being either authorized so to do by reservations in the pottahs to subject the Ryots to such abwab as might be imposed on the pergunnah generally, or else assuming that authority without the sanction of any such reservations in the leases of their tenants.

Regulation VIII, 1793, Section 55.

Regulation VIII, 1793, Section 54; and Regulation XXVII, 1803, Section 53, Clause 12.

Regulation VIII, 1793, Sections 58 and 59; and Regulation IV, 1794, Sections 5 and 6.

To protect the peasantry from such arbitrary exactions, which had been the source of grievous oppressions and of gross abuses, the Regulations of the permanent settlement provided, that no new abwab should be imposed on any pretence, under penalty of three times the amount; that the landholders, in concert with their tenants, should revise the abwabs and consolidate them with the land-rents; that they should give or tender to the Ryot, pottahs prepared according to form previously prepared by the Collector and registered in the adawlut. These rules are enforced by a provision, that pottahs of any other form are to be held invalid.

Notwithstanding the penalty which was expected to enforce universal compliance, by rendering the written engagements of landlord and tenant void and of no effect, if there be a deviation from the prescribed forms, there is reason to believe that little progress has been really made, towards the general introduction of the simple and definite leases which it was thus intended to enforce.

But whether generally or partially successful, or wholly ineffectual, that penalty ought, I think, to be now rescinded. There is no longer any sufficient motive for holding the landholders and tenantry of the country in this sort of pupillage, prescribing to them the manner and form of their reciprocal engagements.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

ments. They may be safely left to consult their mutual interests, by entering into such agreements as they may consider to be for their benefit respectively, and to reduce their agreements into writing, in any form most intelligible and satisfactory to themselves, or in their conviction most binding and secure. All that need be required is, that the engagements shall be definite : and it may be accordingly declared, that any clause of a lease and other engagements, reserving the power of imposing cesses or taxes, termed abwab or mut hote, or under any other denomination whatsoever, or binding the pottah holders to pay any impost or addition whatsoever beyond the rent, however regulated in money or kind which the pottah or engagement specifies, shall be void and of no effect; and the courts shall maintain the remaining definite clauses, and enforce payment of such rent, and such only, as is specifically stipulated and agreed for by the pottah or other engagement.

Under this alteration of the existing rules, the courts of justice will give effect to the agreements of the parties according to their ascertained intentions; with exception only to stipulations subjecting one of the parties to arbitrary demands at the will of the other. This exception, together with the prohibition actually in force against the imposition of any arbitrary cesses or abwab, under whatever pretence, will entirely preclude the renewal of those oppressions and abuses which the Regulations I have proposed to modify were designed to prevent.

With great deference I submit these suggestions concerning the rules affecting leases or engagements between landlords and tenants. The other topics, referred to in the beginning of this minute, are necessarily deferred, until the receipt of the information which has been called for by the Board of Revenue from the Collectors, respecting the operation of the existing laws for distress, and summary process for the recovery of arrears of rent. I shall hereafter submit my sentiments on those subjects in a separate form.

RESOLUTION.—The Governor-General in Council is pleased to pass the following Regulation, which he directs to be printed and published, in the manner prescribed by Regulation XLI, 1793.

A.D. 1803. REGULATION XXIX.

A Regulation for defining the Duties of the Putwarries, in the Provinces ceded by the Nawaub Vizier to the Honourable the English East-India Company.— Passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 24th March 1803; corresponding with the 12th Choite 1209 Bengal era; the 16th Choite 1210 Fusily; the 12th Choite 1210 Willaity; the 16th Choite 1860 Sumbut; and the 29th Zekaad 1217 Higeree.

Regulation XXIX, A.D. 1803.

Preamble.

WHEREAS the landholders and farmers, in the provinces ceded to the Honourable the English East-India Company by the Nawaub Vizier, with whom a triennial settlement of the land revenue was concluded in the fusily year 1210, under the conditions published by the Honourable the late Lieutenant-Governor and the Board of Commissioners, on the 14th July 1802, and recapitulated in Section 53 of Regulation XXVII, 1803, have engaged, by their cabooleats, to produce to the officers of Government the real and authentic papers and accounts of their estates and farms, without reserve or concealment, for the purpose of determining the amount of the assessment to be fixed on their estates and farms, at the expiration of the fusily years 1212 and 1213, respectively; and whereas the actual accounts of rent demandable from, and paid by, the Ryots, or other under-tenants, may be required to facilitate the decision of suits in the courts of judicature, between proprietors and farmers of lands and persons paying rent to them, as well as to guard against any diminution nution of the revenue payable to Government, or injustice to individuals, by enabling the Collectors to obtain the necessary information for allotting the public assessment upon estates that may be divided, agreeably to the principles prescribed in Regulation XXV, 1803; and whereas the establishment of courts of judicature, with powers to protect the landholders and farmers against all demands for revenues beyond the amount specified in their engagements, has removed every just ground of objection which they could entertain to the production of such accounts, when required for the purposes stated; the following rules have been enacted, to be in force from the period of the promulgation of this Regulation.

Regulation XXIX, A. D. 1803.

Every proprietor and farmer, (with the exception specified in Section 4), to appoint a Putwarry to keep the accounts in each village

II. 1st. Every proprietor and farmer of land (with the exception specified in Section 4 of this Regulation) who may not have established a Putwarry in each village, in his or her estate or farm, to keep an exact account of the lands, tenants, and rents thereof, shall immediately appoint a Putwarry in each village for that purpose. All proprietors and farmers of land are to deposit in the zillah court of adawlut, in the Collector's cutcherry, and in the principal cutcherry in each mehaul or pergunnah, a list of the Putwarries in their respective estates or farms, and the names of the villages, the accounts of which they may be severally appointed to keep. The proprietors and farmers are to notify, every three months, to the court and the Collector, all vacancies which may occur, and the names of the persons whom they may appoint to fill them. The Board of Revenue are empowered to authorize any proprietor or farmer to reduce the number of Putwarries, in such proportion as they may think proper, in cases in which it may appear to them unnecessary to entertain a separate Putwarry for each village.

The Board of Revenue may authorize proprietors and farmers to reduce the number of Putwarries.

Putwarries to produce all accounts required by the courts of judicature,

2d. The Putwarries in every estate and farm shall produce all accounts relating to the lands, produce, rents, collections, and charges of the village or villages, the accounts of which may be kept by them respectively, and to furnish every information and explanation regarding them, whenever they may be required, by any court of justice, to adjust any suit which may be depending before the court, between the proprietor or farmer of the estate, and the Ryots, or other persons paying rent to them, or for the adjustment of any other suit whatever.

and also for the allotment of the public revenue, in the cases herein specified, when required by the Collectors.

3d. The Putwarries in each estate and farm shall also produce the accounts specified in the preceding clause, and furnish every explanation and information that may be required respecting them, for the allotment of the public revenue, agreeably to the principles laid down in Regulation XXV, 1803, in the event of the whole or any portion of the estates being directed to be disposed of at public sale, or being transferred by any private act of the proprietor or proprietors, or of the estate being ordered to be divided, pursuant to a decree of a court of judicature, or where it may be a joint estate, in consequence of the request of one or more of the proprietors. The Putwarries shall also obey all requisitions from the Collectors for the accounts kept by them, and for any information relative thereto, in the cases of attachment provided for by Clause 4 of Section 15, Regulation XXVII, 1803, as well as in all cases of a khas collection by the Tehsildar, or other officer of Government; and in the instances noticed in the preamble to this Regulation, wherein the landholders and farmers have engaged to produce the accounts of their estates and farms, for the purpose of ascertaining the proper assessment to be hereafter fixed thereupon. But no Collector is to require a Putwarry to attend him, and produce his accounts, except for the purposes above-mentioned, or in any other cases in which they may be expressly empowered to require them, by any Regulation printed and published in the manner directed in Regulation I, 1803. If any Collector shall require the Putwarry of any village or villages to attend him and produce the village accounts, for purposes, or in cases in which he may not be authorized to inspect them, the court of adawlut, upon the circumstances being represented to it by the proprietor or farmer of the estate, is empowered to make an order to prohibit the Collector requiring the accounts; and, in the event of his repeating the requisition, to adjudge him to pay a fine to the proprietor or farmer of the estate, of such sum as to the court may appear proper, and to levy the fine in the mode in which the courts are empowered empowered to levy fines from the Collectors in the suits described in Section 36, Regulation XXVII, 1803.

How the Collector and the courts are to compel the attendance of Putwarries.

4th. When a Collector shall require the attendance of a Putwarry for the examination of his accounts, either before him, or before any officer whom he may depute for the purpose, he is to serve such Putwarry with a written notice, under his official signature and the seal of the zillah, to attend with the accounts required, which are to be particularized in the notice. If the Putwarry shall omit to attend with the accounts by the limited time, and shall not show good cause to the Collector for the omission, the Collector is authorized to represent the circumstances, through the Vakeel of Government, to the court of adawlut of the zillah, the Judge of which, provided there shall appear to him sufficient cause for so doing, may order such Putwarry to be committed to close custody, until he produces the accounts. The courts are to observe the same process with Putwarries who may omit to attend with their accounts, when required, for the adjustment of any matter or dispute depending before the courts.

Putwarries shall be required to swear to the truth of their accounts.

5th. Putwarries shall be required to swear to the truth of the accounts they may produce, when deemed necessary; and in the event of the Collector having occasion to proceed in person, or to depute an officer, to examine any village accounts on the spot, the Judge, upon application being made to him for that purpose by the Collector, through the Vakeel of Government, may grant him, or to such officer, a commission to swear the several Putwarries whose accounts are to be inspected, inserting in the commission the name of each Putwarry to be sworn. If the Collector shall have occasion to examine the accounts of a Putwarry at the station at which the court may be established, he is to cause him to be sworn before the court, if he shall judge it necessary to require him to make oath to the truth of his accounts.

Putwarries liable to be dismissed from office, and to be prosecuted criminally, for swearing to false accounts in a court of judicature,

6th. If a Putwarry shall have sworn to the truth of any accounts which he may have been required to produce before a court of justice, for the purpose of deciding any matter before the court, and the accounts shall afterwards be found to have been fabricated or altered, or not to be the true accounts, the Judge of the court is empowered to order the immediate dismission from office of the Putwarry so offending, and to commit him to be tried for perjury before the court of circuit.

or before the Collector or his officer.

7th. If a Putwarry shall have been sworn before a Judge, or before a Collector or the officer of a Collector, to any accounts which he may have been required to produce before the Collector or his officer, in a case in which the Collector may have been empowered to require him to produce such accounts, and the accounts shall have afterwards appeared to have been fabricated or altered, or not to be the true accounts, the Collector is empowered to employ the Vakeel of Government to prosecute such Putwarry for perjury; and if it appear to the zillah Magistrate that there is sufficient ground for the charge, he shall, at the time of committing the offender for trial before the court of circuit, order his immediate dismission from office. In the cases specified in this and the preceding clause, if it shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the court of circuit, that the accounts were fabricated, altered, or changed, by the orders, or with the knowledge or connivance of the proprietor or farmer of the estate, the court shall impose such fine upon the proprietor or farmer so offending, as may appear to it proper, upon a consideration of the case, and the situation and circumstances of the offender: and whenever a Putwarry shall be dismissed, under this Regulation, from the service of the party employing him, such party shall be positively prohibited from again employing the offender, under whatever penalty the court dismissing him may judge it proper to fix, on consideration of the circumstances of the case.

Punishment for proprietors or farmers concerned in falsifying the accounts.

How proprietors or farmers, omitting to appoint Putwarries, are to be proceeded against.

8th. Upon the accounts of any village being ordered to be produced, if it shall be found that no Putwarry has been appointed, in conformity to the rule prescribed in Clause 1 of this section, and it be a case in which the requisition of the accounts is authorized, the zillah court shall fine the proprietor or farmer, for the first offence, in such sum as it may judge proper, upon a consideration of his or her situation and circumstances, and the nature of the case; for the second offence, twice the amount of the fine for the first; and for the third and every every subsequent offence, double the amount of the fine for the preceding one. If the accounts shall have been required by the Collector, he is to order the Vakeel of Government to sue the proprietor or farmer, on the part of Government, under this section, for a breach of the rule in Clause 1.

Regulation XXIX, A. D. 1803.

III. 1st. The rules contained in the preceding section are hereby declared equally applicable to dependant talooks, as to estates paying revenue, through the channel of a Tehsildar, or immediately to Government.

The rules contained in the preceding section declared applicable to dependant talooks,

2d. All the rules prescribed in this Regulation, respecting village Putwarries, are further hereby declared to be applicable to all other descriptions of native agents employed by the landholders and farmers in the management of their estates and farms, or in keeping any accounts of their lands, rents, receipts, or disbursements. If any such agent shall be convicted in the zillah court of having collusively fabricated or altered the accounts delivered by him, or of having wilfully delivered any other than the true accounts, the offender, besides the punishment for perjury to which he will be liable under Clauses 6 and 7 of Section 2 of this Regulation, shall be subject to dismission from the service of the party employing him, by order of the court; and such party shall be positively prohibited from again employing the offender, under whatever penalty the court may think proper to fix, upon consideration of the circumstances of the case.

and to all native agents employed by landholders in the management of their estates.

Punishment for any native agent convicted of altering accounts, or not delivering true ones.

IV. Nothing contained in this Regulation shall, however, be understood to require the proprietors or farmers of small estates, who may superintend their own lands or farms, and who shall be unable to afford the expense of a Putwarry, to appoint officers of this description, for the purposes mentioned in Section 2; but, in such cases, the proprietors and farmers themselves, when required, are to furnish the accounts and information specified in that section, in like manner as the Putwarries are required to furnish the same, and under the same provisions.

Nothing in this Regulation to be understood as extending to small estates managed by the proprietor.

A. D. 1811. REGULATION IX.

A Regulation for facilitating the Division of landed Property and for securing the Rights of joint Sharers in joint undivided Estates.—Passed by the Vice-President in Council, on the 30th July 1811; corresponding with the 16h Sawun 1218 Bengal era; the 24th Sawun 1218 Fusily; the 17th Sawun 1218 Waillaity; the 10th Sawun 1868 Sumbut; and the 8th Rajeeb 1226 Higeree.

Regulation IX, A. D. 1811.

WHEREAS the interest and welfare of the landholders require that the division of portions of estates should be easily effected, and whereas the rules hitherto enacted, with a view to the accomplishment of that object, have been found insufficient; the Vice-President in Council has been pleased to pass the following rules, to be in force from the period of their promulgation, in the districts subject to the control of the Board of Commissioners.

Preamble.

II. Any Putteedar or sharer of a joint undivided estate, having the exclusive and acknowledged right to, and possession of, one or more distinct village or villages in such estate, shall be at liberty, under the following reservations and exceptions, to cause the said village or villages to be separated from the general estate; and the jumma of such village or villages shall be allotted after an exact measurement of the lands comprised therein, by deducting from the gross produce thereof an allowance, according to circumstances, from five to ten per cent., for the expense of management, and ten per cent. of the net income of the proprietor, leaving the remainder as the jumma of Government. Provided always, that the quantity of land in actual cultivation at the time of separation be not less than five-sixths of the land capable of tillage in the said village or villages, and that no objection be offered to the fairness and adequacy of the assessment on the part of the other sharers, in the general estate of which such village or villages formed a part.

Rules under which Putteedars or sharers of undivided estates, having the acknowledged right and possession of villages, may cause a separation thereof from the general estate.

III. The account of the measurement directed in the preceding section shall exhibit the whole of the actual gross produce of the lands, and shall be formed under

What the accounts of the measurement shall contain, and how they are to be prepared and disposed of.

Regulation IX, A. D. 1812.

under the immediate superintendence of the Collector. The original thereof shall be attested by the proprietor requiring the separation, the Putwarry of the village, the Mirdahs, Canongoes, and Tehsildars of the pergunnah. Copies of all such measurements shall be kept in the office of the Canongoes, and annually bound in a book, to be attested with the official seal and signature of the Collector, and then returned to those officers for deposit among their records.

How the expense of the measurement is to be defrayed.

IV. The measurement directed in Section 2, shall be made entirely at the expense of the party requiring the division; and the rules laid down in Regulation V, 1810, as far as they regard the mode of payment of persons employed in dividing lands, are to be applied to this case.

How Putteedars possessing a defined share in an undivided estate may procure a separate allotment of the proportional jumma.

V. Any Putteedar in the actual possession and occupancy of a defined share in a joint undivided estate (whether such share be defined by a specific quantity of land, or a specified fractional part of a rupee, or of a begah) who may be desirous of having a separate allotment made of the proportional jumma, to which he would be liable in the proportion of his interest in the estate, shall be at liberty to prefer to the Collector an application to this effect, and the Collector, on receipt thereof, shall proceed to allot the separate assessment of such share in the mode prescribed by Section 2, for the allotment of entire villages. Provided however, that if the specific interest of the party in the estate shall be disputed by the other sharers, no separate allotment shall take place until his specific interest shall have been ascertained by award of arbitration, as provided in a subsequent part of this Regulation for claimants not in possession, or by the decree of a court of judicature.

Rules in the case of all the occupant Putteedars desiring or consenting to an allotment of the jumma on their respective shares.

VI. Whenever all the occupant Putteedars of a joint undivided estate shall desire or consent to an allotment of the jumma on the shares in their respective occupancy, and shall deliver to the Collector, in writing, a petition signed by the whole of them, containing a statement of the proportional allotment affixed by themselves on each share, it shall be competent to the Collector, with the approbation of the Board of Commissioners, after having satisfied himself, by minute and accurate inquiry, that the statement in question is the bonâ fide declaration of the subscribing parties, that the signatures are voluntary and authentic, and that Government is not liable to suffer in its interests by the measure, to take separate engagements for each puttee from the owner thereof as a distinct proprietor, at the jumma so fixed by the Putteedars conjointly; and no non-occupant Putteedar shall be entitled afterwards to assent to, or dissent from, the allotment.

Rules in the case of such Putteedars desiring an allotment but not agreeing as to their respective proportions.

VII. Whenever all the occupant Putteedars of a joint undivided estate shall desire such an allotment, but may not agree among themselves in regard to their respective proportions of the jumma so to be allotted, the Collector, on receipt of an application to that effect under the seals or signatures of the whole of such Putteedars, and after satisfying himself of the voluntary concurrence of all the subscribing parties, shall proceed to allot the proportional jumma of each respective share, by causing an actual and exact measurement to be made of the entire estate and of each share, by an Aumeen to be deputed for the purpose, or by the Tehsildar, Canongoes, and Mirdahs of the pergunnah; and the expense of such measurement shall be defrayed by all the Putteedars in the proportion of their respective interests.

Rules as to the conduct of such allotment.

VIII. The Board of Commissioners shall instruct the Collectors, from time to time, as to the mode by which the duties directed in the preceding sections may be best conducted; and all divisions and allotments made under these rules shall be recorded in the Canongoe's office, and attested by the parties and by the local mofussil officers, in the same manner as is directed by Section 3, in regard to the measurement of distinct villages. It is moreover to be understood, that all the provisions of the existing Regulations, in regard to Aumeens deputed by a Collector, shall be held applicable to Aumeens deputed under Sections 2, 5, and 7, of the present Regulation.

No division or allotment to be valid until sanctioned by the Board of Commissioners, and Government may revise the assessment within

IX. No division of a share in an estate or allotment of jumma therein shall be considered valid, until expressly sanctioned by the Board of Commissioners; and the Governor-General in Council reserves to himself the power of revising the assessments made under Sections 2, 5, 6, and 7, at any time within the period riod of ten years after the making thereof, on proof to his satisfaction of fraud, collusion, or gross error.

ten years in certain cases.

Rules in cases of persons not in possession, claiming to be Putteedars.

X. Any person claiming to be a Putteedar or joint sharer in an estate, but not having actual possession of any specific portion thereof, shall be at liberty to prefer his claim before the Collector, who will thereupon serve on the party or parties, who have engaged for the estate in proprietary right, a written notice, setting forth the claim, and calling upon such party or parties for an admission or denial of the claim; and if the said party or parties admit, by a writing authenticated by his or their seal or signature, and attested by the Canongoes, the right of the claimant to a specific portion of the estate, it shall be competent to the Collector to give the claimant possession of such specific portion, and to proceed to a separate allotment of the jumma of such portion, under the provisions of Sections 2 or 5 of this Regulation, according as such portion may consist either of one or more distinct village or villages, or of a defined share in the entire estate.

Rules in the event of such claims being denied or disputed.

XI. In the event of the claim being denied, or the specific interest of the claimant being disputed, the Collector shall recommend to the several parties to submit the matter in dispute to the arbitration of three or more of the neighbouring Zemindars, assisted by the Canongoes of the pergunnah; and on the parties consenting to appoint arbitrators, it shall be competent to the Collector to tender to the parties for execution arbitration bonds in the form prescribed by Regulation XXI, 1803; and on the due execution of the arbitration bonds by the parties, to refer the matter for decision to the arbitrators; and all the provisions of the said Regulation shall be applicable to awards given by arbitrators appointed under this section. Provided however, that if either party refuse to concur in submitting the matter to arbitration, the claimant shall be left to prosecute his claim by regular suit in the courts of judicature.

What the award or decree in such cases shall contain, and how to be carried into effect.

XII. The arbitrators in all cases referred to them for amicable adjustment under the foregoing section, and the courts of judicature in all suits for putteedaree shares of an estate, shall make it a rule, on giving a decision in favour of the claimant, to specify in the award or decree the precise share to which the claimant may be entitled, whether it consist of one or more distinct village or villages, or of a defined portion of the general estate. The Collector, on production of such award or decree, shall proceed to the separate allotment of the jumma of the share thus awarded or decreed under the provisions of Sections 2 or 5 of this Regulation, according as they may be respectively applicable to the case.

The shares after the separate allotment shall not be liable for any arrears, except such as may accrue on its separate proportion of the jumma.

XIII. After the separate allotment of the jumma upon any one or more share or shares of an estate, or upon all the shares of an estate, shall have been made in conformity to the provisions of Sections 2, 5, 6, or 7, of this Regulation, according as the provisions of either may be applicable to the case, and shall have been confirmed by the Board of Commissioners under Section 9, the share or shares upon which a separate proportion of the general jumma may have been so allotted shall not be held liable for any default or arrear of revenue, except such as may accrue on the separate proportion of jumma thus allotted upon such share or shares. And in the event of its being necessary to have recourse to a sale of lands for the recovery of any arrear of revenue due from such an estate, the share or shares, from which the arrear may be due, shall alone be liable to be sold.

Board of Commissioners may in certain cases authorize a conditional transfer of defaulting shares.

XIV. In consideration of the peculiar nature of the putteedaree tenures to which this Regulation is meant to apply, it is hereby declared, that whenever the Board of Commissioners shall deem it expedient not to proceed to the absolute sale of such defaulting share, it shall be competent to the said Board to authorize a conditional transfer of such share to the proprietor of any other share of the same general estate, by way of mortgage or conditional sale, for the amount of the arrear, or of such portion of it as may be equal to the value of the defaulter's share, or with a reservation for a further payment to the owner, if the value of the share, in the Board's judgment, exceed the amount of the arrears: and the defaulting proprietor or proprietors of the share so transferred, and his or their legal representative or representatives, shall be entitled to reclaim possession of such share or shares, on repayment of the consideration sideration for which it may have been so transferred, with legal interest, at any time within five years from the date of the transfer.

Rules as to tenders of repayment under such conditional transfers.

XV. If the person to whom such defaulting share shall have been so transferred shall, on tender of repayment before two competent witnesses, refuse to accept the same and to surrender possession of the land, the party tendering it shall be at liberty to deposit the amount in the zillah court, and the Judge shall, on such deposit being made, proceed as is directed by Regulation XXXIV, 1803, in regard to the redemption of conditional sales by the act of the party. If payment of the principal and interest shall not be tendered within five years, the puttee will of course become the bonâ fide property of the mortgagee.

Deposit to be made with the Collector before any final process for division or allotment shall issue.

XVI. No final process shall issue from the Collector's office for the actual division of lands or allotment of jumma under any of the rules contained in this Regulation, until the parties soliciting such division or allotments shall have deposited with the Collector a fee equal to one per cent. on the estimated gross produce of the land so to be divided, as soon as the same may have been ascertained, according to the provisions applicable under this Regulation to the case of such division or allotment.

How such deposit is to be appropriated.

XVII. The fee required in the preceding section shall be annually accounted for to the Board of Commissioners, who will, after inspecting the annual register directed to be prepared by Section 3, of this Regulation, direct its appropriation to the benefit of the native officers, in such proportions as may appear proper, on a due consideration of the accuracy and industry of those officers in preparing the register, and the general execution of the duties prescribed for facilitating the division of landed property.

These rules not to prevent persons availing themselves of the provisions of Regulation V, 1810

XVIII. Nothing contained in the foregoing rules shall be construed to prevent persons availing themselves of the provisions contained in Regulation V, 1810, in cases in which they may not wish to apply for and obtain a separation of their puttees or shares under the present Regulation, or in cases in which this Regulation may not be applicable.

A.D. 1812. REGULATION V.

A Regulation for amending some of the Rules at present in force for the Collection of the Land Revenue.—Passed by the Governor-General in Council, on the 1st May 1812; corresponding with the 20th Bysaak 1219 Bengal era; the 5th Bysaak 1219 Fusily; the 21st Bysaak 1219 Willaity; the 5th Bysaak 1869 Sumbut; and the 18th Rubbi-us-Sanee 1227 Higeree.

Regulation V, A.D. 1812.

Preamble.

Whereas it has been deemed advisable to revise the rules established regarding the grant of pottahs by the proprietors of land paying revenue to Government, to their tenants, and also the rates at which persons purchasing land at the public sales are entitled to collect their rents; and whereas there are grounds to believe that considerable abuses and oppression have been committed by Zemindars, Talookdars, and farmers of land, in the exercise of the powers vested in them, with respect to the distress and sale of the property of their tenants for the recovery of arrears of rent; and circumstances having occurred which render it necessary to explain the real intent and meaning of the existing rules regarding the sale of estates for the recovery of arrears of public assessment; and whereas it has been deemed expedient to annul the existing provisions for levying, in certain cases, a penalty of twelve per cent. in addition to the established interest on arrears due from the proprietors and farmers of estates, and at the same time to provide more generally for the levy of such interest; the following rules have been passed, to be in force on their promulgation throughout the provinces immediately dependent on the presidency of Fort William.

Rules contained in Section 2, Regulation XLIV, 1793; Section 2, Regulation L, 1795, and Clause 2d, Section 2, Regulation XLVII, 1803, precluding proprietors of

II. Section 2, Regulation XLIV, 1793; Section 2, Regulation L, 1795; and Clause 2d, Section 2, Regulation XLVII, 1803, by which the proprietors of land paying revenue to Government are precluded from granting leases for a period exceeding ten years, are hereby rescinded; and proprietors of lands are are declared competent to grant leases for any period which they may deem most convenient to themselves and tenants, and most conducive to the improvement of their estates.

lands paying revenue to Government, from granting leases for a longer period than ten years, rescinded.

III. Such parts of Regulation VIII, 1793, and of Regulation IV, 1794, as require that the proprietors of land shall prepare forms of pottahs, and that such forms shall be revised by the Collectors, and which declare that engagements for rent contracted in any other mode than that prescribed by the Regulations in question shall be deemed to be invalid, are likewise hereby rescinded: and the proprietors of land shall henceforward be considered competent to grant leases to their dependent Talookdars, under-farmers, and Ryots, and to receive correspondent engagements for the payment of rent from each of those classes, or any other classes of tenants, according to such form as the contracting parties may deem most convenient and most conducive to their respective interests: Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to sanction or legalize the imposition of arbitrary or indefinite cesses, whether under the denomination of abwaub, muthote, or any other denomination. All stipulations or reservations of that nature shall be adjudged by the courts of judicature to be null and void; but the courts shall, notwithstanding, maintain and give effect to the definite clauses of the engagements contracted between the parties, or in other words, enforce payment of such sums as may have been specifically agreed upon between them.

Certain parts of Regulation VIII, 1793, and Regulation IV, 1794, respecting forms of pottahs and engagements for rent, rescinded, and proprietors declared competent to grant leases and receive engagements, in such forms as may be convenient to the parties

Such rule not to legalize stipulations for arbitrary or indefinite cesses, which are to be adjudged null and void, but without vitiating the definite clauses of the engagements.

IV. Section 5, Regulation XLIV, 1793; Section 5, Regulation L, 1795; and Section 5, Regulation XLVII, 1803, contain provisions for annulling, in the case of public sales, all engagements which may have been contracted between the proprietor of the lands and his under-tenants; and for empowering the purchaser to collect, according to the established usages and rates of the pergunnah or district in which the land may be sold. Clause 3d, Section 23, Regulation VII, 1799; Section 24, Regulation V, 1800; Section 9, Regulation I, 1801; Section 5, Regulation XLVII, 1803; at the same time contain provisions for suspending the annulment of leases, supposing the sale to have taken place after the expiration of the second month of the Bengal or fusily year, except in cases in which such leases may appear to the officers deputed to attach or manage them on the part of Government, or to the purchasers at the public sales, to be obviously collusive. In addition to these last-mentioned provisions, it is hereby declared, that neither any person deputed to attach lands on the part of Government, nor purchasers at the public sales, shall be deemed entitled to annul existing leases within the year in which the attachment or sale may have taken place, on the ground that such leases were evidently collusive, without a decision to that effect in a court of judicature; the case to be tried as a summary suit under Regulation VII, 1799.

No person attaching lands on the part of Government, or purchasing at public sales, entitled to annul existing leases within the year, on the grounds of collusion, without a judicial decision on summary suits.

V. By Section 5, Regulation XLIV, 1793; Section 5, Regulation L, 1795; and Section 5, Regulation XLVII, 1803, already cited, it is provided, that in cases in which leases may be cancelled on the occasion of public sales made for the recovery of arrears of assessment, the purchaser shall be entitled to collect, during the year in which the sale took place, whatever the former proprietor would have been entitled to receive, "according to the established usages and "rates of the pergunnah or district in which such lands may be situated." There being, however, reason to believe that the pergunnah rates are in many instances become very uncertain, the following rules shall be observed on all occasions of that nature.

Rules as to the rates at which purchasers of lands may collect during the year in which the sale takes place, in cases in which leases may be cancelled.

VI. If any known established pergunnah rates shall exist, the same shall serve to determine the amount of the rent which should be received by persons deputed to attach the lands on the part of Government, or by the purchasers at the public sales.

Established pergunnah rates, where such exist, shall determine the amount to be collected by Government officers or purchasers.

VII. In cases in which no established rates of the pergunnah, or local division of the country may be known, pottahs shall be granted, and the collections made, according to the rate payable for land of a similar description in the places adjacent; but if the leases and pottahs of the tenants of an estate generally, which may consist of an entire village or other local division, be liable to be cancelled under the rules above noticed, new pottahs shall be granted, and the collections made, at rates not exceeding the highest rate paid for the same land land in any one year within the period of the three last years antecedent to the period at which the leases may be cancelled.

Rules where no established pergunnah rates exist.

Regulation V, A. D. 1812.

What allowances to be made in computing the rates payable by Ryots, &c. in the case of dependent talooks.

VIII. In the case of a dependent Talookdar, if the rent of the lands be computed according to the rates payable by Ryots or cultivators for land of a similar quality and description, a deduction shall be allowed from the gross rent, in the adjustment of the jumma of such dependent talook, at the rate of ten per cent. for the Talookdar's profit or income, over and above a reasonable allowance for charges of collection, according to the extent of the talook.

No cultivator or tenant liable to pay enhanced rent, unless under written engagements, or notice served upon him at the season of cultivation.

IX. By the former and present Regulations, persons purchasing land at the public sales are competent, under certain restrictions, to annul engagements contracted between the late proprietor of the lands and his under-tenants. But it is hereby declared, that no cultivator or tenant of land shall be liable to pay an enhanced rent, though subject to enhancement under subsisting Regulations, unless written engagements for such enhanced rent have been entered into by the parties, or a formal written notice have been served on such cultivator or tenant at the season of cultivation (viz. on or before the month of Jeth), notifying the specific rent, under the landholder's right of enhancing it, to which he will be subject for the ensuing fusily, or for the current Bengal year.

Cultivator not served with such notice, entitled to a refund of any excess beyond the amount of his previous engagements.

X. Unless such notification be duly served, no greater rent shall be exigible by process of distress or confinement of person, nor recoverable by suit in court, than the cultivator or tenant was bound to pay under his previous engagements: and if more be levied from him, he shall be entitled to a refund of the excess with damages, on proof of the circumstances before a court of justice.

How such notices are to be served.

In all practicable cases, the required notification shall be served personally on the tenant: but if he shall abscond or conceal himself, so that it cannot be served personally upon him, it shall be affixed at his usual place of residence; which latter process shall, in such case, be deemed and taken to be a sufficient service of the notification in question.

The preceding provisions applicable to sequestrators, managers, and farmers holding under the authority of the Board of Revenue or Board of Commissioners.

XI. The provisions contained in the preceding sections shall be considered equally applicable to sequestrators on the part of Government, to managers on the part of the court of wards, and to farmers, whenever estates, or portions of estates, may be let to farm under the authority of the Board of Revenue or Board of Commissioners.

Rules respecting distress and sale for recovery of arrears, modified.

XII. The rules contained in the existing Regulations for the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares, and for the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, respecting distress and sale for the recovery of arrears of rent, are hereby declared subject to the following modifications.

No process for distress or sale to be legal, unless the tenant shall be served with a written demand, accompanied with a jumma wassil baukee.

XIII. Whenever any Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, or any person farming land directly from Government, shall be desirous of distraining the property of his tenant, with a view to the recovery of an arrear of rent, such Zemindar or other person shall, either previously or at the time of the distress, serve the said tenant with a written demand for the amount of it, accompanied with a jumma wassil baukee, exhibiting the grounds on which the demand is so made; and no process for the distress and sale of property on account of arrears of rent shall be deemed legal and valid, unless the rule here prescribed shall have been duly observed. In all practicable cases, the prescribed demand and jumma wassil baukee account shall be served personally on the tenant; but if he abscond or conceal himself, so that they cannot be served personally upon him, they shall be affixed at his usual place of residence; which latter process shall, in such case, be deemed and taken to be a sufficient service of the demand and account in question.

Ploughs, &c. and cattle employed in agriculture, not to be distrained or sold.

XIV. Ploughs and other implements of husbandry, bullocks, and other cattle employed in agriculture, together with the tools of artisans, shall not be subject to distress and sale on account of arrears of rent, although the tenant, from whom such arrears may be demanded, shall not possess other property sufficient to make good the arrear.

rent or revenue, and such tenant shall dispute the justness of the demand, and shall within five days, reckoning from the day following the attachment, or if the property attached consist of crops or rather ungathered products of the earth, within five days, calculating from the day following the date on which such crops or products may be stored, enter into a bond before the Judge or Collector of the zillah, the Cauzy of the pergunnah, the Commissioner, or other person vested with power to sell distrained property, or before the distrainer himself, with good security, binding himself to institute a suit in the dewanny adawlut of the zillah, within fifteen days from the date of such bond, for the trial of the demand, and to pay whatever sum may be adjudged to be due from him, with interest upon it at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, to be calculated from the date on which the arrear that may be awarded became payable to the date of the decree, with all costs of suit, the distrainer shall immediately withdraw the attachment and restore the property to the defaulter. If the stated defaulter shall fail to execute the bond within the period prescribed, the distrainer shall be at liberty to keep the property under attachment, and to cause it to be sold in the manner hereafter directed, unless the arrear, with the expenses of the attachment, shall be discharged previously to the day of sale. If the defaulter shall execute the bond, but omit to institute the suit in the dewanny adawlut, within the time prescribed, the distrainer shall demand payment of the arrear from the surety; and in the event of his not discharging the amount immediately, the distrainer shall be at liberty to issue an attachment against the personal property both of the surety and the defaulter, or the personal property of either of them, excepting always the articles specified in Section XIV. of this Regulation, and to cause it to be sold, unless the arrear and the expenses of the attachment shall be discharged previously to the day of sale.

curity, dispute the demand and enter into a bond with security, binding himself to institute a suit within fifteen days.

Attachment shall continue, and the property be sold, should the tenant fail to execute such bond or pay the arrears.

Should he execute the bond, but fail to institute a suit, his security may be proceeded against.

XVI. If an attachment for arrears shall have been issued against any tenant who may have given security for the payment of his rent or revenue, and such tenant shall dispute the justness of the demand, and the surety within five days, reckoning from the day following the day of the attachment, or if the property attached shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, within five days, calculating from the day following the date on which such crops or products may be stored, shall deliver a writing, attested by two witnesses, to the Judge of the dewanny adawlut, the Collector of the district, the Cauzy of the pergunnah, the Commissioner or other person vested with power to sell distrained property, or to the distrainer himself, engaging that either he or the stated defaulter will institute a suit in the dewanny adawlut, within fifteen days from the date of such writing, to try the demand, and to pay the amount that may be adjudged against them, with interest upon it at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, to be calculated from the date on which the arrear that may be awarded became payable, to the date of the decree, with all costs of suit, the distrainer shall immediately withdraw the attachment. If the surety shall fail to execute such writing within the prescribed period, the distrainer shall continue the property under attachment, and cause it to be sold in the manner hereafter directed, unless the arrear and the expenses attending the attachment shall be discharged previously to the day of sale. If the surety shall execute the writing, but fail to have the suit instituted, either in his own name or that of the defaulter, within the abovementioned period of fifteen days, the distrainer shall demand payment of the arrears from the surety, and in the event of his omitting to discharge the amount immediately, the distrainer shall be at liberty to issue an attachment against the personal property both of the surety and the defaulter, or the personal property of either of them, excepting always the articles specified in Section 14 of this Regulation, and to cause it to be sold in the manner hereafter directed; unless the arrears and the expense attending the attachment shall be discharged before the day of sale. If the surety of the stated defaulter shall refuse or omit to enter into the writing required, or if he shall happen to be at a distance, so as to render it impossible for him to execute such writing within the prescribed time, and such defaulter, in either of these cases, shall give the security required from the defaulters, specified in Section 15 of this Regulation, the distrainer shall withdraw the attachment; and the rules contained in the foregoing section shall, in every respect, be considered applicable to the parties concerned.

Under what rules attachment shall be withdrawn, in the case of tenants who have given security disputing the justness of the demand.

Property to continue under attachment, should the surety fail to execute the necessary writing.

Should the surety fail to have a suit instituted, the distrainer may attach both his and the defaulter's property.

The rules contained in Section XVI declared to be applicable, should the required writing not be executed by the surety, and the defaulter himself give the required security.

Regulation V, A.D. 1812.

Persons unable to give sufficient security may institute a suit in the court, to try the demand or recover damages.

XVII. Should any Ryot, farmer, or dependent Talookdar, whose property may have been distrained, be unable to give security to the amount of the demand, together with interest upon it, at the rate of one rupee per mensem, with costs of suit and expenses of attachment, he will of course be at liberty to institute a suit against the distrainer in the dewanny adawlut, to try the demand, and for the recovery of damages on account of any injury which he may have sustained by the illicit sale of his property.

Distrained property to be appraised previously to sale, and a certificate furnished to the defaulter.

XVIII. Whenever property shall have been distrained with a view to the sale of it for the recovery of arrears of rent, it shall be appraised, previously to such sale, by persons conversant with the purchase and sale of articles of the quality and description of those so distrained, and a certificate of the appraisement shall be furnished by the appraisers, under their signatures, which shall be communicated to the tenant at least three days before the sale.

Sale to be postponed, should the price offered be less than the appraised value.

XIX. If, at the time of sale, a price shall not be offered for the distrained property equal to its appraised value, the sale shall be postponed until the ensuing market day, when the property shall be actually sold, whatever price (not less than the amount bidden on the first day of sale) may be offered for it.

Suits under this Regulation to be decided on summary enquiry under Regulation VII, 1799.

XX. Suits which may be instituted under the present Regulation shall be decided on a summary enquiry, under the provisions contained in Regulation VII, 1799.

All such causes to be referred immediately to the Collectors for report, under Section XIII, Regulation VIII, 1794.

XXI. In order, likewise, further to expedite the decision on such causes, the whole of them shall be referred, as soon as instituted, to the Collectors, for their report, under the rule contained in Section 13, Regulation VIII, 1794.

Collectors to furnish periodical returns of the execution of the above-mentioned duty.

XXII. It shall be the duty of the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners to obtain from the Collectors such periodical returns regarding the execution of the abovementioned duty, as may appear best calculated to satisfy those Boards that no delay occurs in the performance of it.

Persons dissatisfied with summary decisions may institute regular suits.

XXIII. Any person who may be dissatisfied with the judgments which may be passed under the summary enquiries abovementioned, shall be at liberty, on the principle of the rules established by the existing Regulations, to institute a regular suit for the more formal investigation of the merits of the case.

Sales of entire estates not liable to be annulled by the courts, on the grounds of some of the sharers not having obtained possession, and the decision on the expediency of selling entire estates or particular parts vested in the Boards respectively.

XXIV. It is hereby declared, that sales made of entire estates for the recovery of arrears of public assessment are not liable to be annulled by the courts of judicature, on the ground that one or more of the sharers may not have obtained possession of his or their interest in the property. The consideration of, and decision on the expediency of selling the entire estate, or of disposing, in the first instance, of any particular part of it, is hereby declared to reside in the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners respectively, subject to the control exercised by the Government, in its executive capacity, in matters connected with the public revenue.

Sales not liable to be annulled on the ground of the proceeds having materially exceeded the arrears due.

XXV. No means existing, by which any certain or accurate computation can be formed à priori of the real value of any estate or portion of estate, which may be exposed to sale for the recovery of arrears of public assessment, or of the adequacy of the price which may be offered for such estate or portion of estate; it is hereby declared, that sales made at public auction, for that purpose, are not liable to be annulled by the courts of judicature, on the ground that the proceeds of the sales have materially exceeded the amount of the arrears due from the proprietor of the lands to Government. The Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners will be guided, in cases of that nature, by their own discretion; subject, of course, to any instructions with which they may at any time be furnished by the Governor-General in Council.

The Judges declared competent to appoint managers of joint undivided estates on sufficient cause shewn.

XXVI. Inconvenience to the public and injury to private rights having been experienced, in certain cases, from disputes subsisting among the proprietors of joint undivided estates, it is hereby enacted, that whenever sufficient cause shall be shewn by the Revenue Authorities, or by any of the individuals holding an interest in such estates, for the interposition of the courts of judicature, it shall be competent to the zillah and city Judges to appoint a person, duly qualified and under proper security, to manage the estate; that is, to collect the rents, and discharge the public revenue, nue, and provide for the cultivation and future improvement of the estate: Provided, however, that if the Revenue Authorities, or any of the individuals holding an interest in the estate, shall be dissatisfied with the selection made by the zillah or city Judge, of the individual to perform the duty in question, it shall be competent for them to represent their objections to the provincial court of appeal, which court will confirm the manager chosen, or order the Judge to select and appoint another person, according as, on consideration of the circumstances of the case, may appear to them reasonable and proper.

Regulation V, A. D. 1812.

Objections against the person so appointed to be represented to the provincial court.

XXVII. In like manner, should the authorities aforesaid, or any individual holding an interest in the estate, be at any subsequent time dissatisfied with the conduct of the manager, it shall be competent for them or him to represent the circumstances of the case to the zillah or city Judge, and to move the court for the removal of the said manager: and should those authorities or persons be dissatisfied with the orders which may be passed on the subject by the zillah or city Judge, it shall be competent for them to bring the case before the provincial court of appeal, which court will determine on the propriety of removing the manager, or otherwise, as may appear to them to be right and proper.

Court may be moved for the removal of such managers, should their conduct be unsatisfactory.

XXVIII. 1st. Under the existing Regulations, proprietors and farmers of estates paying revenue directly to Government are required to discharge the instalments on account of each month, on or before the first day of the following month; and such proprietors and farmers are liable to the payment of interest, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, on any arrears which may be due from them after the expiration of that period: by the rules in force, likewise, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa, and Benares, the said Zemindars and farmers are liable to the payment, at the discretion of the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners, of a further penalty, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum on the arrears due from them respectively. Inconvenience having, however, been experienced, from the existence of the complex demand of interest and penalty, such parts of Section 2, Regulation I, 1801, and of any other Regulations as render the Zemindars and sudder farmers liable to a penalty of twelve per cent. per annum in addition to the established charge of interest, are hereby rescinded.

Such parts of the Regulations, as render landholders liable to pay a penalty of twelve per cent. per annum, in addition to the established charge of interest, rescinded.

2d. In cases in which the proprietors and farmers of land shall fail to discharge the instalments of each succeeding month, on or before the first of the month following, they shall uniformly stand charged on the public accounts with interest from that date, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, nor shall it be competent for the Collectors to remit any part of that demand by their own authority. Provided, however, that if the Board of Revenue, and Board of Commissioners shall see any special reason, in consequence of reports which may be received by them from the Collectors, for remitting the interest, those authorities shall be competent to order it to be relinquished accordingly.

Landholders failing to discharge the monthly instalments shall be charged with interest at twelve per cent. per annum, unless remitted by the Boards respectively

3d. It shall be the duty of the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners to obtain such periodical accounts of the interest, as may enable them, on comparing the said accounts with the monthly towjees, not only to judge whether the demand for interest has been properly adjusted but likewise to ascertain the amount realized on that account, and the amount which may be at any time outstanding. On examination of the accounts required, the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners will, of course, furnish the Collectors with any instructions which the nature and circumstances of the case may appear to require.

The Boards shall obtain periodical accounts of such interest to be compared with the towjees.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,
Dated 6th January 1815.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 6 Jan. 1815.

Par. 21. Our sentiments and directions, respecting the settlement of the land revenue of all the Ceded and Conquered territories subject to your immediate authority, have been communicated to you in the dispatches indicated by by the marginal references.* We are now led to advert to the principal topics which you have submitted to our consideration, in connection with that subject, in paragraphs 9 to 16 of your general revenue letter of the same date as that to which we are now replying,† in paragraphs 6 to 18 of your general revenue letter dated 19th June 1813, and in your letters in the department of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, dated 17th July and 2d October, paragraphs 13 to 18, of the same year.

22. Your observations, in the first of these letters, are resolvable into the following propositions:

1st. That detailed surveys of the land are inexpedient in the territories dependent on the Bengal presidency.

2d. That there is no reason to expect, were the final settlement of the lands postponed for a period of ten years, that it would be better executed at the expiration of this term, than it would be were the existing settlements declared permanent.

3d. That a settlement of the lands in perpetuity is conformable to the usage of the native Governments, perpetual grants of land having not unfrequently been conferred by them on favoured individuals, while the permanent settlement is only an istemrary grant, in the most extensive sense of the word, and comprehending in its operation the whole body of the Zemindars, instead of a few favoured individuals.

1st. Inexpediency of Surveys.

By the survey and other statistical reports which have been drawn up from time to time by some of the ablest of our revenue servants on the Madras establishment, we have been put in possession of a most valuable mass of information concerning the actual condition and probable resources of the territories dependent on the presidency of Fort St. George, the various tenures by which property is held, the different modes in which the revenue of the sovereign has been collected, the state of society, and the customs, manners, and opinions of the inhabitants. Certain it is, that our acquaintance with the provinces under your presidency is much more limited. One material advantage derivable from a detailed measurement of the lands of a district is, that it operates as a most salutary check upon the accounts, for the most part fallacious, which are kept by the native revenue officers, of the extent and productiveness of the soil in cultivation, and which, if taken as the sole basis of an assessment, would render it always inadequate and often unequal. The true data, we conceive, on which to form an equitable assessment, are the survey valuation, the village accounts, and the collections of former years. Each of these three premises would lead to different conclusions, which would be severally erroneous; and it is only, therefore, by comparing the whole together with certain allowances and modifications, that a just and satisfactory result can be obtained.

23. In your dispatch of the 17th July 1813, we are furnished with strong additional arguments for thinking that such a measure is peculiarly called for in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. In paragraph 36 of that dispatch you observe, "No objection can, in our judgment, exist to deriving an "increase of revenue from the gradual cultivation of the wastes in the Ceded "and Conquered Provinces. For the accomplishing of this purpose, it is "only necessary to declare that the Zemindars shall be entitled to the full "benefit arising from the cultivation of any waste actually situated within the "limits of their estates; but that, if they reduce any lands to cultivation "beyond their present limits, they shall be liable to the payment of an addi-"tional and separate assessment. If this limited immunity should be deemed "too great a sacrifice, its operation might be restricted further," &c. "In "either case, it would be necessary that the boundaries of the estates, on "which the assessment might be at present fixed, should be properly and "carefully defined." Agreeing with you, as we do, in the view taken of this important important subject in the latter part of the above quotation, we conceive that the arrangement thus limited could only be successfully carried into effect by the operation of a survey.

24. It is from a want of that information which a regular revenue survey can alone afford, when succeeded by a proper registry and inspection of village cultivation, that those serious affrays can be effectually put an end to, which are constantly arising in lands already in cultivation, respecting disputed boundaries of estates and crops. The delay of justice, as we have noticed in our judicial dispatch of the 9th of November last, has certainly contributed very largely and principally to occasion those irregularities, so injurious to the peace and industry of the country. But we conceive that the dispute, in the first instance, generally originates from an undefined state of property with respect to limits. From this cause, also, and from the want of the means of obtaining correct information of the produce and value of each component part of the estate, proceed those difficulties, and that inconvenience and loss, which are so frequently experienced, both by individuals and by Government, in regard to the partition of estates, either at the desire of the joint sharers, or for the purpose of being sold on public or on private account This is a subject which has particularly attracted the attention of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, in their Fifth Report on the Affairs of India, and is, we observe, brought under your observation by Mr. Dowdeswell, in his minute on retiring from the Board of Revenue, dated 16th of October 1811, from which we find that, during the seven months that he had officiated at that Board, they had only been able to confirm five butwarrahs, or separations of estates, "an "evil which" (as he observes) "must continue to be felt, until some other "means than those which now exist shall be adopted, for the purpose of "obtaining accounts of the produce, extent, and boundaries of estates."

25. The same subject is treated of by Mr. Welland, the Judge of the division of Dacca, in his letter to the Secretary of Government of the 22d July 1811. "Such," he states, "is the uncertainty of the allotment of the Government "revenue in the several divisions and villages comprised in an estate, that no "transfer can take place, either of an entire estate or a portion of it by public "or private sale, or by decrees of the civil court, without giving rise to nume- "rous disputes and cavils."

26. It is, indeed, in terms declared by you, in Regulation V of 1812, that "no means existed, by which any certain or accurate computation could be "formed, à priori, of the real value of any estate, or portion of an estate, which "might be exposed to sale for the recovery of the arrears of public assessment, "or of the adequacy of the price which may be offered for such estate, or por- "tion of estate."

27. The inconvenience and injury to which such a state of things must expose both the landholders and Government are too evident to require an observation The agency of the native officers of account, under a vigilant inspection and control, is unquestionably of essential, and indeed absolutely necessary use: but we are persuaded that neither the public nor private rights connected with the land can be thoroughly understood, where a survey does not form the ground-work of your knowledge on these important points.

28. You express an apprehension, founded upon former experience in the Bengal Provinces, that surveys would prove burthensome to Government in point of expense, and harassing and oppressive to the people: and you add, that "this method of assessment appeared particularly unsuited to the condition "of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, where the lands are, in general, par- "celled out into small properties, the joint owners of which are themselves the "cultivators of the soil; and a minute scrutiny into the resources of the es- "tates was consequently far more difficult, than in provinces where the culti- "vation was in the hands of tenants holding of superior Zemindars, and where "a measurement and survey ascertain the rents payable by the Ryots to the "Zemindars, as a preparatory step to the assessment of the public demand on "the landholder."

29. We would here state, that the general condition of the landholders and landed tenures, in that part of India to which a regular survey has been almost exclusively exclusively confined, correspond very nearly with those you represent as generally obtaining in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. We may, indeed, lay it down as a broad proposition, to which we are not aware, after a very close examination of our official records, a single exception can be produced, that in the Peninsula it has uniformly been found comparatively easy to pursue and give effect to purposes of civil arrangement, whether of revenue or of police, in districts consisting of Ryots who account immediately with the officers of Government for their rents, or where there stands between them and the officer of Government no other intermediate link of connection than a petty Zemindar, who is no more than a copartner, like themselves, in the land within his jurisdiction, being the channel through which the public dues and his own are paid to the Collector.

30. That surveys of the land are attended with considerable expense is unquestionable, if they be duly performed; but if the benefits resulting from them be far more considerable and no less certain, not only as affecting the interests of the Government, but also the general welfare of the people, this objection falls to the ground. We nevertheless expect that, in the event of their being undertaken in the territories under your immediate charge, they will be conducted with the strictest attention to economy. We have satisfactory evidence that, in the Peninsula, they have amply repaid, as well by increased revenue as in a variety of other ways, the charges attendant upon them. The conviction entertained by the Bombay Government of the expediency of surveys, has prompted them to adopt that method of investigating the landed rights and tenures in the recently acquired territories on that side of India, where, it is also worthy of remark, the state of property in the soil very much answers the description you have given of it in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces under your Presidency.

31. Without skill and judgment on the part of those who conduct the surveys, they might possibly be harassing as well as nugatory; but if performed under the superintendence of officers duly qualified for the task, they cannot fail to prove highly useful: and we have reason to believe that, in the various surveys which have been executed in the Peninsula, the inhabitants have not been subjected to vexation.

32. This measure of a survey would, no doubt, have the effect of preventing an early settlement in perpetuity of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; but as you are already apprised of our decision upon this question, we trust that you will examine the eligibility of such a proceeding entirely upon its own merits.

2dly. No advantage can be expected from postponing the final settlement of the lands.

You have certainly put the true construction upon the sentiments contained in paragraphs 44 to 47 of our Revenue letter, dated 27th February 1810, and paragraph 19 of our letter from the same department, dated the 1st February 1811, when you suppose them to have been founded on a presumption, "that "the accuracy of your knowledge respecting the resources of estates is, or "ought to be, proportionate to the length of time during which the lands in "question may have formed a part of the British territories;" and we certainly were not prepared to meet a dissent from you to this proposition.

33. In justification of that dissent you state, that considerable errors were committed in making the settlement of some parts of Bengal and Behar, notwithstanding the length of time during which these territories had been subject to our administration; and that, on the other hand, there is not the slightest ground for believing that any errors of magnitude have been committed in performing the same duty in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, which have been, comparatively, but a short time in our possession. Now, admitting the fact, in so far as regards the settlement of Bengal and Behar, we differ with you entirely about the inference to be drawn from it: and as to the allegation, that no errors of magnitude have been committed in fixing the assessments in the Upper Provinces, it is completely at variance with most of the documents regarding them which we have had occasion to peruse.

34. If

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 6 Jan. 1815.

34. If mistakes occurred (and great mistakes unquestionably did) in forming the permanent settlement of Bengal, the proper inference is not that they are wholly unavoidable in great transactions of a similar character, but that the utmost care and caution ought to be used to prevent their recurrence. It is certainly a reasonable expectation, that experience should produce an accession of knowledge; that a government, in the course of its administration, should attain a progressive acquaintance with the opinions, feelings, wants, and interests of its subjects; and that, before attempting the introduction of a measure, the avowed object of which is to determine the ascription of private property in land, as well as to fix the limits of the public demand upon it, every practicable inquiry should be made, with a view to ascertain how far the proceeding may affect the existing rights of the inhabitants and the future interests of the state. When institutions contain within themselves a corrective principle, the imperfections which may adhere to their original formation are of comparatively little importance, because they are susceptible of gradual improvement: but when, as in the case of the proposed permanent settlement, institutions are irrevocable and unalterable, prudence, circumspection, and the most mature deliberation, cannot be too often or too gravely inculcated upon those whose province it is to direct and superintend their establishment.

35. In adverting to the mistakes which were committed in forming the permanent settlement of the lands in Bengal, it is important, also, not to lose sight of the causes from which those mistakes arose: and we are warranted, not only by general probability, but by the recorded confession of some of our Revenue servants at the time, in imputing the errors in question to the want of information by the Collectors, who were positively prohibited from resorting to minute local scrutinies, for the purpose of ascertaining the resources of the country. On this subject, the Acting Collector of Bhaugulpore addressed the Revenue Board in the following terms: "To propose assessments for the pergunnahs to "be fixed for a term of years, without that precision which the nature of the "subject demands, might only mislead you, and subject me to your future dis-"pleasure, should those assessments not be realized with the regularity and "success which you would naturally expect; and yet the materials I am pos-"sessed of certainly do not authorize me to present you with any thing more "satisfactory than a vague estimate." Again: "But in what proportions "these zemindarries should be assessed, in order equitably to make up any "deficiency that they may be found actually to have incurred, I am really at "a loss to specify: nor do I know of any other means than a close and labo-"rious examination of the Mofussil papers, by which it can be ascertained. "But this mode of inquiry is what, I apprehend, you object to, in prohibiting "me from using a minute local scrutiny, ignorant as I am of any other sort of "scrutiny used to ascertain the value or produce of a particular mehal. To "give such information, even with the advantage of such a privilege which I "believe was always exercised by the Mogul Government, and hitherto under "the English, would often be attended with difficulties and obstructions "enough to frustrate the attempt: but, without it, I can promise myself no "better success than may be derived from uncertain guesses, founded on the "reports of interested persons or temerarious adventurers." In the state of darkness and uncertainty above described, it is not surprising that errors were committed in the formation of the settlement; and it is only by having recourse to such measures as are likely to lead to an accurate acquaintance with the resources of the country, that you can reasonably hope to avoid a repetition of those errors: and this is one of the main objects we have in view, in recommending a survey of the lands of our more recently acquired territories.

36. Having had occasion, in paragraphs 26,31, and 72 to 91 of our Revenue dispatch, dated 29th January 1813, particularly to notice the errors, inequalities, and other imperfections of the assessment in some of the districts of the Ceded and Conquered Territories, we refer you to that letter, for a distinct explanation of the reasons why we cannot by any means concur in your declaration, that you have not the slightest reason to believe that any errors of magnitude have been committed in the performance of that duty.

37. On the same subject you further remark, in paragraph 14 of your letter of the 14th December 1811, that the nature "of your Revenue institutions is

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 6 Jan. 1815.

" by no means calculated to afford any great facilities in the adjustment of the " assessment on landed estates; and that, under the native Governments, " offices existed (Canongoes and Putwarries), in which the most minute parti- " culars connected with the rents and revenues of the different estates were " recorded." The former of these offices, you state, was abolished in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and the latter has since been in a very inefficient and ill-organized state: and from this you infer, that " whatever difficulties or facili- " ties may have attended the conclusion of the settlement of the above-men- " tioned provinces, the former would not have been removed, nor the latter " augmented, had that measure been suspended to the present moment; and " that, on the same principle, had the settlement which, at the date of your " letter, was just provisionally concluded for Cuttack, been suspended during " the next ten years or any other period, you entertained considerable doubts, " whether the duty would be performed in a more effectual manner than that " in which it was executed."

38. But if a want of the services of these two descriptions of offices of check and control had been experienced in the Lower Provinces, it furnished a strong argument why, with that experience before the Government, it should have profited by it, when, in subsequent years, an additional and extensive territory fell under its administration. In that territory you have indeed, of late years, re-established the office of Canongoe; but nothing very effectual appears yet to have been done for putting that of Putwarry on an efficient footing (at least this is fairly deducible from the tenour of your reasoning in the paragraph of your letter to which we are now replying), and without which little benefit can be derived from the best exertions of the former description of functionaries. This is a subject which we shall have occasion more particularly to observe upon in a subsequent part of this letter.

When we reminded you, in the 23d paragraph of our letter dated the 1st February 1811, of the expediency of proceeding with caution to the introduction of a new system, however salutary, we did not mean to impute to you any inattention to the religious or civil opinions of the Natives; and far less did we expect to be understood as maintaining, that property in land was either hostile to, or incompatible with these opinions. Our recommendation was founded upon one of the most ordinary maxims of Government, namely, that before resolving upon any new arrangement, by which the interests of the whole body of the people must be materially affected, not only its abstract merits, but what is of far greater importance, its suitableness in practice to the circumstances f the case, ought well to be considered. We thought then, and we remain unaltered in that opinion, that the permanent settlement of the land revenue is a boon which the landholders in our recently-acquired territories are not yet qualified to receive, with advantage to themselves, nor without detriment to the state.

39. But when we reflect upon some of the statements contained in the different reports of the Commissioners employed in the Upper Provinces, such as, that vast numbers of the landholders who had escaped, or been forced into exile in times of oppression and anarchy, are not yet returned; that many of those who have returned find various obstructions to the recovery of their property; that a multitude of conflicting claims to estates are in a train of slow, difficult, and uncertain adjustment; that even still a large proportion of the lands are in the hands of Farmers of the revenue; that many of the Zemindars have been excluded from their lands on grounds which, when we consider the loose, or rather hypothetical data on which the jumma has been fixed on them, appear to us to be extremely questionable; that in Cawnpore, the first triennial settlement after the cession was made upon confessedly mistaken principles; that under the second triennial settlement of this district the mistake was very inadequately rectified, insomuch that two hundred and eighty-nine estates were exposed to sale, to liquidate the arrears of an over assessment; that errors of a similar nature occurred in the two first settlements of Goruckpore; that in the district last-named, the land in cultivation is, to the land fit for cultivation but unproductive, in the ratio of seven to ten, and to the whole of the land uncultivated uncultivated in the ratio of seven to twenty-two; when we reflect upon such statements as the foregoing, and upon the facts we shall presently have to notice, with respect to the mismanagement of the zillah of Allahabad, we should consider ourselves as fully justified, under every view of the question, in interposing our authority to prevent the final completion of an arrangement, which, we are convinced, could not be executed without the hazard of injustice to our native subjects, similar, in effect, to the instances we have just alluded to.

40. In a minute of Mr. Dowdeswell's, of the 16th October 1811, recorded on the proceedings of the Board of Revenue, adverting to the great tracts of waste lands in Bengal that have been brought under cultivation during the period of the permanent settlement, such as the Sunderbunds, the territory on the borders of Chittagong and other frontier districts, the extensive forests which have been more or less cultivated in the interior of some of the provinces, as well as the lands gained by alluvion in many parts of the country, he observes, "We have every reason to suppose that estates which before only "yielded to the proprietors a surplus produce of ten and twelve per cent. on the "jumma, now yield to them a surplus produce of thirty, forty, or fifty per "cent.: if, therefore," he says, "it should ultimately be determined to adopt "any measures, with a view of drawing a revenue from the lands above described, the right of Government to the revenue of the lands in question "should be first defined by the Revenue Authorities." It is scarcely necessary to observe, that this has been one great object in our view throughout the whole of the discussion on this important subject, and we are well pleased to see that your attention is now directed to it.

41. That Istemrary grants of land were not uncommon under the Native governments, we are quite aware; but they were limited both in number and extent, and they never were bestowed so indiscriminately as to absorb any great proportion of the revenues of the state. We certainly do not wish to revive the doctrine of the Sovereign in India being proprietor of the soil, either de facto or de jure; but we deem it necessary to be extremely cautious in foreclosing one of the principal sources of revenue now open to us, in the precarious expectation that other sources, equally productive, may afterwards be discovered.

42. We have read, with the attention due to the importance of the subject and to the consideration we are always disposed to attach to the opinions of executive Authorities in India, the arguments adduced by you in your dispatches of the 19th June and 2d October 1813, against the introduction of the ryotwar system of Revenue administration into the provinces under your presidency; but we must at the same time declare to you, that we are not prepared to concur in your reasonings and views upon it. It is our intention to enter into a full and matured consideration of this question, when we shall examine with careful attention all the official documents which we have received from you as bearing upon it.

43. One of the great objects we had in drawing your attention to that plan of administration was, to provide more effectually for the protection of the cultivators than can be done when an intermediate class of renters is admitted between the Government Collector and the Ryots. We are accordingly pleased to find, from the reply of the Board of Commissioners * to the reference made to them by you, for their sentiments in regard to the practical effects of a khas (or ryotwar) collection, that though they disapprove of this mode of management on an extensive scale, yet that they are decidedly partial to one which may be considered as an approximation to it. "In all the settlements formed under our instructions," they observe, "we have avoided, as "far as possible, having recourse to farmers; and wherever the proprietors "have declined to engage or were not forthcoming, our next object has been to "obtain engagements from the Mokuddums or Purdhans for the individual "village of each man's respective residence."

44. The Commissioners add, and we doubt not with good reason, that "the "class of the higher order of peasantry are found to possess, from the hereditary "lead which they hold among the tenants, as much influence in the estate, and "as much attachment to the soil, as the proprietors themselves, and we have "invariably

"invariably found the settlements with them to be the most successful and substantial of all arrangements."

46. As connected with this part of the subject, we cannot with too much earnestness direct your attention to the enforcement of the pottah Regulation; a measure which was contemporaneous with the permanent settlement, was then considered as an essentially necessary branch of the system, and upon the observance of which the security of the Ryots, and consequently the general prosperity of the country, were stated mainly to depend. Had that Regulation been duly enforced, and had the penalties attached to the breach of it been regularly imposed, a degree of confidence might have been established between the Zemindars and the Ryots, which would gradually have spread its influence into our other provinces, and would, to a certain extent, have removed one of the objections which now operate on our minds against the immediate adoption of a permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Countries.

47. But it has unfortunately happened (and, we must say, much to the discredit of the executive Authorities abroad) that the pottah Regulation has been suffered to become a dead letter.

48. The only immediate security for the Ryots against undue exactions is that Regulation; and, if measures are not speedily adopted to enforce compliance with its salutary provisions, the Ryots must continue entirely at the mercy of the Zemindars or renters.

49. We know, not only from the authority of Colonel Munro, of whose able and judicious administration in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces in the Deccan, during a period of eight years, we have often had occasion to make mention, but from the information we have recently received from Mr. Ravenshaw, who succeeded him in that department, and afterwards administered the revenues of the southern division of Arcot, that the improvement in the condition of the Ryots, and the augmentation which took place in the public revenue, were greatly to be attributed to the stimulus which a feeling of security, arising from the possession of pottahs, had given to the industry of the Ryots, who, when they had accomplished the cultivation of their own lands, were allowed to undertake the culture of allotments of the waste.

50. Relying, as we do, upon the correctness of this information, which might be confirmed from various other of the reports of our Madras servants, we cannot but feel an earnest desire, that a measure productive of such advantages should be enforced on the landholders subject to your Government.

51. The following we find, from your records, to have been the course successfully pursued by the Assistant to the Collector of Bhaugulpore in the year 1787, on the death of a Zemindar of that district, for the purpose of securing the grant of pottahs to the Ryots, and affording them other means of protection. The authority of the Board of Revenue having been previously obtained, the Assistant Collector commenced his operations in a particular pergunnah, in communication with the relations of the deceased Zemindar, and attended by those persons as well as by the servants of the Canongoe, he visited the villages, assembled the Ryots of each, and inspected their pottahs. Where pottahs had been at all granted, he found that it had been the custom for all the inhabitants of a village to be bound by the same instrument, which recited the names of a few of the principal Ryots, including the rest with an et cætera, In lieu of these, new pottahs were granted on the same terms of rent, but with the names specified of the Ryots, who were all present and agreed to receive them. Similar pottahs were granted in those villages, also, where the Ryots before had none. The pottahs were not only given for land already in cultivation, but expressed the rates to be paid, agreeably to former custom, for any land that might be newly cleared and planted. The pottahs were witnessed by the Mocuddims, Putwarries, and Canongoes. Abstracts of each original paper on which each pottah was founded, including lists of the Ryots' names, were lodged in the office of the Canongoe, to remain there or become a record of the sudder cutcherry, as should be determined upon, the Zemindars or renters being prohibited from collecting rent from any Ryot whose name should not have been inserted in the village pottah, and also strictly required to grant separate pottahs.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 6 Jan. 1815.

pottahs. By these means, as the Assistant Collector observed in his letter of the 23d November 1787, "the rent of the land, according to its several rates, "became fixed on record; nor could it be altered, without the mutual consent "of the parties concerned taken in writing before witnesses: and the loss of "pottahs, whether real or pretended, might at any time be supplied by a "reference to the office of Canongoe."

52. Connected with the separate items of demand enforced by the Zemindars upon the Ryots, they were informed that the number and the rates at which they were fixed were formally notified to the Ryots of each village. The respective duties of the Mocuddims and Putwarries of villages were explained to the inhabitants in written proclamations, and the individuals themselves obliged to enter into mockelkas for their due performance.

53. As soon as this improved mode of Revenue management had been introduced into the pergunnah of Furkea, the Collector of the district of Baugle-pore informed the Board of Revenue of his Assistant's proceedings, in order to know "whether similar measures should be taken, for the purpose of re-"form, in other parts of it, as time and local circumstances would admit." The measures which had been adopted in Furkea were highly approved by the Board, and its wish notified to the Assistant Collector, "that he would pro-"ceed, with all possible expedition, in extending similar Regulations to other "parts of the district." Some progress was made in the execution of this work, when it was superseded by the general arrangements which were determined upon preparatory to the permanent settlement of 1793.

54. We have perused the minute of Mr. Colebrooke on the settlement of the land revenue in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, to which you have drawn our attention in paragraph 55 of your letter in that department, dated the 17th July 1813, with the attention due to the importance of the subject, and with all the respect we entertain for the opinions of that gentleman; but we confess that we have not been convinced by his reasoning on the present occasion. A detailed examination of the arguments contained in this document would necessarily lead to a recapitulation of the sentiments we have conveyed to you in the present and in former dispatches: we shall, therefore, take leave of the question at present, by reiterating our instructions, that any permanent settlement which may be concluded in these territories shall be restricted to the lands in an actual state of cultivation, and in which the rights of the Ryots have been defined and ascertained.

Letter from, dated 21st March 1812. (Par. 3 to 6.) Statement of lands actually sold for arrears of revenue in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces and Benares, during the official year 1810-11.

89. From the statement here referred to, it appears that, in the year 1810-11, lands bearing a jumma of Rupees 2,42,943 were actually sold for arrears of revenue in the Ceded Provinces, and that the sale price amounted to Rupees 1,27,679, being on an average at the rate of five years and one month's purchase, reckoning the proprietor's profits at ten per cent. on the jumma; that in the Conquered Provinces, lands bearing a jumma of Rupees 49,133 were sold for the sum of Rupees 13,418, being at the rate of only one year and five months' purchase of the proprietor's computed profit; and that in the province of Benares, lands bearing a jumma of Rupees 93,209 were sold for the sum of Rupees 1,17,379, being at the rate of twelve and a half years' purchase, according to the same computation.

90. We approve of your having required the Board of Commissioners to furnish a statement of this sort annually; and we direct that the Board of Revenue be instructed to draw up, in the same form, the statement which they are in the practice of supplying periodically, of the quantity of land sold for arrears of revenue in the provinces under their controul.

91. A document of this nature is highly important in many respects; but we are obliged to confess, that the one now before us is by no means of a flattering complexion.

92. We find, from paragraphs 66 to 68 of your general Revenue letter, dated 14th December 1811, that the Zemindar's interest in the land sells for twenty-eight years' purchase in Bengal; and it appears, from the statement of the the Board of Commissioners, that the same interest sells for only twelve and a half years' purchase in Benares. The cause of this difference in the value of landed property in provinces, both of which are permanently settled, is in itself an interesting subject of inquiry. The circumstance, too, of a greater quantity of land being exposed to sale in the single province of Benares, the jumma of which does not quite amount to forty-one lacks, than in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, the jumma of which amounts to nearly two crore and seventy-two lacks, requires explanation.

93. In Benares, however, as well as in the Lower Provinces, the land may be considered, generally speaking, as furnishing ample security for the realization of the Government assessment; whereas, in the Ceded and Conquered territories, the land affords no such security. The arrears on the estates sold in the Ceded Provinces exceeded the sale price in the sum of Rupees 10,125, and in the Conquered Provinces land seems to be hardly transferrable at any price, most of the estates sold having been nominally purchased on account of Government.

94. It is worthy of remark, also, that the sale prices in the Ceded Provinces vary from seven and a half years' to three and a half years' purchase; a circumstance which, in itself, affords a presumption that there must be great inequalities in the assessment.

95. The quantity of land sold in Benares bears a much higher proportion to the extent and jumma of the province, than the quantity sold in the Upper Provinces does to their surface and revenue; from which it may be inferred, that the permanent settlement has not proved universally favourable, either to the stability of property, or to a punctual discharge of the public dues.

96. The column in the statement, designated "Lands ordered for sale but "not sold," ought to have been accompanied with some explanation of the reason why the order of sale was not enforced. We suppose that the payment of the arrears due by the defaulter obviated the necessity of carrying the order into execution. The lands ordered for sale, and not sold, in 1810-11, bore a jumma of Rupees 29,73,418, and the arrears for which they were attached amounted to Rupees 9,29,845. It is still, therefore, a natural and important question, how the proprietors of these estates found the means of liquidating their arrears, between the period of attachment and the day of sale? If it was by clandestine collections from the Ryots, we have but little reason to congratulate ourselves upon the result.

97. We have also to observe, with reference to statements of the description now before us, that although they afford satisfactory information respecting the degree of success with which the dues of Government are collected from the landholders, they throw no light whatever on the means resorted to by the Zemindars and farmers of the revenue, to realize their rents from the Ryots and under-tenants.

98. Those means, as we recently took occasion to notice, in our dispatch in this department of the 28th October 1814, and in that in the Judicial department of 9th November 1814, have been as unjust as they were oppressive. We had not, when those letters were prepared, perused the proceedings of your Board of Revenue, dated 31st December 1811, nor the Civil Judicial Consultations of 1st May 1812, which have only very lately been seen by us, having somewhat unaccountably been suffered to remain unnoticed in your Revenue and Judicial dispatches. These documents are of a very interesting and important nature, not only as they throw much additional light upon the abuses practised by the Zemindars in the realization of the revenue from the cultivators, but also upon other points of considerable moment, as affecting the internal administration of the country, which have naturally attracted our particular attention.

99. Our only purpose, in referring to them at this time, is to state, that although, when we addressed to you the above-mentioned dispatches, we undoubtedly considered the abuses practised by the Zemindars, under the powers of distraint which were afforded them by Regulation VII of 1799, to have been a most serious evil, we must confess that we had not an adequate idea of its

its magnitude and extent, till we had examined the reports, &c. here referred to, which have greatly strengthened the opinion we expressed to you in those letters, as to the insufficiency of the provisions you have made in Regulation V of 1812 for its correction.

100. From the minute of Mr. Dowdeswell, to which we have referred in our Revenue dispatch of 28th October 1814, a conclusion might not unnaturally be drawn, that the office of Putwarry, in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, has been placed on a proper footing, though it is not expressly stated. Certain it is, that in the reports of the Collectors which we have hitherto examined, we find but little reference to the accounts of such officers; and to this we must ascribe the want of insight, so clearly manifested, and so frequently confessed, into the rules and principles of the territorial assessment in the villages, its amount, or the different kinds of produce: nor can we ascertain, from the documents that have reached us, whether the payments of the cultivators are made in kind, whether the share of the actual produce to which the Government or its representative is entitled is commuted for in money or whether fixed rents obtain, what proportion of the crop of the Ryot goes in contributions to the support of the village establishments, what ready-money payments they are subject to for the same purposes, and how far these contributions and petty collections are appropriated to their legitimate objects.

101. We must, however, admit, that while the Putwarrees continue on the footing prescribed by Regulation XXIX of 1803, it will be, in a great degree, impracticable for the Collectors to derive from those officers that aid which they are so well capable of rendering, in furnishing detailed information respecting the revenues of their villages. The Collectors are, indeed, authorized by this Regulation to call on the Putwarrees "for the accounts kept by them, "and for any information relative thereto, in cases of attachment provided "for by Section 15 of Regulation XXVII of 1803, as well as in all cases of "khas collection by the Tehsildar or other officers of Government." They are also permitted to call for the information specified in the preamble to Regulation XXIX of 1803, but in no other cases, unless expressly empowered under some Regulation printed and published; and the Collector is required to specify, under a written notice to the Putwarry, the particular accounts he is desirous to see. Should the Putwarry neglect to attend with his books by the time limited, the Collector has not the power to enforce his appearance; but he is to represent the circumstance, through the Vakeel or pleader of Government, to the zillah court. We have before stated, that the Regulation leaves it to the Zemindar to appoint all officers of that description within his zemindarry.

102. It is observed by Lord Teignmouth, in his minute on the decennial settlement of 18th June 1789, that "whether they (the Putwarrees) received their "nominations from the Canongoes or from the Zemindars, or from any public "officer, he conceived them to be servants of the state, and responsible to it "for their trusts." In this light they have ever been considered under every native Government, and have formed a necessary link in the chain of permanent public functionaries belonging to the Revenue department. If their services be absolutely necessary for the protection and security of the public as well as private rights, which cannot be questioned, they should be placed under the direct control of the Collectors of districts, who should at all times, and for any purposes connected with the administration of the revenues, have the readiest and fullest access to their records, and be empowered effectually to command it.

103. Enough is stated, in many of the communications from the Collectors in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, to establish the expediency, and indeed necessity of an arrangement for this purpose, and to shew that the want of it is one material cause, at least, why they have not been able to turn these village institutions to more advantage in the regulation of the public revenues.

104. It is observed by the Collector of Etawah:* "The putwarry Regulation "does not at all secure any rights or privileges to this description of persons, "which should attach them to the state or detach them from the Zemindars."

105. By

* Report of 28th October 1807.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 6 Jan. 1815.

105. By the Collector of Agra it is stated, that "the Putwarrees being the "immediate servants of the Zemindars, little credit was to be given to their "accounts;" and that "the only documents which he then possessed for regu- "lating the assessment were the jumma wausil bauky accounts delivered by the "Canongoes of the several pergunnahs, for a period of ten years ending with "1210, the last year of the former Government; but that those accounts were "not sufficient, and only exhibited the jumma assessed on the different estates "in each year of the above period, and the amount realized from them by the "Aumils, which did not bear any regular proportion to the capability of the "lands."

106. The following extract from the report of the Board of Commissioners, recorded on your Civil Judicial Consultations of 1st May 1812, shows their opinion of the importance of restoring the office of Putwarry to its ancient footing, with a view to the relation between landlord and tenant.

"The operation of distraint would be materially facilitated, if the Putwarrees "were compelled to keep their jummabundy papers in such a uniform and "perspicuous manner, as should readily fix the demand upon the tenant and "ascertain the quantum of his payments. But, for this purpose, some modi- "fication would be necessary in the constitution of the office. Under the reve- "nue system established by the Emperor Akbar, the Putwarry was an officer of "Government, and the office was hereditary. As the old institutions of Hin- "dostan still maintain some footing in these provinces, the Putwarry is still "considered here a public officer, entrusted with the general rights of the te- "nants, and supposed not to betray them; and from what has come under our "personal knowledge, we are satisfied that the confidence reposed in the Put- "warrees is seldom misplaced. In the Lower Provinces, on the contrary, the "Putwarry is become a personal servant of the Zemindar, who has a direct "interest in turning him to account."

107. The loss of revenue knowledge felt from having rendered the Putwarrees the private servants of the Zemindars, instead of retaining them on their accustomed footing of public officers of the Government, appears from your records to have been represented, very soon after the conclusion of the settlement of the lands in the Lower Provinces, by several of your Revenue servants, and particularly by the Collector of Burdwan, in his report to the Board of Revenue, dated 27th February 1794. He observes: "In an extensive province, "like this, without Canongoes or hustaboods, as they exist in Behar, and where "every glimmering of light which might lead to a discovery of the actual state "of the mofussil has either been extinguished or given up to the proprietor, it "may be worth the consideration of the Board to determine how, in the event "of selling land, the necessary information is to be procured."

108. In those parts of our peninsular territory where the most considerable knowledge has been obtained of the assessment on the cultivators, and of other necessary points of intelligence, as connected with fiscal management, the Putwarrees were not suffered to be under any other actual management or superintendence than the public officers of the revenue: and we see the strongest grounds for believing that they never could have succeeded so well in exploring the history and actual state of the revenues and cultivation, had it been otherwise. We therefore direct, that you have recourse to this principle of policy within the territories under your Government, and that you take measures for introducing it, in the first instance, into the unsettled countries, where the necessity for the measure is the most urgent.

138. Adverting to the various terms and appellations borrowed from the oriental languages, which appear on your Revenue Consultations, and the meaning of which it is sometimes difficult to discover, we direct that you instruct the Boards of Revenue and of Commissioners to desire the different Collectors, subject to their respective authority, to avoid, as much as possible, the use of native designations in their correspondence; and in cases where it may be impracticable to dispense with them, without frequent periphrases, to affix a marginal explanation of the terms, which, for the sake of convenience, may be employed in the text of their letters.

REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,
Dated the 17*th March* 1815.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

To our Governor-General in Council at Fort William in Bengal.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 March 1815.

Par. 1. Our last dispatch from this department was dated 6th of January 1815.

2. We are now about to reply to your Revenue letter (department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces) dated 2d October 1813.

3. In this letter you acknowledge* the receipt of our dispatch of 16th March 1813, which conveyed to you our instructions respecting the settlement of the revenues of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and you again draw our attention† to Regulations IX and X of 1812, for modifying some of the rules before enacted regarding the settlement of those provinces, and particularly‡ to the provisions in both Regulations, which require the Board of Commissioners "to "submit to the Governor-General a report, specifying the estates which may "not appear to be yet in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to admit of "the conclusion of a perpetual settlement, without a sacrifice of those re-"sources which may hereafter be derived from them for the exigencies of "Government."

4. After observing,§ that the above provision is equally applicable to the district of Cuttack, you add,‖ that those Regulations appear to have been before us at the period of writing our dispatch of 16 March 1813, and that, as we had not directed any alteration to be made in their provisions, it only remained for you to adopt the rules in force, for the conclusion of the depending settlements, to our sentiments and views. You conclude¶ with waiving farther discussion of the restrictions which we had prescribed with regard to the permanent settlement, and with assuring us of your determination strictly to conform to them; excepting we should be induced to relax those restrictions, in consequence of the reasoning contained in your address of 17th July 1813, in which case we would, of course, furnish you with due intimation to that effect.

5. Considering that the period had arrived, more than twelve months antecedent to the date of your dispatch, at which the provisions of Regulation IX of 1812, were to take effect in the Ceded Provinces (the quartennial settlement of that portion of our territories having expired in September 1812, we were disappointed at finding no reference in your letter to a report from the Board of Commissioners of the description of that required by Section 5 of the Regulation, and which, though it could not probably at that time have been prepared on a comprehensive scale, might have at least indicated the course which it was meant to observe in the formation of the settlement.

6. It is, besides, hardly necessary to remind you, that though a report, distinguishing those estates which, from the backwardness of their cultivation, were not ripe for a permanent settlement, from such as might be included in that arrangement without an undue sacrifice of the future resources of Government, was particularly required from the Commissioners by your Regulation, a document of this sort is by no means all that we expected from them. We have uniformly evinced, throughout the whole course of our correspondence on this great question, fully as strong an anxiety that the rights of individuals should not be infringed, as that the interests of the state should not be compromised by premature decision.

7. By this sentiment we were induced to represent to you, in our letter of 16th March 1813, how imperfectly we were acquainted with the rights of the various descriptions of landholders, and of the nature of the tenures by which property was held in the Upper Provinces; that the titles to a considerable proportion of the lands were still in dispute; that years must elapse, before decisions can take place on the pretensions of the claimants in the regular course of justice; and that, under such circumstances, it was impossible that an early conclusion conclusion of the permanent settlement should not have a tendency to derange the order and disturb the quiet of society.

8. It is a source of some satisfaction to us, to think that you have not been left to collect our sentiments, upon the question of a permanent settlement of our recently acquired territories, from any incidental or equivocal expressions, but that our instructions (though less definite, certainly, on many points, than they would have been had they been founded on fuller information) have been intelligible and distinct, in so far as they went. These sentiments have been communicated to you in the course of our Revenue correspondence for the last five years, and particularly in our dispatch dated 16 March 1813; and you have since been apprized, by our letter from this department, dated 6 January last, that those sentiments have not undergone any change, in consequence of the view which you have taken of the subject in your dispatch of 17 July 1813.

9. Our opinions and the instructions founded thereon had not been hastily adopted. They were the result of much reflection, and a deliberate investigation of the arguments with which they might be opposed.

10. We showed, in our dispatch of 16 March 1813,* that by Regulations XXV. 1803, and IX. of 1805, and consequently by Regulations IX. and X. of 1812, which went to revive the provisions of the two former Regulations, the precise point of improvement was not determined at which a permanent settlement of the lands of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces would become expedient or even justifiable, and that it could not be determined by any prospective Regulation; that the question was left completely open for the future exercise of the judgment of Government; that there was nothing in those Regulations by which its decisions could or ought to be in the smallest degree fettered; that it was for the constituted Authorities at home,† aided by the information transmitted by the local Government, to decide whether the land was or was not in such a state as to warrant a measure irrevocable in its nature, and involving so materially, not only the financial interests of the Government, but the welfare and prosperity of those living under its protection; and that, by a decision in the negative, supposing even the decision to be universal in its application, the obligations of public faith would not be at all infringed.

11. With reference to the remark contained in your letter of 9th October 1812, that "the operation of the Regulations therewith transmitted would "probably be much more limited than might at first view be conceived to be "the case, it being supposed that the conditions which would alone entitle "the landholders at present to a permanent settlement would not be found "applicable to a very large portion of them," we observed,‡ that there appeared to be no substantial difference of opinion between us, respecting the mode in which the Regulations ought to be interpreted; adverting at the same time to an expression in the Governor-General's minute, recorded the 11 July 1812, that "if our instructions of 27 November 1811 were taken in the "broadest sense of which they were susceptible, they would imply, that a per-"manent settlement should not be made of any lands whatever in the Ceded "and Conquered Provinces:" of course, meaning at any period to be definitively fixed by a prospective Regulation. We acquainted you, that this was certainly the sense which they were intended to convey, and the only one reconcilable with the terms and general spirit of them, as well as with the previous orders with which we had furnished you of 27 February 1810, and 1 February 1811.§ We did indeed state, that if a permanent settlement could be concluded for the lands in cultivation, to the exclusion of the waste, one of our objections to the measure would be obviated. But we admonished you well to reflect upon the probable consequences of its partial introduction; for on the supposition of such a settlement being regarded by the landholders as a measure advantageous to them, much discontent would be caused among those proprietors who were excluded from the benefit, whilst those individuals on whom the boon was conferred, might avail themselves of it, by withdrawing the Ryots from the lands remaining under temporary settlements, to the prejudice both of Government and their fellow subjects. In fine, we then expressed conviction, which we still retain, that the landholders, instead of having cause of dissatisfaction, would, on the contrary, have substantial reasons for congratulating themselves on the postponement of a permanent settlement, until we had acquired a more perfect acquaintance with their rights and obligations.

* Paragraph 10. † Paragraph 15. ‡ Paragraph 15. § Paragraph 23.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 17 March 1815.

12. You have, indeed, referred us, in your letter of the 17th July 1813,* to Mr. Colebrooke's minute, for distinct and satisfactory information respecting the tenures of the landholders: but we must own, with every disposition to do justice to the merits of that document, that this appears to us to be the point on which, of all others, it is the least satisfactory. The only information on this subject in Mr. Colebrooke's minute is comprized in the following paragraph. "The tenures are less various and complex in the Upper Provinces "than in the lower. They consist, for the most part, in the hereditary and "acknowledged title of village Zemindars, sometimes held by individuals, "oftener by numerous sharers, termed Putteedars. These are, very generally, "the chief cultivators, as well as the sole owners of the land. Some peculi-"arities exist as to the manner of adjusting among themselves their respective "possessions, and their contributions towards the discharge of the revenue, "but they throw no difficulty or embarrassment in the way of the public "assessment of the entire village. A comparatively small number of greater "estates, consisting of places unowned by village Zemindars, belongs to ano-"ther order of landholders, called in those provinces Talookdars." Mr. Colebrooke has not stated the means in use for overcoming the difficulties which must necessarily occur, both in the management and transfer of a property held in common; whether each share is held responsible only for its own assessment, or whether the whole land of a village be answerable for the whole Government jumma of that village; on the latter supposition, whether, in the event of one sharer falling in arrear to Government and the other sharers failing to make good that arrear, the whole land of the village be exposed to sale; who, in such cases, are generally the purchasers, and what becomes of the former Putteedars; if, on the other hand, the arrears of the sharer in default are paid up by the other shares, whether the latter possess any, and what means, of indemnifying themselves; whether a community of obligation towards Government confers an entire community of interest in the estate, or supposing each sharer to have an individual and separate interest in the land, under what rules provision is made for their common interest, in so far as respects the Government, &c. &c.

13. In like manner, it might be asked, when the Zemindars are not themselves the cultivators, what are the rights of the cultivating Ryots? what proportion of the gross produce of the soil do they pay to the Zemindars? is this fixed by custom, by agreement, or by the discretion of the Zemindars? is it paid in kind or commuted into money? is the proportion the same in all situations, or does it vary in different pergunnahs, and in different species of soil in the same pergunnah? can a Zemindar legally dispossess a resident Ryot, who has regularly paid the customary rent for his land, to make way for one who may engage to pay more than the customary rent? if he can, how is this power reconcilable with the privileges which we are warranted by great authorities in ascribing to the Ryots? if they cannot, how is the want of power reconcilable with the absolute right of property in the soil, which under a permanent settlement we profess to convey to the Zemindars? what rules have been digested to enforce the grant of pottahs, and thereby to avert the manifold evils which have resulted from the total inefficiency of the Regulations for that purpose in the Lower Provinces? and lastly, what measures have been adopted for placing the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry in that state of efficiency, which we regard as altogether indispensable to the security of the legitimate rights of Government, the Zemindars, and the Ryots, and to the prevention of those numerous and fatal disorders, which may be traced, in great part, to the degeneracy or entire suppression of those offices in the Lower Provinces?

14. When you observed, therefore, in your address of 2d October 1813, that we had not directed, in our letter of 16th March, any alteration to be made in the provisions of Regulations IX and X of 1812, you must have distinctly tinctly perceived, that the reason why we had not done so was, because your Government, according to the just construction of those Regulations, did not stand committed to an immediate permanent settlement of the lands. They merely went to revive the provisions of Regulations XXV of 1803, and IX of 1805, which declared that, after the expiration of ten years, a permanent settlement should be concluded for all such lands as might be in a sufficiently advanced state of improvement to warrant the measure. We thought then, and are still of opinion, that under the foregoing condition, only those estates where the proportion of waste land was very inconsiderable indeed, had a claim to be admitted to a permanent settlement, and that the promise, if construed in the strictest sense, could pledge us no further than to a permanent settlement of the cultivated land to the total exclusion of the waste.

* Paragraph 55.

15. Having been aware, therefore, from the reports of the Board of Commissioners, and indeed from the acknowledgement of the Governor-General, in his minute of 11 July 1812, that there were few or no entire estates to which the rule thus interpreted would apply, we were inclined to believe, that the measure would be postponed in toto; but being very imperfectly acquainted with your proceedings respecting the settlements in the Upper Provinces for a considerable time past, we have judged it necessary again to communicate to you, in the explicit manner we have done in this dispatch, our positive instructions concerning the reservation of the waste lands, in the event of a settlement in perpetuity having been concluded for those in a state of cultivation.

We are your affectionate friends,

REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,
Dated 19th August, 1815.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

To the Honourable the Court of Directors for Affairs of the Honourable the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies.

Honourable Sirs:

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 19 August 1815.

1. We have had the honour to receive three letters from your Honourable Court in the Revenue department dated the 28th October 1814, 6th January, and 17th March last.

2. We shall hereafter reply in detail, and in the usual form, to the abovementioned dispatches: In the mean time, we beg leave to observe that we entirely concur in the sentiments expressed by your Honourable Court respecting the revival of the office of Pergunnah Canongoe in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and the reform of the office of Putwarry throughout the territories immediately dependent on this presidency. In the accomplishment of these objects, we shall follow the course suggested by your Honourable Court; that is, we shall endeavour, in the first instance, to place those offices on the proper footing in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces and in the province of Benares, and then extend the arrangements so established to the districts subject to the superintendance of the Board of Revenue at the presidency; unless we should be restrained, by the expense, or by any other considerations of moment, from carrying the arrangements in question into effect without a previous reference to your Honourable Court.

3. We take the present opportunity to observe, that we are likewise of opinion that it would be extremely desirable to revive generally the Maul Adawluts, or tribunals for the trial and decision of disputed claims between landlord and tenant, and between all persons, from the Sudder Malguzar to the cultivator of the soil. It is well known, that these institutions were formerly of the greatest utility in the adjustment of disputes respecting the payment of rent; and we are willing to hope that they may be again rendered highly beneficial, in facilitating the collection of the rents of the Zemindars on the

the one hand, and in protecting the peasantry from the exactions to which, we apprehend, that they are at present too often subject, on the other. Those tribunals will likewise, we hope, be extremely useful, in relieving the regular courts of judicature from a part of the business which at present presses so heavily on many of them.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 19 August 1815.

4. We have the honour to transmit, for the immediate information of your Honourable Court, a copy of the instructions which we have issued, on both of the above-mentioned points, to the Board of Commissioners.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sirs,

Your most faithful, humble Servants,

G. DOWDESWELL.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,
Dated 7th October, 1815.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 7 October 1815.

Par. 2. In our short letter of the 19th August last, we had the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Honourable Court's dispatch in this department, of the 6th January and 17th March 1815, and to communicate to you the general outline of the arrangements which we proposed to adopt, regarding some of the most important questions discussed in them.

3. As your Honourable Court's dispatch of the 17th March relates exclusively to the subject of the permanent settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and as many of the observations contained in your dispatch of the 6th January refer to that subject and to questions immediately connected with it, we propose, on the present occasion, to submit, first, our sentiments generally on those subjects, in a distinct and connected form, and afterwards to reply, seriatim and in the usual form, to such paragraphs in those dispatches as are not immediately connected with the subjects above adverted to.

4. Whatever opinions this Government may have expressed respecting the permanency of the settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, or whatever sentiments we may individually entertain on that important subject, we feel no wish to continue the discussion further than may be necessary to obviate difficulties in the practical performance of that duty, under the restrictions now established by your Honourable Court.

5. Previously to entering on the consideration of those points, we deem it necessary to remark that none of the settlements hitherto concluded in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces have been declared by us to be permanent. The grounds on which we have disposed of that question will appear from the orders passed by us on the settlement-accounts, which have, from time to time, been forwarded to your Honourable Court.

6. For the rest, as it is provided, by Section 5, Regulations IX and X, 1812, which appear to have received the approbation of your Honourable Court, that " it shall be the duty of the Board of Commissioners to submit to the " Governor-General in Council a report, specifying the estates which may not " appear to be yet in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to admit of " the conclusion of a permanent settlement," &c. &c., we must necessarily be guided by such information as we may receive from that Board. On the whole, however, there seems little ground to suppose that any of the depending settlements which will expire in the Ceded Provinces in the fusily year 1224, and in the Conquered Provinces in 1227, will be regarded as permanent.

7. We come now to treat of those questions which are essential, with reference to the interests both of Government and of the great body of the people, in a measure of this nature. We shall discuss this branch of the subject under distinct heads, as follows:

Surveys,

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 7 October, 1815.

Surveys, Rights of the Peasantry, Canongoes and Putwarries, Maul Adawluts.

Surveys.

8. Although the Government of this Presidency has more than once stated, in strong terms, the objections which appeared to exist to the actual measurement of lands by the slow and tedious process of the natives, it did not, as we conceive, intend to express any opinion adverse to surveys undertaken by professional persons, and executed in a scientific manner. But whatever sentiments our predecessors may have entertained on that subject, we have not the least hesitation in expressing our belief, that the most substantial advantages may be derived from surveys of the latter description. They are obviously calculated to ascertain and fix the boundaries of estates, and to afford the requisite data for judging of various other points involved in the settlement of lands, whether such settlement be temporary or permanent. Exclusively of these advantages, such surveys are calculated in their operation to prevent those serious affrays, which although materially repressed by the vigour of the police during the last three or four years, still exist to a certain degree, and are at all times liable to be renewed, as often as disputes may arise regarding the boundaries of lands. They are likewise calculated to facilitate the partition of estates; and it is already known to your Honourable Court, from the minute recorded by Mr. Dowdeswell on quitting his temporary seat at the Board of Revenue, in the year 1811, that the difficulty attendant on the performance of that duty has long been felt as a serious evil in this country. On these and other grounds, which might be communicated, if the nature of the case required it, we have taken the necessary measures for organizing an establishment for the measurement of estates, with the aid of the Surveyor General of India; and we beg leave to refer you to the letter written to that officer, and recorded on the proceedings of the annexed date,* for your more particular information on the subject. From that letter it will appear, that the primary object of the intended establishment is the acquisition of such information as is more immediately required in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, with reference to the depending settlements. We are led, however, to entertain a confident hope, that the establishment in question may be rendered highly beneficial, in enabling Government to draw an increased revenue from the lands lately reduced to cultivation in the Sunderbunds, in the frontier district of Chittagong, and in other places, on the principles stated in the eighty-seventh paragraph of your dispatch of the 28th October 1814.

Rights of the Peasantry.

9. Although we have but too strong grounds to believe that the Ryots are frequently subjected to exactions by the Zemindars and others, and although we unreservedly admit that the existing institutions of this country are very imperfectly calculated to afford to them, in practice, that protection to which, on every ground, they are so fully entitled, yet their rights, considering the question abstractedly, do not appear to us by any means enveloped in that obscurity which might be supposed, from the elaborate discussions which the subject has occasionally undergone.—We consider it as a principle equally applicable to all the provinces immediately dependant on this Presidency, and we believe we might safely add, to the whole of India, that the resident Ryots have an established, permanent, hereditary right in the soil, which they cultivate so long as they continue to pay the rent justly demandable from them with punctuality. We consider it equally a principle interwoven with the constitution of the different Governments of India, that the quantum of rent is not to be determined by the arbitrary will of the Zemindar, but that it is to be regulated by specific engagements contracted between the parties or their ancestors, or in the absence of such engagements, by the established rates of the pergunnahs or other local divisions.

10. If it were asked, as in fact has been done by your Honourable Court, how the above rights are to be reconciled with the privileges and immunities which it has been the policy of the British Government to vest in the Zemindars or other independent proprietors of land? we should answer, that although it may be in some degree, a misnomer, to say that the right in the soil is vested in in the latter, yet we do not discern any thing incompatible in the two descriptions of tenure. In other words, we can discover nothing in the rights which we have supposed the Ryot to possess, at variance with the ideas which are usually attached to the possession and enjoyment of landed property. The cottager in England may have his rights, but they do not necessarily oppugn those which are inherent in the proprietor of the estate.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 7 October, 1815.

11. In like manner, the Zemindar in this country, in holding his estate subject to certain restrictions with respect to the rights of the resident Ryots, does not the less enjoy the power of managing those lands on which no resident Ryots are established, in any mode he may judge proper; of collecting the rents of the whole, through what channel he may deem best suited to his convenience; of providing for the cultivation of waste lands; of improving the general condition of the estate; and finally, of enjoying the surplus revenue, whatever it may be, after paying the regulated assessment to Government. Each party has his rights, but rights differing materially in their nature and degree; both perfectly consistent with each other, as long as avarice and other bad passions do not instigate the Zemindar to oppress his ryots, and which, of course, it should be the principal object of our institutions to prevent.

12. With these impressions respecting the rights of the peasantry, such parts of the provisions contained in Regulation XLIV, 1793, and Regulation XLVII, 1803, as declare that pottahs shall not be granted to Ryots or other persons, for the cultivation of lands for a term exceeding ten years, appear to us to be fundamentally erroneous. The natural and obvious tendency of that rule was to limit and restrict those rights which the peasant possessed in a much more extended sense, by virtue of the constitution of the country itself. The other restrictions contained in the same provision may have been dictated by a wise and cautious policy. No doubt, the public revenue might have suffered, had the Zemindars and others possessed an unlimited power to let the lands to farm, or to grant dependent talooks for an indefinite term of years, at a reduced rent or jumma: but if any restriction of that nature was requisite with respect to the Ryots, it should have been to prevent the grant of pottahs, at a rate of rent inferior to the ordinary rates of the pergunnahs; and in point of time, the pottahs should, we think, on the grounds already noticed, have been absolutely unlimited.

13. The restrictions above noticed have, indeed, been modified by two separate Regulations passed in the year 1812,* but not in a way altogether consonant with the sentiments which we entertain on the subject.—We have already observed, that we thought that a material error had been committed in the Regulations of 1793, by blending together the pottahs of the Ryots and tenures of quite a different character. The same error, if it be one, is observable in the Regulations of 1812, to which we have just adverted.—Exclusively of that consideration, the provisions in question are only applicable to those parts of the country in which a permanent settlement has been already formed, while in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces limitations are still established with respect to the tenure of the Ryots, quite at variance with those rights which we consider them to possess under the general constitution of all Indian Governments. It will naturally occur to your Honourable Court, that considerable difficulty must be now experienced in putting the rights of the peasantry on their proper footing, and that the utmost circumspection should be observed in the performance of that duty: we therefore propose to communicate the tenor of these remarks to the Board of Commissioners, and to require their sentiments regarding the course which should in their judgment be followed with respect to this question. But whatever rights the Ryots may be declared in theory to possess, the practical benefits arising from any measure of that sort will be very limited, "until means shall be devised" (to use the terms of a late letter to the Board of Commissioners) "on the occurrence of disputed claims, of ascertaining "with accuracy and facility the rent which they should individually pay, and "an authority created for deciding on all such cases with the utmost promptitude." This brings us naturally to treat of the third and fourth branches of this interesting and important subject.

Canongoes

* Regulations V. and XVIII.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 7 October 1815.

Canongoes and Putwarries.

14. When we advert to the distinguished and respected persons who composed the Government of this presidency in the year 1793, when the general arrangements regarding the permanent settlement, &c. were adopted, we must naturally be slow to consider any measure as unwise or injudicious which emanated from that authority. But what we do not presume to condemn we may take leave to lament; and we believe that uniform experience, both in the administration of civil justice and in the settlement and collection of the public revenue, has at length fully established, that the offices, both of Pergunnah Canongoe and of Putwarry, form necessary, and we might add, indispensable links in the chain of public authorities in this country. The reasoning on which the important measure of abolishing those offices was founded,* does not appear to us conclusive or satisfactory. It assumes, that as regular courts had been established for the adjudication of all private rights, the necessity of the office of Canongoe was thereby superseded; but the means of obtaining the requisite information to enable those courts to judge of the validity of private claims were for the most part thus placed absolutely beyond their reach. If abuses existed in the discharge of the functions of that office, the object should have been reform, and not annihilation. But it is unnecessary to dwell upon the reasons which might have been assigned, at the period above noticed, against the abolition of the office to which these remarks more immediately allude, or which may now be urged in favour of the revival of it, and for the reform of the office of Putwarry, as your Honourable Court have been pleased to express an opinion decidedly favourable to the adoption of those measures. Fortunately, both the offices in question have been still retained in the Western Provinces; and although that of Putwarry may be less efficient, even there, than might be wished, and considered in its relation to the functions of the Collector, may be fettered with some restrictions which it is no doubt expedient to remove, still we are not aware that any serious difficulties will occur, in placing both those offices on their proper footing in the territories subject to the immediate superintendence of the Board of Commissioners. It may naturally be expected, that greater difficulty will arise in the accomplishment of that object in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, where the office of Putwarry is almost nugatory, and that of Canongoe has long since been entirely extinct; but with the sentiments above expressed, we shall spare no pains for the establishment of both those institutions, on the proper footing, also in the last mentioned provinces. For your further information on this subject, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to our dispatch of the 19th August last, and to the copy of the orders issued by us to the Board of Commissioners, which accompanied that dispatch.

15. We have already intimated, that with the view of affording full protection to the peasantry from undue exactions, it was not only essential that means should be employed to collect, digest, and register the details which alone can afford accurate data for judging of those rights in any disputed case (which duty, as already noticed, will be best effected by means of the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry), but that it was likewise indispensably necessary to institute an authority which might decide upon all the disputed claims between landlord and tenant, and generally between all persons, from the Sudder Malguzar to the cultivator of the soil, with promptitude and dispatch. Our address of the above date will inform your Honourable Court, that we conceive that this object will be best accomplished by the revival of the Maul Adawluts, which independently of other advantages, will at once relieve the regular courts of judicature from a heavy load of business, and enable them, as we hope, to dispose of the remainder on their present establishments, without material delay or difficulty. The observations contained in our letter to the Board of Commissioners on this subject† preclude the necessity of entering into any details regarding it in this place, and we shall therefore confine ourselves to the expression of our hope, that this, among other arrangements, will meet the concurrence of your Honourable Court.

16. In the foregoing remarks, we have endeavoured to lay before you, as briefly as possible, our sentiments on those questions which must be deemed of primary importance to the improvement of the public resources, to the speedy adjudication of disputed claims in matters connected with the public revenue, and to the protection of the peasantry from oppression. This object, as before remarked,* we thought would be better effected by taking a connected view of the subject, than by replying seriatim to the observations on this question, which are contained in the different dispatches above acknowledged. But many of those observations will again come under discussion, in consequence of the references made by us to the Board of Commissioners on particular points noticed in them; as, for instance, the several descriptions of tenures, the grant of pottahs, &c.: and, on the whole, we venture to express a hope, that the subject generally has been put into such a train of inquiry and discussion, as will lead to the adoption of substantial reforms, consonant with the general sentiments of your Honourable Court, and in no slight degree beneficial to the general interests of the country.

Letter to, dated 6th January last

Par (13 to 54) Approve the triennial settlement of Bundlecund, the terms of which are considered creditable to the exertions of the Board of Commissioners and to Mr. Wauchope. Notice the inadequate assessment of certain pergunnahs, and remark on the necessity of effecting a revenue survey of lands previously to the formation of a settlement of them.

23. We derive satisfaction from observing, that your Honourable Court has been pleased to approve the terms on which the settlement of Bundlecund has been concluded for the years 1217, 1218, and 1219. A copy of paragraphs 46 to 53 has been forwarded to the Board of Commissioners, with instructions to submit to us their mature sentiments on the course which should be pursued, with a view to the attainment of the important objects noticed by your Honourable Court.

24. In communicating the sentiments of your Honourable Court to the Board of Commissioners, we took occasion to observe that we were fully aware of the difficulties which have arisen, as well on the side of the Ryots themselves as on the part of the Zemindars, in enforcing the existing rules regarding the delivery of pottahs; but that those difficulties only rendered it the more necessary that the subject should receive a full discussion, in order that, if the obstacles in question be really insurmountable, other means might be devised for securing the peasantry from the exactions to which it is apprehended they are at present so frequently subjected. We also stated our apprehensions, that the evil above-noticed would continue to exist, until means should be established, on the occurrence of disputed claims, of ascertaining with accuracy and facility the rent which they should individually pay, until an authority should be created for deciding in all such cases with the utmost promptitude.

25. We shall, of course, hereafter communicate to your Honourable Court the result of the reference above alluded to as being immediately connected with the subjects discussed in the commencement of this dispatch.

Par. (89 to 97). Observations on statement of lands sold for arrears of Revenue during 1810-11 Approve orders to Board of Commissioners requiring annual statements, and direct that the Board of Revenue be instructed to furnish a similar one for the Lower Provinces.

41. A copy of paragraphs 89 to 90 has been sent to the Board of Revenue, with directions to conform to the orders of your Honourable Court. The Board of Commissioners has also been required to submit to us any remarks or explanations which the tenor of the observations of your Honourable Court, in paragraphs 92 to 97, may suggest to them. We shall hereafter communicate to your Honourable Court the result of this reference.

Par. (98 and 99). Notice the abuses practised by the Zemindars under the powers of distraint vested in them.

42. The observations which we have submitted to your Honourable Court in the commencement of this letter, preclude the necessity of our replying specifically to these paragraphs.

Par (100 to 108) Remark on the necessity of placing the office of Putwarry on an improved footing, and of introducing the Putwarry system into unsettled parts of the country.

43. The preceding remark is equally applicable to the subject of these paragraphs. It will be sufficient to observe, that a copy of the paragraphs noticed in the margin has been forwarded to the Board of Commissioners, with directions to prepare and submit to us the draft of a Regulation for amending the constitution of the office of Putwarry, on the principle suggested by your Honourable Court.

63. A copy

(Par. 138). Collectors to be instructed to avoid the use of native designations or to explain them in a marginal note.

63. A copy of this paragraph has been sent to the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners, with directions to instruct the several Collectors to conform to the orders of your Honourable Court.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 7 October 1815.

65. In the nineteenth paragraph of our letter of the 2d October 1813, we had the honour to report to your Honourable Court that we had forwarded a copy of the documents which accompanied your dispatch of the 29th January 1813, for the consideration of the Board of Commissioners.

66. The proceedings noted in the margin* contain a letter from the Board of Commissioners, submitting such remarks and suggestions as occurred to them on the important subject discussed in your orders above quoted.

67. The tenor of the observations of the Board of Commissioners, as stated in their report, is calculated to confirm the impression which we have uniformly entertained of the prejudicial and ruinous effects of khas management, and of the impracticability of introducing the Ryotwarree system into these provinces, consistently with a due regard to the interests of Government, or to the rights of the actual proprietors of the soil, as recognized and confirmed by successive legislative enactments.

68. In the fifth paragraph of their letter the Board have justly observed, that in the few instances in which a Ryotwarree settlement could be adopted in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, the ministry of native agents, in the present constitution of the Revenue branch of the service, appears to be unavoidable, and that the invariable result of the direct interference of the officers of Government in the collection of the mofussil rents of each cultivator, in the instances in which it has been attempted, furnishes grounds for estimating the probable failure of every arrangement of minute detail, where the ministry of native agents may be necessary.

69. We are not prepared to offer our sentiments in detail on the measure suggested in the ninth and following paragraphs of the Board's letter; but we may observe, generally, that whatever benefits to Government or to the public might reasonably be expected to result from the multiplication of European agency, in the mode suggested by the Board, it would be obviously impracticable, in the present state of the civil service, to subdivide every district of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces into assistant collectorships of about four or five lacs each; and we apprehend that any general arrangement of that nature, though adopted on a much more contracted scale, would necessarily be attended with a very considerable addition of expense.

70. The subject of the Board's letter having been brought under the immediate notice of the Right Honourable the Governor General, during his Lordship's residence at Furruckabad, we shall postpone the further consideration of it until his Lordship's return to the seat of Government.

other terms, for a period not exceeding ten years, calculating from the expiration of the year in which such renewal may take place. All evasions of the prohibitions contained in this section, by entering into two separate engagements, leases, or pottahs, at the same time, dating an engagement, lease, or pottah, subsequent to the period at which it may have been actually executed, or by any other device, shall be considered as an infringement of them; and every engagement fixing the jumma of a dependant Talookdar, and every lease or pottah which has been, or may be concluded or granted, in opposition to such prohibitions, is declared null and void. Regulation XLIV, A.D. 1793.

Section V. Whenever the whole or a portion of the lands of any Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall be disposed of at public sale for the discharge of arrears of the public assessment, all engagements which such proprietor shall have contracted with dependant Talookdars, whose talooks may be situated in the lands sold, as also all leases to under-farmers, and pottahs to Ryots for the cultivation of the whole or any part of such lands (with the exception of the engagements, pottahs, and leases, specified in sections 7 and 8), shall stand cancelled from the day of sale, and the purchaser or purchasers of the lands shall be at liberty to collect from such dependant Talookdars, and from the Ryots or cultivators of the lands let in farm, and the lands not farmed, whatever the former proprietor would have been entitled to demand, according to the established usages and rates of the pergunnah or district in which such lands may be situated, had the engagements so cancelled never existed.

EXTRACT REGULATION XLVII, A. D. 1803.

Section II. First. No Zemindars, independent Talookdars, or other actual proprietors of land, after having engaged for the triennial, quartennial, or other periodical assessment of their estate, under the proclamation specified in Section 39, Regulation XXV. 1803, and the further provisions stated in that Regulation, and under Regulation XXVII. 1803, nor any persons on their behalf, shall dispose of a dependant talook, or other land tenure of whatever denomination, to be held at the same or at any jumma, or shall fix, at any amount, the jumma of an existing dependant talook or land tenure, for a term extending beyond the term of their own existing engagements with Government, nor let any lands in farm, nor grant pottahs to Ryots, or other persons, for the cultivation of lands, for a term extending beyond the term of their own lease from Government. This rule and prohibition shall be considered to be in force until a permanent settlement shall be concluded, under the Regulations above mentioned; and any lease or engagement given or received in opposition thereto, shall be void and of no effect, as far as regards the amount of rent thereby illegally stipulated, but without affecting any other rights which the parties respectively may possess, or to which they may be entitled. Regulation XLVII, A. D. 1803

Second. No Zemindars, independent Talookdars, or other actual proprietors of land, with whom a permanent settlement shall be hereafter concluded for the fixed and perpetual assessment of their respective estates, under the provisions specified in Regulations XXV and XXVII, 1803, nor any persons on their behalf, shall dispose of a dependant talook or other land tenure, to be held at the same or at any jumma, or fix at any amount the jumma of an existing dependant talook or other tenure, for a term exceeding ten years, nor let any lands in farm, nor grant pottahs to Ryots or other persons, for the cultivation of land for a term exceeding ten years. Nor shall it be lawful for any Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, who may have entered into an engagement with any dependant Talookdar, fixing the jumma of his talook for a term not exceeding ten years, or let any lands in farm, or granted pottahs for the cultivation of lands for a term not exceeding ten years, to renew such engagement, lease, or pottah, at any period before the expiration of it (with the exception specified in the following clause), excepting in the last year, at any time during which it shall be lawful for the parties to renew such engagement, lease, or pottah, upon the same or any other terms, for a term not exceeding ten years, calculated from the expiration of the year in which which such renewal may take place. All evasions of the prohibitions contained in this clause, by entering into two separate engagements, leases, or pottahs, at the same time; dating an engagement, lease, or pottah, subsequent to the period at which it may have been actually executed; or by any other device, shall be considered as an infringement of them; and every engagement fixing the jumma of a dependant Talookdar, or other tenant of land, and every lease or pottah which has been or shall be concluded or granted in opposition to such prohibitions, is declared to be null and void, as far as respects the jumma or rent thereby illegally stipulated, but without affecting any other rights which the parties respectively may possess, or to which they may be entitled.

Third. Nothing contained in the foregoing clause shall be considered as restricting Zemindars, independent Talookdars, or other actual proprietors of land, with whom a permanent settlement shall be concluded, from cancelling engagements into which they may have entered with any dependant Talookdar for a term not exceeding ten years, at any time during such engagement, or from granting a new lease to such dependant Talookdar, for a period not exceeding ten years from the date of cancelling the former engagements; provided the parties concerned shall be mutually desirous of cancelling the former lease, and of entering into a new one for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall voluntarily consent to the same; and provided further, that the transaction shall not be founded in collusive or fraudulent motives, intended to affect the rights or interests of Government, or of any person or persons. Whenever it shall appear that a former lease has been cancelled, and that a new lease has been granted, before the commencement of the last year of the former lease, without the mutual consent of the parties concerned, or that the parties had been influenced by collusive or fraudulent motives in entering into new engagements of the above nature, such engagements are declared to be null and void, and the former engagements shall be restored, subject to the operation of the Regulations relating to them.

Section V, Whenever the whole or a portion of the lands of any Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall be disposed of at public sale, for the discharge of arrears of the public assessment, all engagements which such proprietor shall have contracted with dependant Talookdars, or other dependant landholders, whose talooks or tenures may be situated in the lands sold, as also all leases to under-farmers and pottahs to Ryots, for the cultivation of the whole or any part of such lands (with the exception of the pottahs and leases specified in Section 7 of this Regulation), shall stand cancelled from the day of sale, provided the public sale for arrears of assessment shall have taken place before the expiration of the second month of the current fussily year, or from the commencement of the ensuing year, in case such public sale shall hav, taken place at any time after the second month of the current year; and the purchaser or purchasers of the lands, in all such cases, shall be at liberty to collect from such dependant Talookdars or other dependant landholders, and from the Ryots or cultivators of the lands let in farm and the lands not farmed, whatever the former proprietor would have been entitled to demand, according to the established usages and rates of the pergunnah or district in which such lands shall be situated, had the engagements so cancelled never existed; provided, however, that all dependant Talookdars, or other dependant landholders, and all Ryots, or cultivators of land, whose leases and pottahs may become cancelled by a public sale, on account of arrears of assessment under this Section, shall be entitled to receive and to demand from the purchaser new pottahs, in conformity to the tenth and eleventh articles of the proclamation published by the Honourable the late Lieutenant-Governor and the Board of Commissioners in the Ceded Provinces, under date the 14th July, 1802, with the eleventh and twelfth Clauses of Section 53, Regulation XXVII, 1803, and under the rules prescribed in Regulation XXX, 1803, or any other Regulation which may be hereafter passed for the protection and welfare of dependant Talookdars, Ryots, and other cultivators of the soil, in pursuance of the first Clause of Section 35, Regulation XXV, 1803.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 9 June 1815.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,
Dated 9th June 1815.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

Letter from, dated 19th June 1813.

(Par. 30 to 34.) Result of the quartennial settlement of the Ceded Provinces, which expired with fusly 1219, or on the 20th September 1812.

Par. 28. THE report of the Board of Commissioners, to which you have drawn our atttention in the paragraphs noted in the margin, exhibits the following view of the revenues of the Ceded Provinces during the quartennial settlement.

ALLAHABAD.

Years.	Jumma. Rupees.	Collections. Rupees.	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	25,97,939	25,08,145	89,794
1217	26,43,630	26,23,275	20,354
1218	26,51,828	26,20,820	31,007
1219	26,88,541	26,62,841	25,700
Total, Rupees	1,05,81,938	1,04,15,081	1,66,855

The jumma of 1219, the last year of the settlement, exhibits an increase of Rupees 3,69,306 upon the jumma of 1215, the year immediately preceding the settlement, and the whole outstanding balance is little more than one and a half per cent. upon the total demand.

BAREILLY.

Years.	Jumma Rupees	Collections. Rupees	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	24,97,563	23,78,061	1,19,502
1217	28,71,705	28,38,090	33,615
1218	31,98,810	30,50,774	1,48,035
1219	31,65,559	28,68,064	2,97,494
Total, Rupees	1,17,33,637	1,11,34,989	5,98,646

The jumma of 1219 exceeds the jumma of 1215 by Rupees 7,98,264, and the aggregrate outstanding balance exceeds five per cent. upon the aggregate jumma of the settlement. We observe, however, that three-fourths of the arrears of 1219 are expected to be collected, whilst but a very small proportion of the balance of 1218 is considered to be recoverable. We are afraid that the jumma of 1218 was very injudiciously increased to the extent of more than three lacks of rupees, after the increase of nearly four lacks which had taken place in the year immediately preceding. We are not less desirous of cautioning you against rapid additions to the assessment of our territories than against fixing premature limits to it.

CAWNPORE.

Years.	Jumma. Rupees.	Collections. Rupees.	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	27,17,819	26,82,727	35,091
1217	not stated	26,95,320	30,340
1218	not stated	26,75,869	53,354
1219	27,31,263	26,81,875	49,388
Total in four years, as stated in the Report of the Board ......Rupees	1,09,03,967	1,07,35,791	1,68,173

The average jumma of this province under the quartennial settlement, fell short of the average jumma under the first triennial settlement, by more than two lacks of rupees, and of the average jumma of the second triennial settlement by nearly one lack. We observe, however, that the total balance uncollected at the conclusion of the triennial settlement, did not much exceed one and a half per cent. upon the total demand.

29. The

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 9 June 1815.

29. The revenue administration of Cawnpore furnishes a striking proof of the fatal effects of over-assessment upon the interests of Government, as well as upon those of the landholders.

ETAWAH.

Years.	Jumma. Rupees.	Collections. Rupees.	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	28,57,410	27,79,566	77,843
1217	29,93,373	29,30,039	63,333
1218	30,10,546	29,49,866	60,679
1219	30,04,692	28,17,177	1,87,515
Total, Rupees	1,18,66,021	1,14,76,648	3,89,370

The difference between the jumma of Etawah in 1219 and 1215 is Rupees 4,16,499 in favour of the former year. The outstanding balance, at the conclusion of the settlement, was three and three-elevenths per cent. on the total demand, but it was expected to be reduced by subsequent collections to two and a quarter per cent.

FURRUCKABAD.

Years.	Jumma. Rupees.	Collections. Rupees.	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	9,72,186	9,06,697	65,488
1217	not stated	9,81,591	5,443
1218	not stated	9,75,537	18,023
1219	9,98,766	9,06,494	92,271
Total jumma of four years, as stated in the Board's Report, ...Rupees	39,51,548	37,70,319	1,81,225

In the district of Furruckabad, the increase effected by the quartennial settlement on the previous assessment was very inconsiderable, and the heavy balances outstanding, on account of 1216 and 1219, are ascribed to the severe drought experienced in both those years.

GORUCKPORE.

Years.	Jumma Rupees.	Collections. Rupees.	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	17,13,625	16,94,156	19,468
1217	not stated	16,78,550	51,450
1218	not stated	17,05,997	35,813
1219	17,75,377	16,99,362	76,014
Total jumma of four years, as per Report ......Rupees	69,60,815	67,78,065	1,82,745

The jumma of 1219 shows an excess on the highest jumma of the former settlement of Rupees 1,67,186, and the total outstanding balance is at the rate of one and five-eighths per cent. on the total demand of the quartennial settlement.

MORADABAD.

Years.	Jumma. Rupees.	Collections. Rupees.	Outstanding Balance. Rupees.
1216	24,24,910	23,85,335	39,574
1217	24,79,617	24,17,549	62,068
1218	24,98,672	24,24,560	74,111
1219	25,46,548	24,16,347	1,30,200
Total, Rupees	99,49,747	96,43,791	3,05,953

The jumma of 1219 exceeded that of 1215 by Rupees 1,48,948. The outstanding balance on account of the quartennial settlement exceeds three per cent:

cent. on the jumma. We observe, however, that the balance of 1219 was still in train of liquidation, and that one half of it was expected to be immediately realized.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 9 June 1815.

30. The omission of fractions in the foregoing abstracts will account for the sums total of collections and balances not exactly corresponding with the sum total of demand.

General Result of the Quartennial Settlement in the Seven Ceded Provinces.

Years.	Jumma. Rupees.	Collections Rupees.	Balance. Rupees
1216	1,57,81,454	1,53,34,841	4,46,613
1217	1,64,31,103	1,61,64,496	2,66,607
1218	1,68,24,452	1,64,03,426	4,21,026
1219	1,69,10,748	1,60,52,161	8,58,586
Total, Rupees	6,59,47,757	6,39,54,924	19,92,832

The total balance, as it stood at the termination of 1219, was somewhat more than three per cent. on the entire demand; but if, as the Board expected, a fourth part of the arrears were afterwards collected, the irrecoverable balance would ultimately be reduced to two and a quarter per cent.

31. The difference between the first and the fourth year's jumma is Rupees 11,29,294; and the difference between the jumma of 1219, the last year of the quartennial settlement, and the jumma of 1215, the last year of the preceding settlement, is Rupees 19,32,864.

32. We concur with you in regarding the foregoing results as highly satisfactory. They are very creditable to the Board of Commissioners, and to the gentlemen employed under them in the collection of the revenue; and they contain a practical refutation of the strained opinions of those who maintain, that periodical settlements interpose insuperable obstacles in the way of improvement, and consequently, that we have nothing to expect, but on the contrary much to lose, by delaying to fix in perpetuity our demand upon the lands.

33. It would certainly have been gratifying to us to be informed that cultivation in the Ceded Provinces had made equal advances with the land-revenue; and the report of the Board of Commissioners is defective, in not conveying any information on this important point. But giving credit, as we do, to the Board, for judicious and prudent management, we must believe that the assessment has not been much, if at all increased, beyond the means of the contributors to pay it; or, in other words, that it has not been considerably increased beyond the ratio in which cultivation has been extended.

34. The effect of a permanent settlement of the lands, such as has been established in the Lower Provinces, is to augment the landlord's rent, not the profit of the cultivator; and it is from neglecting to make this distinction that an inference has been drawn, in our opinion, very unwarrantably, of the incompatibility of temporary settlements with agricultural improvement. The rent of the landlord may be very large, without any part of it being expended in improvements; and, on the other hand, if the cultivator be well paid for his labour, and at the same time reap a fair profit on the capital employed on his farm, he has every necessary inducement to continue his industry, although there should be no surplus to be paid in the shape of rent to the landlord.

Letter from, dated 10th January 1814. (Par. 19 to 32) Arrangements in the district of Bareilly.

80. We have read the correspondence and proceedings brought before us in these paragraphs with an unusual degree of satisfaction. They relate not only to the settlement which had been concluded, but also, as you justly observe, "to the future security and improvement, not only of the land revenue, but of the different resources which are or may be drawn from the extensive and valuable district of Bareilly."

81. The settlement, which is for five years (i. e. from 1220 to 1224 inclusive), we find to have been formed under the immediate superintendance of Mr.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 9 June 1815.

Mr. Deane, the junior Commissioner, aided by his two assistants and by the Collector, Mr. Christian. Mr. Deane, as it appears from the letter to you from Sir Edward Colebrooke, the senior Commissioner, dated the 29th September 1813, had for the preceding ten months devoted his attention almost exclusively to the internal management of the revenues of that zillah. His proceedings exhibit the important advantages to be derived even from the temporary application of zeal, ability, and experience, in the administration of an unsettled country, while the exertion of those qualities has, in the present instance, been the fortunate means of developing a series of facts and considerations, which operate in strong confirmation of the views and reasonings which we have of late years enforced, of the expediency, both on public and private grounds, of not proceeding to the measure of permanently settling the revenues in any part of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, until every practicable information be obtained of their resources and of the rights of Government and of individuals.

82. The terms of the settlement which was effected by Mr. Deane are as follow:

In 1220 .... Rupees	32,67,686
1221	34,52,029
1222	35,84,541
1223	36,53,701
1224	37,11,896

83. Although the jumma of 1220 is said to have exceeded that of the year immediately preceding in the sum of Rupees 1,02,000 only, the revenue of the province is represented to have experienced, in the course of four years, an increase of no less than ten lacks; and we observe that a further increase of five lacks was expected before the termination of the settlement. This expectation seems to be fully warranted by the statements contained in Mr. Deane's report, viz. that "the eastern pergunnahs of the district contain immense tracts of "land, formerly highly productive and populous, but now waste, from the oppressive conduct of the former Government or other local causes, which are "again rapidly advancing in prosperity; that the lands are not assessed to the "full extent of their ability to pay; that they actually did pay more to the "Vizier's Government; and that the wealth accruing to the proprietors from "the former low assessment makes them in a great degree independent of "seasons."

84. With reference to the difficulties described in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of Mr. Deane's report, we deem the present settlement extremely creditable to that gentleman and his assistants.

85. We are also satisfied, by the various important considerations which are submitted, as well in that document as in your letter now before us, of the sound policy of your resolution authorising the division of the district of Bareilly into two collectorships.

86. We agree with you in opinion, that the multiplication of European agency in the collection of the revenues, would tend not only to improve the public revenues, but likewise to protect the people from many abuses which, there is too much reason to apprehend, they are subject to from the misconduct of native officers. But when we advert to the great extent of our territories, to the liberal scale of allowances which has been established for such of our covenanted servants as, from experience and rank in the service, are qualified to fill the station of Collector, and to the caution which is requisite, on our part, in authorizing a certain expense in the expectation of a reimbursement which must ever be more or less precarious, we should have hesitated in sanctioning the appointment of an additional Collector in that district, had it not appeared to be justified by very substantial reasons of a local nature.

87. To the validity of the following reasons, therefore, we have far less difficulty in subscribing, than to those which have been advanced, of a more general nature, in favour of the measure.

88. With a view to the revision of the present settlement at the period of its expiration, and the formation of another (a duty which, you observe, could not be be efficiently performed by a single person), it was undoubtedly of the highest importance that the Revenue officers should be made competent to the task in point of number, and that they should have time, before commencing it, to inform themselves, as accurately as possible, of the extent and produce of estates. The combination alleged to have existed among the landholders, towards the close of the last settlement, to reduce their cultivation, in order to compel the Government to lower the assessment, and the loss of revenue, estimated at not less than two lacks of rupees, resulting from the inability of the Collector to check that combination, on account of the extent of the district, which is stated to comprise twelve thousand Malguzars, served strongly to recommend an arrangement calculated to prevent the occurrence of similar mischiefs. To these considerations were added the prospect which, we trust, was not unfounded, of augmenting the public receipts by the recovery of lands alienated by fraud, the introduction of town-duties at the new Collector's head station, and the improvement of the abkarry revenue.

89. We confirm the establishment which you have authorized for the new collectorship of Shajehanpore, amounting to Rupees 1,176 per month; which, we observe, will be covered, to the extent of Rupees 740 per month, by the abolition of the tehsildarry establishment of that pergunnah. The total expense of the revised tehsildarry establishment for the whole district of Bareilly, including both collectorships, amounting to about two and a half per cent. on the jnmma, we agree with you is not immoderate.

90. We likewise sanction the donation of Rupees 5,000, which you have authorized to be paid to Unund Ram, as a reward for the services rendered by him in the settlement of a portion of the district of Bareilly, and, as would appear from a letter of Mr. Chamberlain on a former occasion, in the formation of the settlement of Illahabad. Of the policy of granting rewards of this description from time to time, we entertain no doubt, provided that they are strictly confined to persons distinguished by their fidelity and zeal in the public service: we only regret, that instances so rarely occur among the native officers, in which claims to them can justly be preferred.

91. We cannot with too great earnestness recommend to your attention the observations contained in Mr. Deane's letter, on the importance of a proper selection of persons to perform the duties of Collector, in all districts not permanently settled. He justly observes, that "no punctuality of payment for a "length of time, under an efficient Collector, will secure the revenue under a "successor who is not so;" and that "it is not possible for any legislative "provision, or any controlling superintendance of the Board, however alert, to "counterbalance the destructive effects of a want of vigour and intelligence in "the Collector." We have no doubt, as well from the cast and tenour of Mr. Deane's observations, as from what has of late years appeared upon your records, that past experience in the history of the revenue proceedings in the Upper Provinces had forcibly suggested to him the necessity of drawing the particular attention of your Government to this matter. The duty of a Collector is unquestionably far more difficult and arduous in provinces such as we refer to, than in districts where a permanent settlement has taken place. In the Lower Provinces, where, as it is observed by Mr. Deane, the permanent assessment has been introduced, while it bars all further investigation, has given a value to landed property (generally speaking, at least), which can always be realized by exposing it to public sale; and that, where the long-continued mutations of ownership have facilitated transfer, the recovery of an arrear of revenue is simply a mechanical process But where, as in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, you are only in the course of introducing such an arrangement; where the ownership cannot be taken with safety from the ancient proprietor, and ought not, if it could, for any but very grave reasons; where purchasers can seldom be got on any, and never on adequate terms, the whole security of the public revenue must rest on the personal activity and judgment of the Collector, in a recourse to prompt measures at the only moment when they can be effectual. Still more is that activity and judgment rendered necessary, in conducting those preliminary arrangements which form the basis of the system to be finally established, which cannot be properly proceeded in without much carefulpersevering, and laborious inquiry into local institutions and personal rights, and on the correctness of which arrangements must necessarily depend the future welfare and prosperity of the country. We must, therefore, pointedly enforce upon you the necessity of nominating no one to a collectorship in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, who is not qualified for such a charge, by confirmed ability and knowledge to aid and direct him in his course.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL, Dated the 4th July 1817.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces.)

Letter to, 9th June 1815.

(Par. 28 to 34.) Respecting the quartennial settlement of the Ceded Provinces.

Par. 23. We are happy to find that the result of the quartennial settlement of the Ceded Provinces has proved generally satisfactory to your Honourable Court.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 4 July 1817.

24. It does not appear to us necessary to trouble you, in this place, with any detailed discussion in regard to the effects of periodical settlements; but we can assure your Honourable Court, that in all our proceedings under the present system, we are anxiously alive to the importance of avoiding the evils of over-assessment, which your Honourable Court so justly press upon our attention.

25. Our recent dispatches will have satisfied your Honourable Court of the anxiety with which we look to the object of securing the just rights of every class of the agricultural population; and we fully admit with your Honourable Court, that the general advantages of the permanent settlement in the Lower Provinces have, in a considerable degree, been limited by the want of arrangements calculated to protect the inferior classes.

(80 to 91.) Arrangements in the districts of Bareilly and Seharunpore.

50. We have great satisfaction in receiving the sanction of your Honourable Court to the arrangements regarding the districts of Bareilly and North Seharunpore, which are referred to in these paragraphs.

51. It has not, indeed, been found practicable to maintain the full assessment which the settlement in question gave for the years 1223 and 1224.

52. The enhanced demand was, doubtless, in some cases agreed to by the Zemindars then just admitted to engage, either in ignorance of the real capabilities of their estates, or on the prospect of enlarged culture, which their poverty and the circumstances of the season disappointed.

53. The numerous divisions of estates formerly held in farm by a single individual, naturally tended very greatly to increase the difficulty of accurately distributing the revenue of Government, in the proportions which the lands of each Zemindar were calculated to bear.

54. To enforce the enhanced demand generally, would, we are satisfied, have been very seriously to risk the future prosperity of those valuable districts, while, at the same time, their capability of improvement affords an additional motive for present forbearance.

55. The circumstances of the past year have been such as still further to evince the necessity of the measure which we adopted, of relinquishing the enhanced demand of the years 1222 and 1223; and it may possibly be found necessary to carry into effect the arrangements connected with Regulation XVI, 1816, to make even some further reduction.

56. When, however, your Honourable Court consider the magnitude of the jumma still maintained for the year 1222, which amounted for the two districts in question to Rupees 36,39,090, you will not, we trust, hesitate to recognize the necessity of placing the management of these districts under two distinct Collectors.

57. We feel satisfied, indeed, that that measure was indispensably necessary to the securi[illegible] the public interest from the most serious injury.

58. The

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 4 July 1817.

58. The benefit derived from the labours of the officers by whom the settlement was made, will still be such as justly to entitle them to distinguished approbation; and if they erred in the first instance, by overlooking, in some degree, those circumstances which might have suggested doubts of the expediency of enhancing the jumma to the full extent to which their arrangements carried it, and in scarcely making sufficient allowance for the recurrence of calamity of season, the error must be considered to have been redeemed, by the readiness with which the same officers pointed it out and suggested its correction.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL, Dated 16*th June* 1815.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 16 June 1815.

Letter from, dated 19th June 1813. (Par. 6 to 18.) Remarks on the Court's opinion, that a detailed collection of the revenue from the cultivators is preferable to the system of farming it.—Regulation I, 1813, regarding the temporary settlement of Cuttack.

Par. 6. As the passage in our dispatch of the 9th September 1812, which occasioned the remarks in the paragraphs noted in the margin, related to the revenue administration of Cuttack, we shall take your general observations, in conjunction with the arrangements which have been adopted for a settlement of that district, under the provisions of Regulation I, 1813, as communicated to us in paragraphs 61 to 63 of of your letter now under reply, and also with the correspondence to which you have drawn our attention in paragraph 10 of your subsequent letter, dated the 10th January 1814.

7. In the eighteenth paragraph of our dispatch from this department, dated the 1st February 1811, we observed that two of your members of the Board of Revenue in 1808 had admitted "their want of knowledge of the boun- "daries and extent of a province of which we came into possession in 1803, "their ignorance of the quantity of land liable to assessment, of its produce "and value, of the state and extent of cultivation, of the nature of the "tenures by which property is held, in short, of the rights and interests both "of Government and the subject; that we could not, in the absence of all "explanation, reconcile that deficiency of information with an assiduous and "actual discharge of the duties confided to the Board." Considering, at the same time, that so little was then known respecting the actual state of Cuttack, we approved of your having deputed Mr. C. Buller, one of the members of the Board, with Mr. G. Warde as an assistant, to superintend a temporary settlement of the district; and we expressed a hope that the information which should be obtained by the Commissioner, in the performance of that duty, would enable you, at some future and not very distant period, to proceed to a permanent settlement of its land revenues, on principles mutually advantageous to Government and the landholders.

8. In the twenty-eighth paragraph of our general dispatch from this department, dated the 29th January 1812, we expressed our disappointment at not having found on your proceedings a report from Mr. Buller on the condition and resources of the province, calculated to remedy the deficiency of information which obtained at the period of his appointment, and which it ought to have been his first business to supply.

9. In the twelfth paragraph of our dispatch, dated the 9th September 1812, we again pressed the subject on your attention; and after noticing the defects of the reports submitted by Mr. Buller and the Collector, we desired that your Board of Revenue should be held responsible for obtaining the fullest information with regard to the internal resources, and every thing having reference to them in that portion of our territories.

10. The documents we have now before us abundantly testify the expediency of those admonitions which we have at different times conveyed to you on this subject. The settlement formed under the superintendence of the Commission appointed in 1808, first for one year and afterwards for two years, was concluded on data which it now clearly appears were most imperfect; and when the triennial settlement concluded by that Commission expired, in fusily 1219, we find an avowal of want of local knowledge repeated, in terms certainly tainly not less strong and explicit than those in which it had been made prior to the deputation.

11. Mr. Richardson, whom you deputed, in 1813, to resettle the district, states in one of his letters,* that "no revenue documents are procurable that "can be depended upon, whereby to ascertain the former revenue, or the pre-"sent assets and capability of the lands;" and in another letter,† written also previously to his departure from the presidency, he speaks of being "en-"tirely in the dark with respect to local information, on the extensive and "accurate possession of which alone can any reasonable hope of forming a "settlement, on wise, equitable, or just principles, be founded."

12. We are very far from disapproving of your having deputed Mr. Richardson to that district, under the rules prescribed in Regulation XIII of 1811, being satisfied that a member of the Board of Revenue cannot be more usefully employed than in superintending the settlement of an extensive province; a task, at all times, of great importance, and the right performance of which, in the present instance, must be attended with peculiar difficulty.

13. Mr. Richardson seems, indeed, to have set out with very just notions of the importance of the duty assigned him, and of the necessity of patient and minute investigation and research on the spot, in order to a just apportionment of the demands of Government on a large tract of country, including a great variety of soil and many sources of taxation under different tenures and heads. We know of no method of accurately ascertaining the present assets and capability of the lands, excepting by a hastabood. Unfortunately, we do not find that such a proceeding was prescribed to Mr. Richardson, or that it ever was in agitation; and without either authentic accounts of past and present produce, or a minute investigation of assets, the Commission can have no other data, whereby to regulate their conduct in fixing the amount and distribution of the assessment, than the jumma and collections of former years of the British administration, in the whole course of which it is unequivocally confessed that you have been acting entirely in the dark.

14. With such imperfect data, we do not at all wonder, therefore, to find a representation from Mr. Richardson, a few months after his arrival in Cuttack,‡ "of the very great difficulty he had experienced in ascertaining the "actual resources of the estates in the district, with such accuracy as would "enable him to form the settlement on fair and impartial principles;" and in adverting to the difficulty just mentioned, as well as to the circumstance of the year 1220 (the settlement of which he was appointed to superintend) being nearly half elapsed before he left the presidency, we are not surprized to find it stated in the same letter, that no enhancement of revenue whatever was expected in that year, and that, at the expiration of 1222, a net increase of only Rupees 25,500 was expected beyond the jumma of 1219.

15. It was enacted, by Regulation I, 1813 (passed on the 27th February 1813), that whereas unavoidable delays had occurred in carrying into effect the provision of Section 4, Regulation X, 1812 (passed on the 11th July 1812), in regard to the settlement of Cuttack, a settlement of the zillah should be made, first for the period of one year, afterwards for the period of two years; and that, on the expiration of the year 1222, a permanent settlement should be concluded of such lands as may be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, conformably to Regulation X, 1812.

16. The causes of the unavoidable delay alluded to in the preamble of Regulation I, 1813, should have been explained, either in your letter or proceedings, seeing that you were thereby reduced to the necessity of offering to the landholders their lands, in the year 1220, on the same terms on which they had been held in 1219, the last year of the triennial lease; and it even appears doubtful whether you could proceed legally against the estates of defaulters who declined to accede to those terms.

17. In the letter from Mr. Richardson, dated 5th October 1813, to which you have drawn our attention in the tenth paragraph of your dispatch of the 10th

* Dated Calcutta, 6th January 1813. † Dated the 24th January 1813.
‡ Letter dated 5th October 1813.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 16 June 1815.

10th January 1814, we do not discover any confirmation of the opinion given in your letter now before us, as to the most eligible mode of realizing the public revenues: on the contrary, some of the facts stated by Mr. Richardson strongly corroborate the objections to which, we informed you, in our dispatch of the 9th September 1812, we considered the practice of farming the land-revenue of Government to be liable, while they, at the same time, shew how very necessary it is to ascertain, with tolerable correctness, the actual resources of a country, before an assessment can be established that shall, on the one hand, not be oppressive to the cultivators, and on the other, shall satisfy the fair and reasonable demands of the state.

18. After mentioning that the very small estates only were so improved in their resources as to admit of any increase of assessment, Mr. Richardson says, "The individuals who tendered for the farms of many estates at a very considerable increase, on the formation of the last settlement, were either deceived with regard to the actual resources of the estates and their capability of improvement, were needy speculators without any accurate information by which they could be guided in making the offers, or were actuated by motives of enmity towards the proprietors. Under one or other of these descriptions, I believe, nearly the whole of the farmers may be included. The revenues were realized by them, during the first two years of their leases, by the most oppressive exactions from the Ryots, and during the last, the public dues were recovered by the sale of the property of the sureties." He goes on to state, that the estates, the revenues of which had been let in farm, were so impoverished, that a reduction of the jumma would be requisite, and that he even entertained great doubts whether he should be able to assess them at the jumma of the year 1216.

19. With these facts before him, we very much approve of Mr. Richardson's resolution to conclude a settlement with the proprietors in all practicable cases, though on terms apparently less favourable than could be obtained from speculators. It would have given us additional satisfaction to have heard, that in cases where it might be impossible to conclude a settlement with the proprietors, without a greater sacrifice than would be justifiable, Mr. Richardson had followed the example of the Commissioners in the Upper Provinces,* by forming engagements with the higher order of peasantry; an arrangement which, they say, they have found to be the most substantial and successful of all others.

20. We cannot agree, under present circumstances, in the application to the province of Cuttack of Mr. Richardson's sentiments, with respect to the benefits which result from a permanent settlement. There could not, in our opinion, be a more indefensible proceeding, than finally to decide on the rights of individuals and the interests of Government, in a state of declared ignorance respecting both.

21. Although it cannot be expected that, under a lease for so short a period as two or three years, much capital will be expended on improvement, we nevertheless, for the reasons given in your Secretary's letter of the 27th February 1813, admit the propriety, under all the circumstances, of the instructions conveyed to Mr. Richardson to make a settlement for the current year, and another temporary settlement for the two subsequent years.

22. It is stated in the same letter, that the Governor-General in Council did not discern much difference, in so far as regarded the prosperity of the country, between a settlement for two, three, or five years; because towards the close of the term, whatever it might be, agricultural improvement would be checked, either by the uncertainty of the proprietors retaining possession of their estates, or from the prospect of obtaining a lighter assessment, by allowing the lands to remain partially waste.

23. Were we to acknowledge the full force of this objection to periodical settlements, still it would not follow, that we should abandon all future claim on the waste lands. Under the provisions of Regulations X of 1812 and I of 1813, a perpetual settlement will be concluded, at the close of 1222, of all such estates as may be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the the measure, the right being still reserved to Government of assessing the waste lands in proportion as they are brought into cultivation, and preparatory to their being gradually included in the perpetual settlement. We know not, indeed, how this process can be gone through, without a survey of the land previous to the partial settlement in perpetuity, which will take place in 1822, and an accurate register of the lands which may be brought into cultivation subsequently to the conclusion of that settlement.

* Commissioners' report, dated 23d August 1814

24. But we are by no means disposed to admit the proposition, that periodical settlements are necessarily fatal to improvement; and we are fortified in our opinion, not only by the testimony of a gentleman of great knowledge and experience, who took an active part in the measures preparatory to the introduction of the permanent settlement into Bengal, but by our recent experience of their effects in the Western Provinces. Mr. Shore observes, in his minute dated the 18th June 1789, "Whether the proportion of jungle is more or less "than a third of the Company's territorial possessions in Hindostan, I know "not; but with respect to the past, I am, from my own observation, as far as "it has extended, authorized to affirm, that since the year 1770, cultivation "has progressively increased, under all the disadvantages of variable assess"ments and personal charges: and, with respect to the future, I have no "hesitation in declaring, that those Zemindars who, under confirmed engage"ments, would bring their waste lands into cultivation, will not be deterred "by a ten years' assessment from attempting it. If, at this moment, the Go"vernment chose to confer grants of waste land in talookdarry tenure, under "conditions that no revenue should be paid for them during five years, and "that, at the end of ten, the assessment should be fixed according to the gene"ral rates of land in the districts where the tenures are situated, they would "find no difficulty in procuring persons to engage, even upon less favourable "terms. If I mistake not, the grants in Ramgur were precisely upon these "principles, which are conformable to the usage of the country."

25. In looking into the revenue accounts of the Ceded and Conquered Territories, which have been administered under short leases of three and four years, we find that, in the space of eight years, the land revenue has improved, to the amount of above fifty lacks of sicca rupees;* from which we may infer, that cultivation has, in the same period, been proportionably extended. The average of the land revenue of the Ceded Provinces, in the four years beginning with 1805-6 and ending with 1808-9, was Sicca Rupees 1,45,76,881, and in the subsequent four years it was Sicca Rupees 1,65,70,272. The averages of the corresponding periods in the Conquered Provinces were Sicca Rupees 87,33,736, and Sicca Rupees 1,17,51,396; shewing an increase, in the one case, of Sicca Rupees 19,93,391, and in the other, of Sicca Rupees 30,17,660. If the revenues of the year 1813-14 were included in the latter average, the improvement would appear much more considerable.

26. We shall expect to be furnished with the result of Mr. Richardson's researches in Cuttack, which will, we trust, serve to lay the foundation of a just and steady administration of the revenues of this province, and that his measures will be duly followed up by the Collector.

27. We shall be happy to receive, as you have given us reason to expect, a communication of the sentiments of the present Governor-General on the various questions connected with the realization of our land revenue, after he has had time to consider them with the deliberation due to a subject, in which, as you justly remark, are involved the interests of the state and the welfare of the community.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,
Dated 4*th July* 1817.

Letter to, 16th June 1815.

(Par. 6 to 26.) Observations on the revenue administration of Cuttack. Approve of Mr. Richardson's deputation; call for a report of his proceedings.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 4 July 1817.

Par. 4. THE communications in respect to the revenue affairs of Cuttack, which have been made to your Honourable Court, since the dispatch to which these paragraphs refer, appear to us to render unnecessary any detailed discussion in reply to the observations and orders contained in them.

5. The result of Mr. Richardson's researches has already been submitted to you, and the last dispatch from this department, under date the 1st November last, will have put your Honourable Court fully in possession of the views entertained by this Government, in regard to the future management of the district in question.

6. Your Honourable Court will thence have learned the great anxiety with which we have directed our attention to the means by which (without having recourse to those minute measurements and scrutinies which have always proved so fertile of abuse) that information may be supplied, the want of which has hitherto impeded the settlement of that district on proper principles.

7. From the proceedings regarding Cuttack, to which your attention was drawn in that dispatch, as well as from the actual provisions of Regulation VI, 1816, your Honourable Court will have observed, that we have, in the strongest manner, impressed on the several Revenue officers our opinion that the settlement should be made, as far as practicable, with the actual proprietors; and in the event of the actual proprietors being unwilling to engage on such terms as are compatible with the just claims of Government, that a decided preference should be given to the system of taking engagements from the heads of villages, instead of having recourse to the ordinary farming system.

8. This course would appear to be strictly in conformity with the wishes of your Honourable Court.

9. The instructions which we have issued for the guidance of the officer in charge of the revenue administration of Cuttack, enforcing the necessity of marking, as clearly as possible, the limits of the several estates, and of distinctly reserving the right of Government to draw additional revenue from the waste lands which may not be included within the engagements of the proprietors, will likewise, we trust, be found to accord with the views entertained by your Honourable Court, and will, we hope, entirely guard against the embarrassment which has been experienced in Bengal and Behar, in reconciling the rights of Government to the revenue of lands brought into cultivation since the period of the permanent settlement, with the rights expressly or virtually guaranteed to individuals by that transaction.

10. In explanation of the delay which your Honourable Court observe occurred in the formation of the settlement of Cuttack for the year 1220, we beg leave to remark, that the orders of your Honourable Court, disallowing the permanency of the settlement of the preceding year 1219, did not reach India until a considerable portion of that year had elapsed, and that, consequently, when Regulation X, 1812, which gave effect to your Honourable Court's instructions, was passed, little more than two months of the period of the existing settlement remained.

11. It was consequently quite impracticable for Mr. Richardson to conclude a new settlement for the year 1220, so as to obviate those inconveniences which have been so strongly remarked upon by your Honourable Court. It is not, of course, incumbent upon us to enter into any defence of the measures pursued by a former Government; but we have deemed the above explanation necessary, for the satisfaction of your Honourable Court. It will, we trust, be sufficient to satisfy you that the delay, which has so justly attracted your notice, was attributable to no remissness on the part of the local Government, and may serve also to account for their having deemed it necessary to explain its cause to your Honourable Court.

12. Your

(27.) Expressing a wish to be furnished with the sentiments of the present Governor-General on the realization of land revenue.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 4 July 1817.

12. Your Honourable Court will have already received a copy of a minute delivered in by the Governor-General, on his return from the Upper Provinces, containing a full communication of his sentiments on the most important of the questions connected with the administration of the land revenue of this country.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,

Dated the 7th October, 1815.

Letter to, dated 28th October 1814. (Par 76 to 91) Notice Mr. Dowdeswell's minute, recommending the revival of the office of Canongoe, and regret its suppression.—Recommend also the placing of the office of Putwarry on an efficient footing.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 7 October 1815.

Par. 24. We shall give every possible attention to the observations contained in these paragraphs; and, in the mean time, the Board of Revenue have been furnished with a copy of paragraphs 79 to 91, and directed to make the remarks and suggestions of your Honourable Court objects of their early and particular attention. It is our intention shortly to furnish the Board of Revenue with more explicit instructions regarding the revival of the office of Canongoe, and the reform of the office of Putwarry, in the districts subject to their superintendence, with a view to the more easy adjustment of disputed claims between landlord and tenant, and generally between all persons from the sudder Malguzar to the actual cultivator of the soil, and to the accomplishment of the other objects, for which those instructions were so eminently useful previously to the year 1793. It appears to us to be an object of primary importance to take into consideration the means which should be employed, in conjunction with the agency of the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry, for the purpose of accurately ascertaining the extent and boundaries of estates. The determination of this question will materially facilitate the partition of estates among individuals, and Government will thereby be enabled to derive a revenue from lands which, under the orders of your Honourable Court, are liable to a separate assessment.

65. On the proceedings noted in the margin* is recorded our correspondence with the Board of Revenue, respecting certain lands in the district of Chittagong, recently brought into cultivation, and now proposed to be subjected to assessment.

66. The proposed arrangement appearing to us to be consistent with the principles on which the permanent settlement was formed in that district, we approved of the measures proposed by the Board of Revenue to be adopted for measuring certain spots, with a view to the assessment of those lands which might appear to have been recently reduced to cultivation.

67. For the progress of those measures we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to the letter of the Board of Revenue, recorded on the proceedings of the 4th October,† enclosing the reports of Mr. Hunter, who had been deputed for the purpose of measuring and assessing the lands in question; and it will, no doubt, be satisfactory to your Honourable Court to observe, that an increase may be anticipated in the general assessment of the district under the arrangements above alluded to: nor is it too much to hope, that such resumptions may be carried, in that district, to an extent which may prove of importance, even in the general scale, should it be found practicable to combine with the revival of the office of Pergunnah Canongoe and the reform of the office of Putwarry, an official establishment for making topographical surveys in a scientific and expeditious manner. Your Honourable Court has been already apprized that all these objects at present engage our particular attention.

Letter from, dated 7th October 1815. (Par. 65 to 67.) Proceedings relating to the proposed assessment of certain lands in the district of Chittagong, which have been recently brought into cultivation.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 29 October 1817.

Par. 21. We approve generally of the proceedings referred to in these paragraphs.

22. In so far as respects the lands in the Noabad Mehal, there appears to have been a great want of attention in some quarter, in not enforcing upon the landholders an earlier compliance with the terms of the settlement concluded in 1801. The conditions of that settlement are not distinctly stated in the correspondence now before us; but it appears that, in the above-mentioned mehal, 845 dhoons of land fit for cultivation, and supposed to be capable of being made to yield an annual rent of Rupees 13,397, ought to have been brought upon the jumma of Government in 1805, or at least that a proportionate assessment should have been made, at that period, upon such of the lands as were then brought into cultivation, and that the assessment of the remainder should have kept pace with the further progress of cultivation. In neither case, however, were the conditions of the settlement enforced; 125 dhoons only having been brought nnder assessment in 1805, at a jumma of Rupees 1,931: nor was any scrutiny subsequently directed, until the close of 1813, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the cultivated lands, although doubts had been expressed by the Collector of the correctness of the measurement executed in 1805, and notwithstanding a proposition had been made by the Collector, in 1809, for a new measurement of the lands, on which proposition, however, we do not find that any orders were passed. The Board of Revenue having stated, in their letter of the 26th November 1813, that there was reason to believe that the whole of the lands had been brought into a productive state, a measurement of them was at length very properly directed by you to ascertain the fact. The result of the measurement of twenty-six villages exhibits an excess of 395 dhoons of maal or assessable lands, now yielding a rent of Rupees 6,320 per annum, and which, it is admitted, ought to have been assessed at that rate ever since 1805. In these villages alone, therefore, Government has been a loser, to the extent of from 60,000 to 70,000 Rupees, in consequence of a want of vigilance on the part of those whose duty it was to assert its just rights. Lands in other villages have also been assessed at Rupees 5,280 per annum; and, in all probability, they ought to have been paying at this rate for several years, had the public interests been duly attended to.

23. A number of other abuses, connected with the revenue administration of the district of Chittagong, were brought to the notice of your Government by the Collector, in the course of 1813: but we do not deem it necessary to advert to them in detail, as we observe that measures are at length in train, which we trust will lead to their correction. Were we of opinion that any of the arrangements which you had it in contemplation to adopt, with a view to the assessment of lands which have hitherto been exempt from paying revenue to Government, went to infringe upon the rights acquired by the Zemindars under the permanent settlement, or that they tended even, under any fair construction, to shake their confidence in the stability of that settlement, we should most assuredly discountenance them: But *the decennial settlement in Chittagong having, in almost all cases, been formed on specific quantities of land, it follows that all land, in such instances, not included in that settlement, is still liable to assessment; and that the quantity of land which it is competent for Government to assess, may be ascertained by a comparison between the extent of land for which the decennial settlement was concluded, and the extent of land actually in cultivation. On the former point, we conclude that information may be obtained from the revenue records of the time when the decennial settlement was concluded; but for a knowledge of the latter, we must wait the result of the measurement which you have ordered to be undertaken.

24. It is satisfactory to us to remark, that the measurement is to be conducted under the personal superintendence of the Assistant Collector, as no dependence can safely be placed on measurements executed by Aumeens in the absence of such control.

4 L 25. The

* Letter of Board of Revenue, dated 6th May 1814.

25. The numerous evasions of the just demands of Government, which appear, from the papers now before us, to have been practised in the district of Chittagong, may, we think, be ascribed principally to two causes: first, to the native officers of government employed in the Judicial and Revenue departments of the service having been permitted to possess themselves, by purchase or by fraudulent means, of considerable tracts of land, whereby their interests were placed at direct variance with their duties; and, secondly, to the total removal of all check upon the Zemindars, by the abolition of the office of Canongoe, without the substitution of any office of a similar kind, or any provision having been made for securing the performance of the duties of that office, and to the state of inefficiency into which the office of Putwarry has fallen in the Bengal provinces. To the last-mentioned evil we have had frequent occasion to call your attention in our correspondence from this department; and we are much pleased to find, from the latest advices which we have received from you, that directions have been issued to your two Revenue Boards, to consider and report upon the most proper means of restoring those offices to a state of efficiency.

26. The practical effects of permitting the native officers of Government employed in the Judicial and Revenue lines of our service to become the purchasers of zemindarry estates, merit the most serious consideration; and we shall await with anxiety the receipt of the information which we have called for on this subject, in paragraphs 74 and 75 of our Revenue dispatch, dated the 8th April 1817.

Par. 68. We have the honour to submit to the particular notice of your Honourable Court the able and comprehensive report of Mr. Richardson, on the conclusion of his mission to the province of Cuttack. That report is recorded on our proceedings of the annexed date;* and although it may not appear to contain those minute details which form the true and proper basis of a settlement of the land revenue, we cannot doubt that it will appear to your Honourable Court to afford a satisfactory proof of Mr. Richardson's zeal, talents, and spirit of research. We do not deem it necessary, in this place, to enter into any particular discussion of the various points noticed by Mr. Richardson, our general sentiments on which will be found in our reply to his letter, to which we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court for more particular information.

Letter from, dated 7th October 1815. (Par. 68.) Referring to a statistical report, by Mr. Richardson, on the District of Cuttack.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 29 October 1817.

Par. 27. Mr. Richardson's report contains some interesting and valuable information respecting the district of Cuttack; but it certainly does not, as you very justly observe, contain those minute details which form the true and proper basis of a settlement of the land revenue. The facts we have noticed in our last letter from this department, as well as in former letters of no distant dates, fully convince us, that the interests of the Company are suffering from a want of that knowledge of the resources of the country, of the respective rights of Government and of those who stand between them and the actual occupants of the soil, as well as the rights which belong to this last-mentioned description of persons, without which we continue to be persuaded that no revenue system in India can be established on a solid foundation, or be administered with permanent success. We shall not dwell upon this important consideration, inasmuch as your late dispatches from this department, on the administration of the unsettled countries, afford to our minds the gratifying assurance, that it is one to which the attention of your Government is now particularly directed.

28. The tributary mehals in this district (being twenty-nine in number) appear to be distinguished from the mogulbundee by this circumstance,—that the the rents payable to Government are fixed in the former, whereas in the latter they are unfixed and variable. We further observe, that of these tributary mehals, thirteen are stated to be subject to our laws and Regulations, whilst sixteen are exempted from their operation. This being the case, we should have been glad to have been informed, not only of the grounds on which our laws and Regulations have been partially introduced, but of the effects of their introduction upon the tranquillity and general prosperity of those parts of the country where they obtain, compared with the state of the districts which still continue under a different system of judicature. Explanations are also desirable, of the grounds on which the Zemindars, in one portion of the province, have been subjected to a fixed, and in most instances apparently inconsiderable tribute, whilst the lands of the other portion remain subject to the ordinary rules of assessment.

29. The propriety of designating these tributary Zemindars, who possess tracts of country extending, in some instances, from one hundred to one hundred and eighty miles, as proprietors, and of considering these large demesnes as landed estates, ought not surely to be admitted, without full investigation. An incautious admission of this sort might have the effect of compromising the rights of a numerous class of individuals, and occasion much future embarrassment, as we know it has in other provinces under your presidency.

30. Mr. Richardson states, that there is reason to believe that these tributary chiefs are guilty of great excesses, where exempt from the influence of British laws; but he, at the same time, expresses an opinion, that the introduction of the Bengal code, and more especially of the police-laws, into the tributary mehals of Cuttack, would be very inexpedient, and productive not only of much expense, but of great evil, for many reasons.

31. In this opinion we perfectly coincide. We conceive that nothing can be more unwise on general grounds, or would tend more effectually to defeat its own objects, than a hasty attempt to give an indiscriminate operation to laws, even supposing them to be thoroughly good in themselves and well adapted to other portions of our territory, without a deliberate consideration of their local fitness; which cannot be safely decided upon, until we have attained a satisfactory knowledge of the situation and circumstances of the people for whom we are called upon to legislate. It will be the duty of the superintendent of the tributary mehals, in the first place, carefully to study the manners, the habits, feelings, and prejudices of the inhabitants of all classes; to establish a certain personal influence over them, by the temper, judgment, and humanity of his proceedings; to familiarize them with the European character, by exhibiting to them its most estimable qualities; and to collect information respecting the existing institutions of the country, the abuses that have crept into them, and their capabilities of being reformed and rendered practically useful under proper Regulations duly enforced.

32. It appears, from the reports of the Judges of Circuit, that crimes of deep criminality are far less frequent in Cuttack than in many other districts, which have been for a much longer time subject to our authority. This circumstance, of itself, would lead us to infer favourably respecting the native institutions of the country: and if these can be preserved and restored to a state of salutary efficiency, where they have degenerated or been perverted, we are decidedly of opinion that a system of administration, founded on this basis, would prove far more acceptable, and more beneficial in practice, than one more perfect in theory but less suited to the people who are to live under it.

33. We refer with particular interest, upon this occasion, to the luminous minute of the Governor-General, dated September 1815, upon the general state of the Revenue administration, and also to his Lordship's minute of the 2d October, upon the operation of the present judicial system, particularly as it is connected with that of the revenue.

34. You will have seen, from our instructions of the 9th November 1814, how anxiously our attention had been directed to the means of applying a remedy, which might prove effectual, towards the removal of the evils which it was but too evident, from the records of your Government, did prevail, and which Lord Hastings has so forcibly described.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 29 October, 1817.

35. The proceedings of the Commission which, under our orders of the 4th May 1814, was formed at Madras, for the express purpose of endeavouring to apply that remedy, merit your particular attention; and we desire, if the whole of the proceedings relative to that Commission should not have been sent to you, that you do call upon the Government of Madras for a complete copy of them, including the minutes that were recorded, and all the correspondence that took place with the Commissioners, with the court of Sudder Adawlut and the Board of Revenue, and between that Court and Board and the Judges and Collectors in the interior of the country.

36. We are the more desirous that you should take a particular review of those proceedings, because they may assist you in prosecuting the revision of your own system of administration, revenue as well as judicial, and may either enable you to suggest further modifications to the Government of Madras, or to confirm them in their resolution to carry into full effect the measures that have been adopted upon the recommendation of the Commissioners.

37. Our hope that these measures will prove effectual is much strengthened, by the coincidence of our opinions, as expressed in the dispatches already referred to with the sentiments of the Governor-General, in favour of the ancient institutions of the country.

38. A recent communication from Bombay illustrates the advantage of reverting, where circumstances enable us to do so, to ancient Hindoo systems of administration, and putting into full activity the village institutions. The letter of the 10th June 1815, to which we allude, and our reply thereto, dated the 9th April 1817, will be communicated to you by the Bombay Government.

17. We entered fully into the subject of the sale of lands for arrears of assessment, and on other points collaterally connected with it, in paragraphs 89 to 108 of our dispatch from this department dated 6th January 1815, and we embrace the present opportunity of calling your attention to the observations and instructions therein contained.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 2 April, 1817

18. With reference to the remark in your letter now under reply, respecting the difference in the value of landed property in the permanently-settled provinces and in those under temporary settlements, and in pursuance of the suggestion contained in paragraph 98 of our general Revenue dispatch, dated 8th April 1817, we desire that you will furnish us with your own sentiments and the opinion of the Board of Commissioners, as to the practicability and expediency of devising some means of realizing arrears of revenue in the territories subject to temporary settlements, without resorting to a sale of the defaulter's lands. In considering this question, it will be useful to ascertain, whether the sales which now take place affect principally or exclusively lands, the revenue of which is under farm; or whether, and in what relative proportions, they are enforced against the lands occupied by the village Zemindars paying their rent direct to Government. We are aware that the provisions in the Regulations apply indiscriminately to all lands from which arrears of the public demand are due, by whatever tenure they are held: but it is of importance to ascertain, whether, in point of fact, decrees of sale are most frequently enforced against lands, the revenues of which are realized through the medium of farmers, or lands the revenues derived from which are paid directly to the officers of Government by the proprietors themselves. In the former case, the sale operates as the transfer of a contract, and not as a conveyance of the fee-simple of the right from one individual to another. The frequency of such transfers would constitute a strong objection to the revenue farming-system, particularly when coupled with its other disadvantages. In the latter case, we are inclined to think that the extreme measure of resorting to a sale of defaulter's lands may, in many instances, be avoided, by activity and vigilance on the part of the Collectors in realizing the demands of Government, as they become due, under the powers now vested in them by the regulations: but should those powers be deemed insufficient, it deserves consideration, whether it would not be more advisable to enlarge them, than to rest the security of Government for the payment of its revenue upon the attachment and sale of estates, a species of security which involves great individual hardship, more especially in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, where, until within a very few years, the settlements were formed upon data the most vague and imperfect. In the Conquered Countries, the security to the public revenue afforded by sales has, indeed, not unfrequently proved greatly inadequate to the object for which it is intended to provide, the lands of whole villages having sold for a few rupees.

Letter from, dated 31st January 1815. (5 to 8.) Settlement of Bareilly and Shajehanpore for five years.

55. The following are the terms on which a quinquennial settlement is stated to have been concluded of the districts of Bareilly and Shajehanpore:

	Bareilly.	Shajehanpore.
1220	Rupees 20,71,879	Rupees 11,91,477
1221	22,49,578	12,41,462
1222	23,42,570	12,96,519
1223	23,98,752	13,17,044
1224	24,42,622	13,35,265

56. The jumma of the last year of the settlement exhibits an increase of Rupees 6,12,482 upon the quartennial settlement, and of Rupees 14,73,188 upon the jumma of the two triennial settlements; and we are happy to observe, that notwithstanding this large increase, you see no reason to entertain any apprehension respecting the stability of the present settlement.

57. Considering the unsatisfactory state of the districts towards the close of the quartennial settlement, as described in the second paragraph of the report of the Board of Commissioners, dated 20th September 1814, arising from a general combination among the Zemindars to diminish the cultivation of their estates and to throw up the management of them, with the view of compelling Government to form arrangements with them on reduced terms; the very heavy balance outstanding against the country, from the absconding of the Malguzars and desertion of the ryots; the gross abuses which are represented to have been committed by the Tehsildars, in conjunction with the principal officers of the Sudder Cutcherry, and for which the collector ought to have been called to account; and the total inexperience of Mr. Law, whom you had appointed to that office at a very critical period; we very highly approve of the motives which which induced Mr. Deane to propose to undertake the superintendence of the settlement in person, and which influenced the Board of Commissioners, on their own responsibility, to accede to that proposition, and at the same time to depute Mr. Christian and Mr. Calvert, two of their own officers, to assist in this important arrangement, the execution of which reflects great credit on all the parties (including Mr. Chamberlain) immediately concerned in it.

58. The state of Bareilly, towards the conclusion of the quartennial settlement, furnishes by no means a solitary instance of disorder and confusion at the approaching termination of temporary settlements. Circumstances, very similar in their nature, were brought to your notice by Mr. Richardson, as having taken place at the conclusion of the last settlement in Cuttack; and for the purpose of preventing their recurrence, he recommended a re-settlement of that district, two years at least before the expiration of the present one. We apprise you, in paragraph 87 of our general letter from this department, dated 8th April 1817, of our entire concurrence in that suggestion, which we think equally applicable to the temporary settlements in the Upper Provinces, and on which we accordingly direct you to act in the future administration of these provinces.

59. We have, in a preceding paragraph of this dispatch, as well as on former occasions, expressed our disapprobation of the practice of farming the revenues of large tracts of country in our more recently acquired territories, to adventurers or strangers having no interest in the soil and no common feeling with its inhabitants. The general objections to which the farming system is certainly liable are not so applicable to those instances, which appear to be numerous, in Bareilly and Shajehanpore, wherein a settlement has been concluded with the village Mokuddums in the absence of proprietors, or on their refusal to enter into engagements for their estates on reasonable terms. The Board of Commissioners remark, in the thirty-ninth paragraph of their report, that "the " interest of the Mokuddums in the welfare of the estate is scarcely less than " that of the proprietor himself;" and in the fifty-ninth paragraph they recommend to your confirmation the engagements which had been entered into for part of the Pergunnah of Ojaon with the Mokuddums, as being " most " advantageous to Government in point of security as well as amount of re- " venue, and as being most beneficial to the Pergunnah at large, and to the " interests of the agricultural population:" and, in the tenth paragraph of the Board's report they suggest, " that it may be expedient, at a future settle- " ment, to recognize a proprietary right in all the Mokuddums who may have " been in possession during the whole period since the cession, until a better " right can be established against them by a judicial decision." Our opinion decidedly is, that a proprietary right should be no further acknowledged in the Mokuddums, than as concern the lands to which they have a possessory claim, and that the same right should, on the same principle, be admitted in the case of the other occupant cultivators.

60. We regret that the Board of Commissioners should have recommended a measure, so objectionable in principle, as that of farming the pergunnah of Khyragurh to Captain Hearsey; and we fully approve of your orders of the 12th February 1814, directing the provisional engagement which they had formed with him to be cancelled.

61. We have perused, with particular interest, that part of the Board's report (paragraphs 145 to 147) in which they alluded to an important document, by which they had been guided in the settlement of individual estates, and in admitting or excluding parties claiming a right of property.

62. This document, which is denominated the Duhsemee Ketaub, is stated to have been compiled in the year 1802, under the instructions of Mr. Deane, then Collector of Bareilly, and to have been kept as a record of general reference on all points connected with the property, possession, or revenue of the lands of the district. " With a view of meeting the changes of property " attendant on two revolutions, the usurpation of the Rohilla Patans and the " conquest by the Nawaub Vizier, two columns of this register exhibit, under " the description of Malik Kudeem and Malik Hal, the ancient proprietor " known to the Canongoe records and the more recent occupant. Where no " claimant

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 2 April 1817.

" claimant to the title of the former had been hitherto forthcoming, or where " the latter could shew a preferable title, either by prescriptive possession or " by documents conferring a right of property, the latter has been invariably " recognized; but in a large majority of cases, the title of the former is not " disputed, and in many cases is unequivocally admitted, although no repre- " sentative of him is yet forthcoming. With the assistance of this record, few " cases of doubt or difficulty can have occurred; but in some instances, where " the claim of admission has rested on transfers from the recorded Maliks, the " property is disputed, on the production by the contesting parties of bills of " sale from different venders or of double transfers from the same vender, and " on such occasions the parties have been left to adjust their disputes by " regular suit in the adawlut, if a reference to the duhsemee ketaub did not " furnish sufficient grounds for the selection of either claimant to the exclusion " of the other."

63. A record, answering the above description, must doubtless have been found of great value in the adjustment of claims to private property in zillah Bareilly; and we are desirous of receiving information, whether corresponding documents have been compiled in the other districts. If this has not been done, it is matter of regret that the laudable example of Mr. Deane was not followed by the other revenue functionaries, on our first acquisition of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; and it may be advisable that an attempt should be made, even yet, to repair the original omission.

64. We thoroughly approve of your having limited the settlement of the whole of the districts of Bareilly and Shajehanpore to a period of five years.

(15 and 16.) Appointment of a Surveyor to the Board of Commissioners.

67. We put you fully in possession of our sentiments as to the utility and expediency of revenue surveys, when properly conducted, in our general Revenue dispatch of 1st February 1811,* and in our dispatch from this department dated 6th January 1815.† You were also apprized, in our dispatch of the last-mentioned date, that these sentiments had not been altered by the representations of a contrary tendency contained in your Revenue letter of 14th December 1811,‡ and 19th June 1813.§

68. In the proceedings referred to in the paragraphs of your letter now under reply, we find an opinion recorded by the junior Commissioner, Mr. Deane, that " without surveys and measurements of the whole lands of every " village, similar to those which have been executed in all the provinces sub- " ject to the presidency of Fort St. George, under ryotwar tenure, every " settlement of the land revenue in permanency must be obscure and unsatis- " factory." This opinion of Mr. Deane has been adopted by the Board of Commissioners, who in their letter of 9th September 1814, pronounce " the " utility of minute pergunnah surveys to every branch of the service to be " self-evident:" and we have the satisfaction of observing, that you hold it to be " impossible to doubt, that as long as the system of temporary settlements " shall exist, substantial benefit may be derived from such surveys, both in " the Revenue department and in other branches of the public service."

69. We cannot but regard this concurrence of sentiment as a fortunate and auspicious circumstance: and we shall pay due attention to that fuller communication, which you have led us to expect, of the measures which you may have adopted in futherance of the plan. In the meantime, we sanction your appointment of Ensign A. Gerard, of the 1st battalion 13th regiment of Native Infantry, to be Surveyor to the Board of Commissioners, in consideration of the testimony borne by them to Mr. Gerard's peculiar qualifications for the office, as evinced in the survey stated to have been executed by him of the tract of country included in the mokurreree of the late Rajah Ramdial Sing; and we confirm the allowance which you have granted to him, of Rupees 350 per mensem, including his establishment.

70. We take this opportunity, however, of observing, that the officers of our Engineer corps may be supposed, from their education and professional habits, to to be generally better qualified for the performance of duties of this description than any other class of military officers.

71. We direct that a specimen of Mr. Gerard's survey be transmitted for our inspection, that we may have an opportunity of comparing it with a specimen of a revenue survey of the pergunnah of Broach, which has been lately submitted to us by the Government at Bombay, and which appears to have been executed with great neatness and distinctness by some military officers on their establishment.

72. The utility of measures of this sort will, of course, depend altogether upon their being skilfully conducted, and we entirely agree with you, that with a view to the execution of the survey on an extended scale, it is desirable that persons should be found, possessing a knowledge of the general principles of geometry and mensuration, to act under the guidance and instructions of the principal surveyor. We would also suggest to you the expediency of your applying to the Governments of Fort St. George and Bombay for specimens of the revenue surveys which have been executed under those presidencies.

73. The survey of Broach, which distinguishes not only the limits of every village but the boundary and extent of each field, whether cultivated or not, together with the name of the possessor and the amount of revenue payable therefrom to Government, was connected with an investigation of the rent-free lands, and a consequent resumption of such as had been improperly alienated from the state. The revenue recovered by this process, in one small district only, has amounted to an annual income, considerably exceeding the estimated charge for surveying the whole district. It is obvious, that a survey conducted in this way tends to prevent a great deal of unnecessary litigation, and may be of material use in guiding the courts to just decisions in revenue suits and claims to disputed property.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,

Dated the 29th October 1817.

(Department of Ceded and Conquered Provinces)

Letter to, 2d April 1817 (Par 16 to 18) Requiring the sentiments of Government and of the Board of Commissioners as to the expediency of realizing balances without proceeding to sale

Par. 9 We have sent a copy of these paragraphs to the Board of Commissioners, with instructions to report their sentiments on the points noticed by your Honourable Court.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 Oct 1817

10. Your Honourable Court are, of course, aware that the rules for selling land on account of arrears do not apply to estates which can strictly be said to be let in farm The lands to which you refer, under that denomination, are doubtless those in which, though held in joint tenancy by many proprietors, a single person comes forward as the party engaging with Government.

(55 to 57) Notice the settlement of Bareilly and Shajehanpore, from 1220 to 1224, under Mr Deane's superintendence

28 Your Honourable Court have already been informed of the circumstances which induced Government to relinquish the increased demand in the districts in question, for the years 1223 and 1224, and the general result of the collections, in the four first years of the settlement in question, has likewise been brought to your notice.

29. On the proceedings of the annexed date,* your Honourable Court will find recorded a letter from the Board of Commissioners, transmitting to us a minute recorded by the Acting Junior Member (Mr. Trant), on the result of his observations on the revenue affairs of the districts of Rohilcund, which had recently been placed under his separate charge, together with the instructions which had been issued by the Board, collectively, to the Collectors of that province, relative to the estates, the management of which had been relinquished by the proprietors, under the provisions of Regulation XVI, 1816.

30. The

* Revenue Consultations, 22d August 1813, No 32 to 35

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 Oct. 1817.

30. The first of those documents is in a peculiar manner deserving of the attention of your Honourable Court, and will doubtless be perused by you with the interest which this subject is calculated to excite.

31. The general tenour of Mr. Trant's observations is calculated to evince, that much of the irregularity in the perception, during the past year, of the revenue of the province of Rohilcund, is ascribable to temporary causes, and that it does not arise from any want of permanent stability in the public resources.

32. We see, indeed, in the information afforded by Mr. Trant, and the remarks by which it is accompanied, ground to admit the accuracy of the opinion entertained by him, that notwithstanding the considerable increase which has been effected in the jumma, the district of Moradabad is not, generally speaking, over-assessed.

33. When, however, the numerous resignations which have occurred, under the option given to the landholders by the provisions of Regulation XVI, 1816, are considered, there appears strong reason to apprehend that, in many individual cases, the jumma has been too rapidly enhanced. On the other hand, in many instances these resignations may, as conjectured by Mr. Trant, have originated in the design of withholding the just dues of Government. This surmise is, indeed, strongly confirmed, in regard to the district of Bareilly, by the considerable proportion of Zemindars who have actually resumed their estates.

34. Still, however, it can hardly be doubted, that a considerable proportion of those estates, the management of which has been relinquished, has actually been loaded with too heavy an assessment. This circumstance, connected with the apparent inadequacy of the districts, generally speaking, to bear the jumma with which they are assessed, pointedly indicates the insufficiency of the means enjoyed by the Revenue authorities, for securing the important object of equalizing the assessment.

35. To remedy this defect is, your Honourable Court is doubtless aware, an object of our most anxious attention.

36. Independently of the important information contained in Mr. Trant's minute on the points above-mentioned, that paper is further deserving of your particular attention, with reference to the measure suggested by him of establishing some distinct rules for the allowance of malikana to recusing Zemindars.

37. Before passing any final orders upon this subject, we have deemed it right to obtain a communication of the collective opinion of the Board, and have instructed that authority to submit a draft of the rules which it might appear to them expedient to pass for the above purpose.

38. Not having yet received any reply to the above reference, we do not deem it necessary to trouble your Honourable Court, on the present occasion, with any detailed remarks on the subject. The instructions issued by us to the Board on the occasion, will sufficiently indicate the general tendency of our sentiments on the subject.

39. The same consideration induces us to refrain from any lengthened discussion in regard to another most important subject, which is alluded to by Mr. Trant. We mean, the dissatisfaction which has been created among the Zemindars, by the non-confirmation of the permanent settlement. We shall content ourselves, therefore, with thus generally pointing it out to the notice of your Honourable Court; and shall, of course, hereafter communicate to you the more precise and detailed information which we have directed the Board to furnish.

40. The instructions issued by the Board, for the guidance of the several Collectors in carrying into effect the necessary arrangements consequent on the operation of Regulation XVI, 1816, appeared to us to be well calculated to afford a just relief to the Zemindars, in cases of over-assessment, and at the same time to guard against any undue reduction of the public revenue.

(58.) Remarks on the disorder and confusion which prevail on the termination of temporary settlements, and refer to Mr. Richardson's suggestion.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 October 1817.

41. In the twenty-fourth paragraph of the Resolution recently passed in regard to the revenue affairs of Cuttack, to which we have drawn the attention of your Honourable Court, in the eleventh to the twenty-third paragraphs of our separate dispatch of this day's date, we had occasion to record our sentiments on the question which forms the subject of this paragraph. The following were the terms of that resolution.

"The proposal made by Mr. Trower, in his letter of the 17th March last, to "commence without delay the adjustment of the jumma to be assessed at the "ensuing settlement, so that the assessment of each pergunnah might be sepa-"rately concluded and reported on, appears certainly calculated to correct the "inequalities of the present assessment, and although, perhaps, open to some "objections, it undoubtedly merits consideration."

"Adverting, indeed, to the embarrassment which is ordinarily experienced "from the simultaneous expiration of the leases of all the estates in the dis-"trict, and the consequent difficulty of forming the settlement of each with "sufficient care and deliberation, it will deserve consideration, whether the "benefits attending the course of proceedings hitherto followed of fixing one "general period for the settlement of the entire district, may be counter-"balanced by the advantages which would result from assuming distinct pe-"riods of the different portions of the district, so that the number of pergun-"nahs to be settled in any one year might not exceed what the revenue officers "could easily superintend.

"At all events, it is, of course, desirable that the Collector should unin-"terruptedly prosecute those inquiries, which are indispensably necessary to "enable him duly to apportion the public jumma."

42. The suggestion is, as remarked by your Honourable Court, equally applicable to the temporary settlements in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and we have accordingly transmitted a copy of this paragraph, together with copies of the paragraphs of the Resolutions above quoted, to the Board of Commissioners, with instructions to furnish a report of their sentiments on the subject.

(59.) Remarks on farming large tracts of land to adventurers or strangers.

43. We have transmitted a copy of this paragraph to the Board of Commissioners for their information, and for any observations or suggestions which it may appear to them necessary or useful to offer on the above subject.

(Par 60.)

44. Requires no reply.

(61 to 63.) Remarks on the usefulness of the documents prepared under Mr Deane's orders at Bareilly, denominated Dusunnee Ketaub.

45. We have sent copies of these paragraphs to the Board of Commissioners, with directions to form a report on the subject of them.

(64 to 71.) Remarks on the appointment of Surveyors to the Board of Commissioners.

47. We have sent copies of these paragraphs to the Board of Commissioners for their information, and in order that they may instruct Lieutenant Gerard to furnish a specimen of his survey, for transmission to your Honourable Court.

48. Your Honourable Court have been already informed of the circumstances which precluded the completion of the projected survey by that officer, in the mode followed in respect to the village of Poothkhas; and the accomplishment of such an undertaking, if ever accomplished, must obviously be postponed, until the maturity of the enlarged establishment which we contemplate. In the mean time, as we conceived it would be satisfactory to your Honourable Court to receive a copy of the topographical survey of the above-named village, we have issued directions to the Board of Commissioners to instruct Lieutenant Gerard in forwarding the specimen above required, to transmit at the same time a copy of that document.

(72 and 73.) Remarks on the survey of Pergunnah Broach at Bombay

49. We shall solicit from the Government of Fort St. George and Bombay specimens of the revenue surveys which have been executed under those presidencies respectively.

50. We

Revenue Letter from Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 29 Oct. 1817.

50. We beg leave to observe that, as already intimated, without a surveying establishment on a very extensive scale, it would be found impracticable to execute surveys exhibiting the minute details noticed by your Honourable Court throughout the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; and the employment of British officers on such a duty would obviously involve an inordinate expence. We still, however, hope that pergunnah surveys, of a more comprehensive nature, may be obtained at a moderate charge; and though not exhibiting the details of each village, in the manner described to have been followed in Broach, they will yet afford essential assistance to the Revenue officers.

Par. 74. The practice among the native officers of courts, of purchasing estates sold at public auction by the Government, is unquestionably liable to the strongest objections; and we see but too much reason to apprehend, from the information afforded by the records of your Government within a few years past, that it is not less systematically pursued in other parts of the territories subject to your immediate authority, and that it is not improbable that those officers may, in the course of time engross the zemindarry property within their respective zillahs. Nothing is more to be deprecated than this increasing practice among that description of persons. We have referred to the two-fold objection urged by Mr. Tower against it, and it is certainly of great force, both as it affects the interests of the owners of the estates sold and the interests of the Government. But it is open, and in our minds most particularly open, to a still more serious objection, as it concerns the under-farmers in zemindarries, and that large class of persons who constitute the cultivators of the soil. The officers of the courts of justice, according to the situations they hold and the duties they have to discharge, from the Pundit, Molavie, and Sheristadar, down to a very inferior class in the gradation of functionaries, must, in a greater or less degree, have it in their power to thwart and pervert the purposes of justice, even under the most watchful inspection of their conduct on the part of the judge, whenever a private motive might furnish the inducement; nor can we imagine any circumstances in which they would be more likely to act such a part, than in regard to suits instituted in the Adawlut by under-farmers, and particularly by Ryots, against the officers themselves, as Zemindars, or against those to whom they have entrusted the management of their zemindarries. We need not expatiate on the consequences of those officers becoming regular dealers in land, and where the extent to which they may be engaged in such a traffic may excite within their own fraternity a common feeling, in regard to the issue of causes instituted against Zemindars, in which any of their own body may have a personal interest.

75. These considerations we deem of high importance, as we are satisfied you will yourselves consider them. It is not our intention, at this time, to do more than to desire that you will take measures, by circular instructions to the Judges and Collectors, for ascertaining, as far as may be practicable, the extent to which the native officers and servants of the courts of judicature may have become purchasers of zemindarry property, as well as the native officers on the Revenue establishments, with such further information connected with this subject, as the Judges and Collectors may be able to afford; and that you will furnish us with the result of your own reflections thereon, aided by the sentiments of the Sudder Adawlut, and the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners.

78. We cannot dismiss this branch of the subject without adverting to the abuses which are represented to have prevailed in Killah Rhoordah.* It is stated that the Rajah does not live upon his estate, but has fixed his residence at Poree, on account of the advantages he enjoys as superintendant of the temple of Juggernauth; that his estate had been farmed for ten years to two adventurers, possessed of neither property nor rank, but of desperate fortunes and devoid devoid of respectability; that one of the police Darogahs had been guilty of the most criminal excesses; that the Tehsildars, by oppressing the Suberarkars, compelled them, in their turn, to oppress the Ryots and cultivators, and that a great portion of the last-mentioned class had, in consequence, deserted the district; that the exactions and excesses had been carried to an extent nearly amounting to one-fourth of the jumma, and that the Government rents had been realized, in the one year, by largely anticipating those of the next. It further appears, that the Rajah refused to take the management of his estate, except at a jumma of 30,000 rupees, about a fourth of its value. Upon which the Commissioner justly observed, that "the fact of his being surrounded with dependents who would consume the revenue of his estate, was hardly a sufficient "reason for Government to forego so large a revenue, although it might be a "sufficient cause for the Rajah to decline entering into reasonable terms for "his estate, if he felt himself so weak and imbecile a man as not to have "vigour enough to extricate himself from so disgraceful a predicament." The Collector and the Commissioner were in favour of farming out the revenues for a long term of years, by which they expected an increase of revenue, and that the country would be thereby improved; but contemplating the probability that this measure would not meet with the sanction of Government, and as an alternative proposition, it was recommended by the Commissioner that an attempt should be made to induce the Rajah to accept, for himself and heirs, for ever, of a yearly pension of Rupees 30,000 (Rupees 6,000 more than he had ever received as malikana), which he considered to be particularly desirable, with reference to the power it would afford the Government of forming arrangements for the happiness and comfort of its subjects. He further proposed, in that event, that the estate should be divided into ten portions, or as many talookas as local circumstances might render expedient, and that they should be put up to sale; that a competition of purchasers would be found among the inhabitants of Calcutta, and that the estate would probably yield not less than two lacks and a half of Rupees, at a jumma of Rupees 94,000 per annum.

79. Mr. Richardson, at the same time, adverted to the statement of the Collector, for the accuracy of which he himself vouches, that "the Rajah was "comfortably settled at Juggernauth, where he enjoyed great advantages "from the presents he received from pilgrims resorting thereto, the whole of "which he would lose were he to remove to Khoordah; and that he did not "believe that, under any circumstances, the Rajah would be induced to quit "Pooree."*

80. With respect to this latter suggestion, we acknowledge the difficulty apprehended by you from the little prospect of inducing the Rajah to relinquish his right to the estate, without the exercise of an influence which it would not be consistent with the justice of the Government to employ. And if an obstacle of this nature had not existed, and the arrangement in question had been effected with the Rajah, we should still have felt strong objections to parcelling out the country, in the manner described, into zemindarry estates, to be created and to be sold on speculation to the inhabitants of Calcutta, considering it, as we do, to be a point of wholesome and just policy, that wherever large tracts of land, as in the present instance, had been held in zemindarry or jaghiredarry tenure, and are brought under the immediate management of Government (and we extend the application of the principle to any portion of land thus circumstanced, even to a single village or a part of one), the settlements be formed, as far as may be practicable, with the Ryots, who have the possessory interest in the lands, by which we mean those Ryots who either cultivate the soil on their own account, or who may have a right in lands which they permit others to cultivate; and that, even where it may be necessary that such engagements should, in the first instance, be made with the body of the Ryots jointly, there shall be no stipulation for the permanency of that engagement, such as would preclude the commutation of it for separate engagements with individual Ryots, when circumstances may appear to the Government to render such a change desirable.

Letter from, dated 29th Nov. 1814. (35 to 37.) Statement of lands sold for the recovery of arrears of revenue in the Lower Provinces, in 1218 and 1219 fusily, and in Cuttack in 1221 umlee.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 8 April 1817.

95. We observe, from the letter of the Board of Revenue* here referred to, that lands were advertised for sale for the recovery of arrears of assessment, bearing a jumma, in 1218, of ....Rupees 1,07,46,505,
in 1219 .... 23,58,612;
that the jumma of the lands actually sold in 1218 was .... Rupees 30,931,
in 1219 90,898,
and that the price of the lands actually sold in the latter year amounted to Rupees 4,08,395, the purchase-money, as you state, bearing a proportion of about four and a half to the jumma. But the remark of the Revenue Board is equally true, that the estates sold on an average "at the rate of nearly forty-five years purchase of the malikanah; and assuming, according to former computations, that purchasers expect an income or interest of ten per cent. on their principal, this average would appear to indicate that the medium of the net income of proprietors is in the proportion of forty-five to one hundred of the sudder-jumma."

96. In the thirty-sixth paragraph of our dispatch from this department, dated the 16th June 1815, we desired an explanation of the great disproportion between the lands advertised for sale and those actually sold; an explanation which is no less called for by the statement above given, than by that to which you drew our attention in your letter of the 19th June 1813. The other observations which we then made upon the statement referred to in your letter of the last mentioned date, are more or less applicable to that now before us.

97. The lands disposed of in Cuttack for the recovery of arrears of revenue, due on account of 1221 umlee, bore a jumma of Rupees 8,007, and the sale price amounted to Rupees 13,870.

98. It could never, of course, be expected, that land sold in a district like Cuttack, under a biennial settlement, and with the prospect of an enhanced jumma at the expiration of that settlement, would find purchasers at the same, or nearly the same rate with land already greatly improved, and on which the demands of Government are fixed to perpetuity. Could any effectual means, indeed, be devised for realizing the demands of Government in the districts under temporary settlements, without proceeding to a sale of the estates of defaulters, we should consider it as a most material improvement in our system of revenue economy; for it cannot be concealed, that the sale is frequently attended with much hardship, if not injustice, to individuals.

(Territorial Department.)

Letter to, 8th April 1817. (Par. 27 to 89) Notice defects and errors in the revenue administration of Cuttack.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 29 October 1817.

Par. 11. Your Honourable Court will have been informed, from the judicial department, of those unhappy events by which the district of Cuttack has recently been disturbed.

12. You will likewise have been informed of the appointment of a special commission, for ascertaining the general state of that district, and particularly for inquiring into the causes of the dissatisfaction which is stated to be there prevalent, and for considering the means by which tranquillity may be restored, and the permanent prosperity of the province best promoted.

13. Among the causes of dissatisfaction, various points connected with this department were enumerated. The operation of the salt monopoly, the administration of the revenue system in its various branches, and the state of the currency, were all indicated as affording cause of complaint.

14. The stated complaints are, as might be expected, in many cases unreasonable; but we see abundant ground for the belief, that the operation of the the system pursued in the management of the territorial concerns of the district in question, is in several respects defective. At all events, it has appeared to us to be our duty to enter into a very full examination of the subject, and to frame our instructions to the Commissioners, so that their inquiries may embrace every point of the internal administration of the province which can bear upon the question.

15. We are, of course, prepared to rescind or modify such parts of the existing law applicable to Cuttack, as it may, on deliberate consideration, appear inexpedient to maintain. But whatever sentiments we may at present entertain on the subject, it would obviously be misplaced to introduce any extensive change in the existing system, until we shall have before us the result of the labours of the Commission, since their inquiries will, it may be hoped, for the most part supply that information regarding the district, the want of which we have seen so much reason to regret, and which is so necessary to enable us to judge of the course which should be hereafter pursued.

16. In the present immature state of the discussion, we do not deem it necessary to trouble your Honourable Court with any detailed explanation of our opinions, or to enter upon a detailed reply to the observations of your Honourable Court. We the more readily refrain from doing so, because in the Resolutions recorded on the proceedings referred to,* your Honourable Court will find a full exposition of the sentiments we entertain.

(95 to 98.) Notice disproportion between the lands advertised and actually sold.

27. We have transmitted copies of these paragraphs to the Board of Revenue, Board of Commissioners, and Commissioner in Behar and Benares, for information, and in order that, in forwarding the annual statement of lands sold, they may uniformly notice, in a general manner, the causes of the disproportion between the lands advertised for sale and those actually sold.

EXTRACT REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,
Dated the 1*st November* 1816.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 1 Nov 1816.

Par. 1. In the dispatches addressed to your Honourable Court from the Revenue department, under date the 7th October 1815, the Vice President in Council had the honour of completing to that date the narrative of the proceedings of Government on the conduct of the revenue affairs of this presidency.

2. We have now the honour to forward to your Honourable Court a continuation of our proceedings to the 25th October 1816, and shall proceed to notice, in this letter, such matters (not yet made the subject of a communication to your Honourable Court) as appear deserving of your attention, and as are connected with the administration, generally, of the revenue affairs of this presidency, or have special reference to the Lower Provinces, leaving for the subject of a separate communication, all questions relating merely to the revenue administration of the Western Provinces.

3. From the dispatches above-mentioned, your Honourable Court will have been made fully acquainted with the sentiments entertained by Government, respecting the necessity of reviving the office of Canongoe in the Lower Provinces, and of reforming that of Putwarry generally throughout the country.

4. The Vice-President in Council, at the same time, conveyed to you the assurance, that no pains would be spared to place both these institutions on a proper footing.

5. The office of Putwarry, already, you are aware, exists pretty generally throughout the country; but the entire dependence of those functionaries on the Zemindars, and the other defects in the constitution of the office, render it quite inoperative, as a means of ascertaining and securing the rights of the peasantry, with reference to which it was chiefly considered in the discussion to which which we have referred, and of little utility in promoting the other objects of public interest to which it ought to be subservient. Revenue Letter from Bengal, 1 Nov 1816.

6. The introduction, however, of any alteration in an office so extensive in its general operation, and at the same time so intimately connected in its immediate effects with the details of village police, consequently so much removed from the supervision of the European officer, was obviously a matter of much delicacy.

7. To maintain the natural and necessary connection of those functionaries with the Zemindars, and at the same time to render them useful instruments to the officers of Government in ascertaining the just rights of the peasantry, is evidently a task of some difficulty. A defect in the constitution of an office of this kind must, in a peculiar manner, endanger all the advantages contemplated from its institution, since the nature of the machinery must be such, that if once disordered in its movements, it will be difficult for any interference on the part of the Revenue authorities to correct their irregularity.

8. Before, therefore, proceeding to carry our intentions, with respect to this office, into effect, we deemed it proper not only to consult the several Revenue Boards, but also to seek the advantage of the advice of the members of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut.

9. This circumstance has hitherto prevented the adoption of any specific plan of reform; but the several Revenue authorities have already communicated their sentiments on the rules to be enacted for that purpose; and we have reason to believe that, in the course of a few weeks, we shall be furnished with the report of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut on the subject, and be enabled to proceed, with little further delay, to carry the designed measure into effect.

10. The delay which has hitherto occurred in our determination on this subject, is not, indeed, likely to be attended with any practical inconvenience, because we deem it essential to the efficiency of the Putwarries that the Collectors should be aided in their control over them by the intermediate agency of Pergunnah Canongoes, and it will therefore, we think, be advisable, that the re-establishment of these offices should, in all instances, precede any legislative interference with the office of Putwarry.

11. The office of Canongoe, as it exists in the Western Provinces, appeared to be constituted in a manner (differing slightly from that which had formerly obtained in the Lower Provinces) which sufficiently answered the object of the institution; and in re-establishing it, therefore, we were not aware that any modification of its constitution would be requisite, the consideration of which need delay our proceeding to that measure.

12 We were, therefore, deterred from immediately re-establishing the office generally, throughout the country, chiefly by a consideration of the expense by which it might be attended.

13. It appeared, likewise, advisable to proceed gradually, that the experience obtained in carrying the measure into effect in one part of the country, might aid its prosecution in the remainder; while, at the same time, we can scarcely expect that the Board of Revenue, consisting of two members, to whom their ordinary duties at the presidency afford, in general, ample emloyment, could possibly find leisure to superintend the operations which, in the event of the general and simultaneous adoption of the measure, must necessarily have been in progress in all the districts subject to their control.

14. In the province of Behar, the families of the old Canongoes still remain, we have reason to believe, much more entire than in other parts of the Lower Provinces; and the rent of free lands, which were granted to them in lieu of the wages of their office, can still, we feel confident, be in most instances distinctly ascertained.

15. The revenue of those lands might, of course, justly have been resumed, at the period when the office of Canongoe was abolished.

16. The long forbearance of Government could not, however, be considered in any respect to have barred its right to resume the revenue of the lands in question, question, which had only been temporarily alienated, in consideration of a specific service, when that service was no longer performed, or when Government judged it expedient to alter the mode of its remuneration.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 1 Nov. 1816.

17. In determining, therefore, to re-establish the office of Canongoe, we did not hesitate to resolve that the revenue of the rent-free lands, held by the former Canongoes in virtue of their offices, should be declared liable to immediate resumption, in the mode adopted under Regulation IV, 1808, in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces; and the above consideration clearly pointed out the province of Behar, as that portion of the Lower Provinces where the arrangement would most fitly be commenced.

18. The revenue of these lands, we had already reason to believe, would afford a fund fully adequate to defray the expence incident to the re-establishment of Canongoes in the province in question, even although, in the practical resumption of it, we should make liberal indulgence for cases of individual hardship.

19. We felt satisfied, however, that these objects could not be fully attained through the agency of the Collectors of the several districts (to most of whom, habituated to the routine of business incident to the situation of Collector of the Lower Provinces, the duty of effecting the contemplated arrangements would be in a great measure novel), without the local and direct superintendence of some officer of acknowledged ability and experience, to give vigour and consistency to their exertions.

20. The distance of the province of Behar, particularly that portion of it which is comprised in the zillah of Behar (proper), Shahabad, Sarun, and Tirhoot, from the ordinary seat of the Board of Revenue, is evidently too great to admit of their exercising that active and efficient control which the occasion particularly required.

21. The number of the Board being now limited to two, scarcely admit of any lengthened deputation of one of their members, without throwing upon the other a weight of business (and much of it, as connected with the growing commerce of the city, urgent in its nature) which cannot properly be long imposed on any one officer, however able, zealous, and industrious.

22. Mr. Richardson, too, the junior Member of the Board, was then preparing to return to England; so that, even if we had otherwise deemed it advisable to avail ourselves of his services at Behar, it would have been at that moment impracticable.

23. But, in truth, although the immediate object of the re-establishment of the Canongoes, and the reformation of the office of Putwarry, suggested the necessity of employing a special Commissioner in the province of Behar, because they brought more immediately and forcibly to our notice the disadvantages under which the Board of Revenue must superintend the revenue affairs of that province, we felt the strongest conviction, that independently of those arrangements, many important advantages would result from placing the province under the authority of a Commissioner invested with the ordinary powers of the Board of Revenue, and do not hesitate to anticipate, with the most perfect confidence, that the fiscal advantages alone will considerably more than compensate for the charge attendant on such a commission.

24. The same considerations apply, with still greater force, to the province of Benares. Not only is it distantly removed from the ordinary seat of the Board of Commissioners, but the duties of that Board in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and especially their superintendence of the several settlements still in formation, must inevitably leave them comparatively little leisure to exercise, within that extensive province, the close and efficient controul which the important arrangements alluded to must peculiarly require; and which, indeed, cannot be withheld from the province, even under ordinary circumstances, without serious detriment.

25. With these impressions, we resolved, at the same time that we made legislative provision for the re-establishment of the Canongoe's office in the portion of Behar comprizing the zillahs above specified, to appoint a local commission commission for the superintendence of the revenues of these zillahs, and of the province of Benares jointly; and for that purpose, accordingly, Regulations I and II of the present year were enacted.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 1 Nov. 1816.

26. The talents and great experience of Mr. Deane, the junior Member of the Board of Commissioners, induced us to consider him as the person best qualified for this important service; especially from that gentleman's having been formerly employed as a revenue officer in the province of Behar for a considerable period, and from his having also an intimate acquaintance with the state of Benares. We accordingly appointed him to the office of Commissioner in Behar and Benares.

27. For the present, we have viewed the commission as only of a temporary nature; and accordingly Mr. Deane, and the gentlemen attached to his office, retain their ordinary situations, and receive only such additional allowances as the enlarged responsibility of their duties, and the increased expense incident to their situation, rendered it indispensably necessary to grant them.

28. For the details of this arrangement, we beg permission to refer you to the proceedings noted in the margin.*

29. The establishment of the Commissioner has, you will find, been framed with every possible attention to economy.

30. We shall hereafter have an opportunity of communicating, in a comprehensive manner, to your Honourable Court, the result of Mr. Deane's labours, when his operations shall have arrived at a stage of greater maturity.

31. In the mean time, it may be sufficient to intimate that the re-establishment of the Canongoes has already been effected in several of the districts subject to Mr. Deane's control; and to assure you, generally, that we have had abundant reason to be satisfied with the expediency of so employing him, and expect to be able, at a very early period of time, to satisfy your Honourable Court that the anticipations of advantage which we had indulged are well founded.

Mal Adawluts.

32. The great importance of the objects which we contemplated in the establishment of Mal Adawluts, and the magnitude of the alterations which it was naturally calculated to introduce in the judicial system of our Government, rendered us anxious to proceed to the adoption of the measure with every possible circumspection.

33. We accordingly, after receiving the opinion of the several Revenue Boards on the subject, deemed it proper to refer it to the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, in order that they might, after the maturest consideration, furnish us with their sentiments on the plans which the several Boards had recommended.

34. The magnitude of the question referred to them, and the other avocations of the court, have hitherto prevented our receiving the report which the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut was called upon to furnish, so that we have not yet been able to come to any final determination on this important subject.

35. We still, however, keep the object which we contemplated in its adoption steadily in view, and hope to be able, before long, to report to your Honourable Court, that we have made some progress to their attainment.

Surveys.

36. From the proceedings noted in the margin,† your Honourable Court will observe, that we have not been inattentive to the object of organizing an establishment for the execution of local surveys, adapted to the purposes of the Revenue and Judicial departments, in an expeditious and scientific manner.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 1 Nov. 1816.

37. The absence of the Surveyor General, Colonel Colin Mackenzie, has hitherto, indeed, prevented the full accomplishment of our wishes in this respect.

38. We shall, however, lose no time, on his arrival at this presidency, in carrying our intentions into effect; and, in the mean time, we trust that the measures which have been taken will, at a very early period, afford to the Revenue officers in those quarters where the necessity of surveys is most urgent, the assistance of an agency, infinitely superior to that to which they had hitherto been obliged to have recourse, on occasions calling for the measurement of estates and the determination of their limits.

Cuttack.

39. The circumstances of the district of Cuttack, the great defectiveness of our information in regard to the extent and value of the lands comprised in it, and the urgent necessity of obtaining accurate information on those points with a view to the formation of a settlement, and especially a permanent settlement, on just and proper grounds, all tended to point out the peculiar necessity of establishing Canongoes in that province; and although we could look with little confidence to the existence of a fund there, which, like the nankar lands in Behar, could be rendered available as an immediate means of covering the expense of the establishment, we did not consider this a sufficient reason for delaying its introduction.

40. It cannot, indeed, we think, be doubted, that without such an establishment, the means of information possessed by the Revenue authorities must still continue far too imperfect for the due administration of the affairs of the district. It is unnecessary to state how little, in such a condition of things, the Government can be secured from the evasion of its just dues, and the body of the people preserved from the still more serious evil of an unequal, and in some cases, excessive assessment.

41. We have accordingly enacted Regulation V of the present year, for the establishment of Canongoes in the province of Cuttack.

42. The consideration already alluded to, viz. the defectiveness of the information which we possess in regard to that province, induced us also to avoid having recourse to a re-settlement of the land revenue at the termination of the late settlement, which expired with the umlee year 1223, or in September last, and for this purpose to extend that settlement, by a legislative enactment, for the three ensuing years.

43. The measure of so extending the settlement had before been had recourse to in the preceding year, but the caution suggested by the novelty of the procedure had induced Government, on that occasion, to limit the extension to the period of one year.

44. The great advantages resulting from the arrangement; its perfect simplicity; the security given by it, on the one hand, to the public resources, and the relief afforded by it, on the other, to the Zemindars, from the harassment of a new settlement, and from the exactions from which, on such an occasion, it is scarcely possible for any activity or talent on the part of the Collector altogether to protect them: these considerations powerfully suggested the expediency of again having recourse to the same proceeding, and the only question that remained for consideration was, the period within which the Revenue authorities might be expected to be prepared to enter on a re-settlement of the district with advantage.

45. The recent period at which Mr. Richardson's settlement, to which we had the honour to call your attention in our dispatch under date the 31st January 1815, had been concluded, renders it impossible that any material alteration in the condition of the province had in the mean time occurred; and we have no reason to imagine that a new settlement of the district would under the circumstances under which it must have been formed be productive of any material advantage, either by an increase, or a more accurate distribution of the jumma assessed by Mr. Richardson.

46. Until, indeed, the office of Canongoe be established on a proper footing, and the reformation of the Putwarries effected, and sufficient means exist exist at the disposal of the Revenue officers of executing surveys in a scientific and expeditious manner, every settlement that is formed must necessarily be founded on insufficient grounds; and each successive settlement being merely a repetition of the same imperfect process, there can be had no sufficient security that the errors of past settlements will, in any considerable degree, be corrected by future operations, conducted on the same principles.

47. This observation must particularly hold true in respect to settlements of a short duration, of which the term must frequently expire, before the Revenue officer can possibly make that minute and detailed investigation necessary to the duly ascertaining the assets of the several estates.

48. We hoped, however, that in the course of the ensuing three years, the Collector of Cuttack, relieved in a great measure from the labour of forming new settlements, would be able to bring to maturity the several subsidiary arrangements to which we have had occasion to allude, and to have acquired generally such accurate information on the several points requisite to the proper formation of a settlement, as would enable him to enter successfully on the performance of that duty.

49. By the perusal of Regulation VI of the present year, your Honourable Court will become acquainted with the several legislative provisions which we deemed it necessary to enact on the occasion; and for the fuller explanation of our sentiments on the several most important points connected with the Revenue administration of the district now under consideration, we beg leave to refer your Honourable Court to the correspondence with the Board of Revenue noted in the margin.*

Sunderbuns.

50. In the fifty-first and following paragraphs of a dispatch from the Revenue department, under date the 29th November 1814, the attention of your Honourable Court was directed to a correspondence with the Board of Revenue, on the subject of the assessment of certain portions of the tract of country usually denominated the Sunderbuns; and you are aware that we have long had in view the adoption of some measure, of a more comprehensive nature than those which have hitherto been pursued, for the purpose of drawing a revenue from the whole of the lands in that tract of country, which have been brought into cultivation since the period of the permanent settlement.

51. The great extent to which, from the information required in the prosecution of the partial measures above alluded to, it appeared that the interests of Government were suffering, from our forbearance in demanding revenue on the tracts of country in question, seemed to require that we should no longer delay the carrying our intentions into effect.

52. We accordingly resolved to place the whole of the lands denominated the Sunderbuns under the immediate charge of a Commissioner, vested with the powers ordinarily exercised by Collectors of Land Revenue, with a salary on the same scale as is usually drawn by those officers in the Lower Provinces, viz. Rupees 1500 per mensem, and with authority to draw a contingent bill for boat-hire and other extraordinary charges actually incurred.

53. The whole expense attending the institution of this office will be extremely moderate; and we are sanguine in expecting, that a very considerable increase in the public resources will speedily result from it.

54. In fact, instead of apprehending that we have erred in fashioning the establishment on too large and expensive a plan, we rather fear, to use the words of the minute recorded by the Governor-General on the occasion of proposing the measure,† that the machinery will be found too slight for the work required to be performed.

55. Regulation IX of the present year will sufficiently inform you of the legislative rules which have been passed for fixing the constitution, powers, and duties of the office; and the general nature of the measures to which we conceive the attention of the officer who has been appointed to it ought to be, in the first first instance, directed, as well as the general grounds on which our determination in this matter was founded, are so fully detailed in the minute to which we have referred, that we deem it unnecessary to trouble your Honourable Court with a repetition of them in this place.

56. Mr. David Scott, junior, having been relieved from the charge of the Collectorship of Cuttack, by the return of Mr. Trower, Collector of that district, from the Cape of Good Hope, and appearing to us well qualified, both by previous experience in similar situations and by his general character as a revenue officer, to discharge the functions of Commissioner of the Sunderbuns, we appointed him to that situation.*

Bhaugulpore.

59. The inquiries of the Governor-General, during his late tour, had afforded ground for the belief, that in the district of Bhaugulpore there were to be found extensive wastes, which might be rendered a source of no inconsiderable increase to the revenues of the state; and Mr. Salmon, whom, on the departure of Mr. Richardson for England, we appointed a member of the Board of Revenue, being then on the spot, we judged it advisable to avail ourselves of the services of that gentleman, in conducting the inquiries necessary to the forming of a decisive opinion in respect to the extent and importance of the advantages to be derived from the wastes in question, and the best mode of securing them. Mr. Salmon accordingly remained in Bhaugulpore for several months, with the full powers of a member of the Board of Revenue, and pursuing the inquiries to which his attention had been directed.

60. It appeared, however, from the tenor of his communications, that although the wastes in Zillah Bhaugulpore are very extensive, and in many places very capable of improvement, and although Mr. Salmon was decidedly of opinion that the right of Government to additional revenue from a large portion of such lands could successfully be maintained, yet the immediate assertion of that right would be a matter of considerable difficulty. At the same time, we had reason to know his presence was urgently demanded at the presidency, by the pressure of business at the Board of Revenue. We deemed it, therefore, proper, on the 30th August, to direct Mr. Salmon to assume his seat at the Board,† leaving to a future opportunity the practical prosecution of our plans for rendering the waste lands in Bhaugulpore a source of increased revenue to the state.

61. The views with which we were guided in thus employing Mr. Salmon, and the general principles on which we contemplated the assertion of a claim to revenue from the lands in question, are so fully stated in the minute of the Governor-General proposing the measure, and in the several letters communicating our instructions to Mr. Salmon, ‡ that we deem it unnecessary, on the present occasion, to detain your Honourable Court by any lengthened remarks on the subject.

62. It may be sufficient here to notice, that however anxious we naturally are to pursue such measures as, by bringing on the rent-roll of Government lands held exempt from revenue, without any valid title to such partial exemptions, which may increase the public resources without adding to the public burthens, we have yet earnestly endeavoured, in all our instructions to the several Revenue authorities, to impress upon them the necessity of avoiding every thing that might, in any degree, be at variance with the spirit of the perpetual settlement, or give any just ground of alarm as to the stability of that compact.

63. It

63. It will likewise, no doubt, be satisfactory to your Honourable Court to learn, that while we expect Mr. Salmon to fulfil, at an early period, the more immediate object of his mission, by furnishing us, in the report which he is now preparing, with the information requisite to the proper fashioning of our future plans, we have good reason to believe, that his deputation will be found to have been attended with no inconsiderable immediate advantage in the more efficient conduct of the revenue affairs of the district of Bhaugulpore, naturally resulting from a nearer and more active control, and in a consequent increase in the public revenue.

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 1 Nov. 1816.

64. We cannot, indeed, forbear taking this opportunity of expressing our opinion of the great advantage which would result from deputing, from time to time, a member of the Board of Revenue to exercise a local control in the several districts subject to your authority; especially in the more extensive collectorships, which include several districts.

65. With a Board of Revenue, however, consisting of only two members, this object cannot, it is obvious, be attained, without materially interfering with the still more important object of the full and effectual discharge of the duties of that Board.

66. Adverting to the enlarged powers possessed by that Board, and particularly the character of the functions which, in almost every important revenue question, it exercises, as the immediate adviser of Government, it appears to us that it would, in general, be indispensably necessary to secure for it the united labours and joint deliberations of two persons, even although the pressure of the ordinary business of the Board were not, as it is, too great for the exertions of one individual, however zealous, able, and industrious.

A.D 1816. REGULATION V.

A Regulation for establishing the office of Canongoe in the District of Cuttack, the Pergunnah of Puttaspore, and the several Pergunnahs dependent on it: Passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 16th February 1816, corresponding with the 6th Phagoon 1222 Bengal era; the 3d Phagoon 1223 Fusily; the 7th Phagoon 1223 Willaity; the 3d Phagoon 1872 Sumbut, and the 16th Rubee-ul-awul 1231 Higeree.

Regulation V, A.D 1816.

Preamble.

WHEREAS the establishment of the office of Canongoe in the district of Cuttack, the pergunnah of Puttaspore, and its dependencies, may be expected to be of great public benefit, in removing the obstacles which have hitherto impeded the revision of the settlement of the district and pergunnahs above-mentioned, and in otherwise facilitating the collection of the public revenue and the administration of justice, the following rules have been enacted, to be in force from the 1st March 1816, corresponding with the 20th Phagoon 1222 Bengal era; the 17th Phagoon 1223 Fusily; the 21st Phagoon 1223 Willaity; the 2d Phagoon 1872 Sumbut, and the 1st Rubee-us-Sanee 1231 Higeree.

II. One or two persons shall be appointed to fill the office of Canongoe in every pergunnah of the district of Cuttack, in the pergunnah of Puttaspore, and in the several pergunnahs dependent on it, unless the small extent of a pergunnah shall render it advisable to place more than one pergunnah under the same Canongoe.

In what manner they are to be nominated and removed.

III. These officers shall be nominated by the Collectors of Cuttack and Hidgellee, within their respective local jurisdictions, for the approval of the Board of Revenue, and shall not be removable from office, except for sufficient cause, proved to the satisfaction of that authority, under the provisions of Regulation V, 1804, and Regulation VIII, 1809.

It is also hereby declared, that the revenue of all lands, the grant of which may be found to have been obtained by any person in virtue of his discharging the duties of Canongoe, will be liable to resumption by Government; and that this rule shall be considered applicable both to the persons who may be appointed to the office of Canongoe under the present Regulation, and to those who may not be employed in the public service. Nothing, however, contained in this provision, shall be construed to preclude the Governor-General in Council from continuing to either of those classes of persons the whole or a part of the lands held by them respectively, free of assessment, in those cases in which the circumstances of the parties may appear to require that indulgence.

The revenue of lands, held by persons in virtue of their office of Canongoe, liable to resumption;

A Regulation for extending, for a further Period of three Years, the existing Settlement of Cuttack, Pergunnah Puttaspore, and its Dependencies, in all cases in which the Settlement may have been concluded with Zemindars or actual Proprietors of the Land · passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 8th March 1816, corresponding with the 27th Phagoon 1222 Bengal era; the 24th Phagoon 1223 Fusily; the 28th Phagoon 1223 Willaity; the 9th Phagoon 1872 Sumbut; and the 8th Rubbi-us-sanee 1231 Higeree.

Regulation VI, A. D. 1816.

Preamble.

WHEREAS the existing settlement of the district of Cuttack, the pergunnah of Puttaspore and its dependencies, will expire with the present year 1223 Umlee, and whereas the information hitherto acquired by the Government and the Revenue authorities, respecting the limits and produce of the several estates comprised within the said district and places, is too imperfect, either with reference to the rights and interests of Government or of the proprietors themselves, to afford grounds for the proper adjustment of an assessment which is to remain fixed in perpetuity, the following rules have been enacted, to be in force from the date of their promulgation, in the district of Cuttack, and in the pergunnah of Puttaspore and its dependencies.

II. The existing settlement of the land revenue of the district of Cuttack, and of the pergunnah of Puttaspore and its dependencies, shall, in all cases in which it may have been concluded with Zemindars or other acknowledged proprietors of land, continue in force until the expiration of the year 1226 Umlee, subject to the following provisions.

The existing settlement of Cuttack, and of the pergunnah of Puttaspore and its dependencies, to continue in force until the expiration of the year 1226 Umlee.

III. If any Zemindars who have entered into engagements for the payment of the public revenue during the existing settlement, shall not be willing to continue those engagements to the expiration of the ensuing year 1226 Umlee, they shall notify the same to the Collector of Cuttack, or to the Collector of Hidgellee, according as the lands may be subject to the authority of either of those officers, on or before the 1st July next, corresponding with the 19th Assaur 1223 Bengal era; the 21st Assaur 1223 Fusily; the 20th Assaur 1223 Willaity; the 6th Assaur 1873 Sumbut; and the 4th Sabaun 1231 Higeree.

Zemindars who may not be willing to continue their engagements to the expiration of the year 1226 Umlee, to notify the same on or before the 1st July 1816.

IV. All Zemindars who shall not make a notification to the effect and within the period abovementioned, shall be held, and are hereby declared to be responsible for the payment of the same revenue during the ensuing three years (viz. until the expiration of the year 1226 Umlee), as may be specified in their engagements for the year 1222 Umlee, and is demandable from them on account of the present year 1223 Umlee, under the provisions of Regulation III, 1815.

All Zemindars who may not make a notification to the effect and within the period abovementioned, declared to be responsible for the payment of the same revenue as may be specified in their engagements for the year 1222 Umlee.

V. With respect to the lands which were let to farm in the year 1222 Umlee, and which were by special indulgence continued in the occupancy of the farmers during the year 1223 Umlee, under the provisions of Regulation III, 1815, as well as lands now held khaus, the settlement of all such lands shall be formed for the ensuing three years with the Zemindars, or other actual proprietors of land, supposing such persons to be willing to engage for the payment of the public revenue on such terms as may appear reasonable, according to the most accurate information obtainable regarding the produce of their lands.

VI. In cases in which the Zemindars may decline to engage for the payment of the revenue demandable from their lands during the ensuing three years, or in which no acknowledged proprietors of lands may be forthcoming, it will of course be the duty of the Collector to consider whether the lands should be let to farm, or whether the rents should be collected directly from the great body of the Ryots, (or, in other words, whether the lands shall be khaus); or whether, which will probably be found to be the most convenient and beneficial method, a settlement should be formed, for the above period of three years, for the several villages with the head Ryot, however denominated, of each village respectively.

A. D. 1816, REGULATION IX.

A Regulation for the Appointment of a Commissioner of Revenue, within that portion of the districts of the twenty-four Pergunnahs, Nuddea, Jessore and Backergunge, commonly denominated the Sunderbuns; Passed by the Governor-General in Council on the 26th April 1816, corresponding with the 15*th Bysack* 1223 Bengal era; the 14*th Bysack* 1223 Fusily; the 16*th Bysack* 1223 Willaity; the 14*th Bysack* 1873 Sumbut; and the 27*th Jumadee-ul-awul* 1231 Higeree.

REVENUE LETTER from BENGAL,

Dated the 28th November 1817.

(Territorial Department.)

Behar and Benares.

To the Honourable the Court of Directors for Affairs of the Honourable the United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East-Indies.

Honourable Sirs:

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 28 Nov. 1817.

Par. 1. The dispatch from this department, under date the 29th October last, conveyed to your Honourable Court information of the lamented death of Mr. John Deane, late Commissioner in Behar and Benares; and it will likewise have apprised you, generally, of the arrangements by which it was proposed to provide for the superintendence of the revenue affairs of those provinces, and of a portion of Bengal, which it was designed to place under the authority of the Commission.

2. We have now the honour of informing you, that we have, with the concurrence of the Most Noble the Governor-General, carried into effect the measures contemplated at the date of the above dispatch. In other words, we have resolved that the powers now vested in the Commission of Behar and Benares shall be exercised by a Board, consisting of two members, and that the districts of Dinagepore and Rungpore shall be placed under the authority of that Board.

3. A

Revenue Letter from Bengal, 28 Nov. 1817.

3. A Regulation has accordingly been passed by us, for modifying the constitution of the Commission, and for extending its authority to the districts of Dinagepore and Rungpore, on the principles above stated.

4. In the dispatch above referred to, your Honourable Court was informed, that Mr. Rocke had been appointed to succeed Mr. Deane. We have now, in pursuance of the above resolution, associated in the Commission with Mr. Rocke, Mr. E. S. Waring, a gentleman whose talents and character we have every reason highly to esteem.

5. The Commission must still be considered as a temporary arrangement only, and Mr. Waring will therefore retain the office which he at present holds, in like manner as Mr. Rocke retains his situation in the Board of Revenue. The former, however, will assume the denomination of Junior Commissioner in Behar and Benares; and adverting to the indefinite length of the period during which he may be employed in that situation, it appeared to us proper to determine, by special resolutions, the mode and extent of remuneration to be assigned to him for his services as Commissioner.

6. The same considerations (viz. the uncertainty of Mr. Waring's return to Bundlecund, and the indefinite period to which his absence may be extended) have led us to resolve on the adoption of a similar course, in adjusting the allowances to be granted to the person who shall be vested with the charge of the Collectorship of Bundlecund in Mr. Waring's room.

7. Under the above circumstances, it appeared consistent with the principle on which Collectors are remunerated for their labours in superintending the sale of stamps, the abkarree department, and the collections on account of ferries, that the commission derivable from those sources of revenue in Bundlecund should be assigned to the person who may be placed in charge of that district in the room of Mr. Waring, and that the extra allowances to be assigned to that gentleman should include a compensation for the loss of those emoluments.

8. From a statement furnished by the Civil Auditor, it appears that the average monthly commission of the Collector of Bundlecund, on the sale of stampt paper and abkarree collections, amounted in the past year to Lucknow Rupees 526, or about Sicca Rupees 500.

9. Obvious considerations induced us to observe every possible economy in framing the present arrangement; but with reference to the enlarged responsibility of the situation now assigned to Mr. Waring, and to the increased expense to which it will necessarily subject him, we conceived that in fixing the extra allowance to be assigned to Mr. Waring at Sicca Rupees 1,500 per mensem, to cover all extraordinary expenses and the loss of commission, amounting as above to Sicca Rupees 500 per mensem, we assumed the lowest scale of remuneration consistent with justice to that officer.

10. We accordingly resolved, that in addition to the salary now drawn by Mr. Waring as Collector of Bundlecund, a monthly allowance of Rupees 1,500 should be assigned to Mr. Waring, making his total allowance Sicca Rupees 3,500 per mensem.

11. We further resolved, in conformity with the sentiments of the local Government already recorded, and the opinion now expressed by the Most Noble the Governor-General, to assimilate the offices of Secretary and of Sub-Secretary and Accountant to the Commission in Behar and Benares, to the corresponding offices attached to the Commissioners in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. The Secretary, Mr. R. Chamberlain, to receive Rupees 2,000, and the Sub-Secretary and Accountant (who will hereafter be appointed) Rupees 1,200 per mensem.

12. As already intimated, the officer who may be appointed to the charge of the district of Bundlecund, will receive the commission ordinarily enjoyed by the Collector of that district on the several branches of revenue above-enumerated. It appeared to us expedient to leave to the Board of Commissioners the selection of the person who should immediately relieve Mr. Waring; and we shall hereafter determine whether, any and what extra allowance, in addition to the above commission, shall be assigned to the person who may officiate as Collector of Bundlecund.

13. We have desired the Board to report their sentiments on that head; and as it is probable that, in selecting a person to assume charge of the highly responsible and difficult situation of Collector of Bundlecund, their choice will be directed to some one now actually holding the situation of a Collector, their report will naturally embrace the question of the disposal of the commission now drawn by the officer whom they may select.

14. We shall, of course, hereafter report to your Honourable Court the final arrangement adopted by us on the above points, which still remain to be provided for.

15. For the convenience of reference, we have deemed it right to transmit enclosed (numbers in the packet), the several papers detailed in the annexed list, containing the proceedings of Government connected with the arrangements referred to in the letter from this department of the 29th October, and in the present dispatch.

16. Your Honourable Court will doubtless peruse with the utmost interest and attention, the strong testimony which the Most Noble the Governor-General has borne to the value of the services rendered by Mr. Deane, and to the universal sense entertained of the benefit which had resulted from the formation of the Commission.

17. With respect, indeed, to the eminent merits of that distinguished officer, the records of Government must have long since prepared your Honourable Court fully to appreciate their value; but you will not fail to remark, that the personal observation of the Most Noble the Governor-General has so strongly impressed him with the advantages derived from the immediate supervision of a Revenue Board in the provinces in question, that while acceding to the proposal of making the appointment temporary, until the pleasure of your Honourable Court is known, his Lordship distinctly states, that "conceiving the "advantages of such a Board unquestionably substantiated, he should have "had no hesitation about making the Commission a permanent part of our "Revenue arrangements."

18. On this point we may expect an early communication of your Honourable Court's sentiments; and we need not assure you, that before adopting a measure involving so considerable an increase of immediate expense, we shall feel it our duty to weigh, with the most careful attention, the advantages to be derived from it in return.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sirs,
Your most faithful humble servants,

(Signed) G. DOWDESWELL.

Fort William,
28th November 1817.

REVENUE LETTER to BENGAL,

Dated the 22d April, 1818.

To our Governor-General in Council, at Fort William in Bengal.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, 22 April, 1818.

Par. 1. Our last letter to you in this department was dated the 29th October last.

2. We received, on the 28th ultimo, your letter of the 4th July last in the Judicial Department, containing the intelligence of an insurrection in the province of Cuttack, which had burst forth in the end of March, and which, we are sorry to find, had not been quelled at the date of your dispatch.

3. This intelligence had previously reached us through a variety of private channels, as well as through the medium of the Calcutta Gazettes; and the allusions allusions which had been made to the insurrection, as matter of notoriety, in official dispatches from the Governments of Fort St. George and Bombay, had excited the utmost anxiety in our minds, to be made acquainted with all the particulars connected with that alarming and unexpected event. We cannot, therefore refrain from expressing our surprise, that you should have suffered three months to elapse, after the fact of the insurrection had come to your knowledge, without making any communication to us, upon an occurrence so deeply and painfully interesting; and we repeat our positive injunctions, that we may not thus be kept in ignorance by our local Government of transactions long known to the public of this country, from private letters and printed journals.

4. As you have declared yourselves unprepared, at the period when your dispatch was written, to furnish us with accurate information respecting the real causes and objects of the insurrection in Cuttack, we feel that it would be premature in us to deduce conclusions from the documents of which we have been put in possession, more especially as we are in daily expectation of the receipt of others, which we trust will enable us to enter upon a full view and investigation of all the circumstances, which may have led to the commission of a series of acts of systematic outrage in one of the provinces under your immediate authority.

5. We are nevertheless desirous, without further delay, to signify our entire concurrence in your opinion, that " however necessary it may be to employ " the most vigorous measures for the suppression of the existing disturbances, " the permanent tranquillity of the country can only be secured by a patient " investigation regarding the condition and temper of the people, and by the " removal of any abuses and irregularities which may have crept into the " internal administration of the affairs of the district." Accordingly, we highly approve of your having called upon Mr. Watson, the fourth judge of the Calcutta Court of Circuit, the Magistrate, the Collector, and the Salt Agent of Cuttack, respectively, " to ascertain and report fully and distinctly, " whether they had reason to believe that the inhabitants of Cuttack, gene- " rally, were disaffected and discontented; whether certain specified griev- " ances, or any other grievances, did in fact exist; and, if so, how far they " could be removed by the interposition of Government, either in its legis- " lative or executive capacity."

6. Mr. Watson and Mr. Impey are the only two of the functionaries to whom the foregoing instruction was addressed, who had, at the date of your letter, submitted the required reports; and these it is impossible to peruse without profound concern and regret. Indeed, many of the facts which are therein stated reflect so heavily upon the Revenue administration of the province, that it would be precipitate to give utterance to the sentiments which they are calculated to excite, before an opportunity has been afforded, not only to the Collector and the Salt Agent, but to the Boards of Revenue and Trade, to explain the proceedings in their respective departments.

7. In prosecuting the investigation upon which you have entered, you will naturally carry back your inquiries to the measures which were adopted during and soon after the conquest of Cuttack, particularly as they affected the Rajah of Khoordah, his family and dependents.

8. It is also desirable, with the view of forming an accurate judgment of the immediate cause or causes of the revolt in the southern part of Cuttack, that we should be furnished with the report which you have very properly requested the Government of Fort St. George to prepare and transmit to you, respecting the origin and character of the late disturbances in the contiguous and permanently-settled district of Ganjam.

9. Whilst we approve of the proceedings to which you have resorted for the suppression of the insurrection in Cuttack, we earnestly hope that the powers of administering martial law, which have been confided to Major-General Sir G. Martindell, will be exercised with as much forbearance as circumstances may admit of. Moderation and clemency would be becoming in all cases; but they are more particularly incumbent upon us in one where, we fear, there are too good grounds for believing that the affections of the people may have been been alienated from our Government by mal-administration, and that they may have been goaded by suffering to resistance.

10. You will, doubtless, feel it to be an urgent and imperative duty to redress existing grievances, and to reform every part of the internal administration of the province which may require correction or alteration. The interests of the people of India and of the Company, alike prescribe a persevering course of just, beneficent, and healing measures.

11. In our dispatches from this department, of the 8th of April and 29th October last, we particularly called your attention to the great hardship attendant upon sales of land for arrears of revenue, in districts under temporary settlements; and, in the last mentioned dispatch, we expressed an anxious hope, that you might be enabled to devise some modification of your present Regulations, as they regard the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, with the view of preventing, as far as practicable, the resort to a measure so cruel in its operation upon individuals.

12. This process is stated, in the papers now before us, to have effected, in the course of eleven years, a transfer of more than half the landed property in Cuttack. Such a sweeping system of confiscation is as discreditable to our Government, as it must be intolerable to the people who live under it.

13. We have frequently had occasion to regret, in the course of our correspondence, the little information which has been acquired, not only respecting the resources of Cuttack, but also respecting the landed tenures and the rights of those connected with the soil; and till those defects are supplied, it is impossible to know whether the assessment is higher or lower than it ought to be, and whether the difficulty of realising it is ascribable to its exorbitancy, to the inequality of its distribution, to the mode in which it is levied, to the currency in which it is paid, or to a combination of those and other causes.

14. These are matters which ought to undergo a careful examination; and we desire that you will forthwith proceed in the prosecution of that work, in order that the source of the evil may be accurately ascertained, and proper remedies applied.

15. It is indispensable, also, that the speediest measures should be adopted for securing to the inhabitants a sufficient supply of salt at a fair and moderate price.

16. The expediency of restoring to the Packs their service-lands, and of again appropriating to the ferries the lands which were formerly allotted for their maintenance, but which appear to have been most injudiciously and unwarrantably resumed, likewise merits your earliest attention. We also desire to be furnished with a copy of the proceedings relative to these resumptions.

17. In the instructions issued to Mr. Impey and Mr. Watson, for ascertaining how far certain grievances which had been specified by Mr. Dowdeswell, in his minute of the 11th April last, or any others, were connected with the origin and history of the insurrection in Cuttack, you do not appear to have called on them for their opinion, as to whether in any, and in what degree, it might be attributable to the operation of your judicial system. The minute of the Marquis of Hastings on the affairs of that department of internal administration under the Presidency of Fort William, dated the 2d October 1815, even if you had not been in possession of our dispatch of the 29th November 1814 on the same subject, was well calculated to suggest the expediency of making that point a distinct article of inquiry. We trust that this matter will not be overlooked. We wish the investigation to be as full and particular as possible.

18. We at present merely advert to these points of primary importance, it being our intention to communicate to you our sentiments more fully, when we are put in possession of all the reports which you have called for, upon a subject which we cannot help regarding as intimately connected with the reputation and stability of the British power in India.

19. We take this occasion of mentioning the disappointment we have experienced, at not having received the report* of the Commission which you appointed,

Dated the 15th January 1819.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

Letter from, dated 7th October, 1815.

(Par. 2 to 16) Refer to Letter of 19th August, which contains a general outline of the arrangements proposed to be adopted regarding some of the important questions discussed in the Court's dispatches of the 6th January and 17th March 1815, and submit the sentiments of Government on the following points: the permanency of the settlement in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, surveys, rights of the peasantry, Canongoes and Putwarries, and maal adawluts

Par. 5. We shall make a few observations on each of the important topics treated of in these paragraphs, in the order in which they occur.

Permanency of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

6. We fully approve of your having abstained from declaring permanent any of the settlements hitherto concluded in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces. It is quite clear to us, that none of the districts are in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant sucha declaration. Independently of more general conderations, it is manifest that the highly important and necessary measures which you have in contemplation, and which we are now about to notice (measures which form the only true ground-work of a judicious and stable system of revenue administration, as it affects the interests of the inhabitants and of the Government under which they live) cannot, by any means, be executed with the same facility and effect under a fixed and permanent, as under a temporary settlement.

Surveys.

7. Our sentiments on the expediency of revenue surveys have been fully communicated to you, on former occasions, in this department of our correspondence. It is unnecessary, therefore, to say more on this subject at present, than that we entirely concur with you in opinion, as to their utility in various ways, but particularly in ascertaining the quantity of land of which estates are composed, and the proportions of the cultivated to the uncultivated part, in fixing the limits of villages and zemindarries, and thus preventing the serious affrays which so frequently occur respecting disputed boundaries, as well as in affording facilities for effecting the partition of estates.

8. We shall expect, of course, to be furnished with the details of the plan which the Surveyor-General may suggest for the performance of this duty, in consequence of your instructions of the 12th August 1815.

Rights of the Peasantry.

9. These paragraphs do not appear to us to comprehend, much less to answer satisfactorily, all the points which we stated to you, in our dispatch of the 17th March 1815, as requiring accurate investigation. Some of these are wholly passed by; and on the point on which you bestowed the greatest attention (that of the rights and privileges of the cultivators), you have not explained with sufficient accuracy the distinctions between the different classes, the discrimination of which is necessary to a clear understanding of the subject, and some of which, we fairly admit, were not present to our own mind, when our dispatch of the 17th March 1815 was written.

10. We do not clearly understand whether, in speaking of "resident Ryots," you do or do not contemplate only the khode-khoost Ryots, who have a permanent hereditary interest in the soil; and whether, in adverting to "those lands upon which no resident Ryots are established," you do or do not intend all lands cultivated by py-khoost or migratory Ryots, whose tenure is temporary.

 11. Does

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

11. Does this permanent hereditary interest in the soil constitute the only distinction between the khode-khoost and py-khoost Ryot? Or, if that be not the only distinction, are the payments to be made by the py-khoost, equally with that of the khode-khoost, to be regulated according to the custom of the pergunnah?

12. Whatever may be the distinction between them as to their rights, it is clear that, in every respect, the two classes of Ryots are equally entitled to the protection of Government; and we observe that you concur with us in the opinion, that however well intended for this purpose, our Regulations under the permanent settlement have not been effectual to it.

13. Although the Zemindars with whom the permanent settlement was made are, in the Regulations respecting that arrangement, declared to be "the "actual proprietors of the soil;" although their zemindarries are called landed estates, and all other holders of land are denominated their "under-tenants;" and although, as we shall have occasion more particularly to observe in the course of this dispatch, the use of these terms, which has ever since continued current, has in practice contributed, with other causes, to perplex the subject of landed tenures, and thereby to impair, and in many cases to destroy, the rights of individuals, yet it is clear that the rights which were actually conferred upon the Zemindars, or which were actually recognized to exist in that class by the enactments of the permanent settlement, were not intended to trench upon the rights which were possessed by the Ryots. Lord Cornwallis, in his minute recorded on the 3d February 1790, observes, that "every "begah of land possessed by the Ryots, must have been cultivated under an "express or implied agreement, that a certain sum should be paid for each "begah, and no more. Every abwab or tax imposed by the Zemindar, over "and above that sum, is not only a breach of that agreement, but a direct "violation of the established laws of the country. The cultivator, therefore, "has, in such case, an undoubted right to apply to Government for the "protection of his property; and Government is, at all times, bound to afford "him redress. The rents of an estate can only be raised, by inducing the "Ryots to cultivate the more valuable articles of produce, and to clear the "extensive tracts of waste land, which are to be found in almost every zemin-"dary in Bengal. I do not, therefore, hesitate to give it as my opinion, "that the Zemindars neither now, nor ever could possess, a right to impose "taxes or abwabs upon the Ryots; and if, from the confusion that has pre-"vailed towards the close of the Mogul Government, or from a want of "information since we have had possession of the country, new abwabs have "been imposed by the Zemindars or farmers, that Government has an "undoubted right to abolish such as are oppressive, and have never been "confirmed by a competent authority, and to establish such regulations as "may prevent the like abuses in future." In another place he says: "Neither "is the privilege which the Ryots in many parts of Bengal enjoy, of holding "possession of the spots of land which they cultivate so long as they pay the "revenue assessed upon them, by any means incompatible with the pro-"prietary rights of the Zemindars. Whoever cultivates the land, the Ze-"mindars can receive no more than the established rent, which, in most "places, is fully equal to what the cultivator can afford to pay. To permit "him to dispossess one cultivator for the sole purpose of giving land to "another, would be vesting him with a power to commit a wanton act of "oppression, from which he would derive no benefit. The practice that "prevailed under the Mogul Government, of uniting many districts into one "zemindarry, and thereby subjecting a large body of people to the control "of one principal Zemindar, rendered some restrictions of this nature neces-"sary. The Zemindar, however, may sell the land, and the cultivators must "pay the rent to the purchaser."

14. It was in conformity with the principles laid down in the minute of Lord Cornwallis that we, having then before us the recorded discussions which had taken place between him and Mr. Shore, expressly declared, in our letter to the Bengal Government, dated the 19th September 1792, that "while we con-"firmed to the landholders" (meaning the Zemindars), "the possession of the "districts which they then held, and subject only to the rent then settled, and "while

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

"while we disclaimed any interference with respect to the situation of the "Ryots or the sums paid by them, with any view to an addition of revenue "to ourselves, we expressly reserved the right which clearly belonged to us as "sovereigns, of interposing our authority in making, from time to time, all "such Regulations as might be necessary to prevent the Ryots being improper-"ly disturbed in their possessions, or loaded with unwarrantable exactions;" adding, as we did, that "our interposition, where it was necessary, seemed "also to be clearly consistent with the practice of the Mogul Government, "under which it appeared to be a general maxim, that the immediate cultiva-"tor of the soil, duly paying his rent, should not be dispossessed of the land "he occupied; that this necessarily supposed that there were some measures "and limits by which the rent could be defined; and that it was not left to the "arbitrary determination of the Zemindar, for that, otherwise, such a rule "would be nugatory," &c.

15. It was accordingly declared as follows, in section 8, Regulation I of 1793: "It being the duty of the ruling power to protect all classes of people, "and more particularly those who, from situation, are most helpless, the Go-"vernor-General in council will, whenever he may deem it proper, enact such "Regulations as he may think necessary for the protection and welfare of the "dependant Talookdars, Ryots, and other cultivators of the soil; and no "Zemindar, independant Talookdar, or other actual proprietor, shall be en-"titled, on this account, to make any objection to the discharge of the fixed "assessment which they have respectively agreed to pay."

16. With the view, also, to the protection and security of the Ryots against undue exactions on the part of the Zemindars, it was enacted, in Regulation VIII of 1793, that no actual proprietor of land, or dependant Talookdar or farmer of land, of whatever description, shall impose any new abwab or mhatoot upon the Ryots, on pain of being subjected to a fine of three times the amount imposed. Provision was also made, by the same Regulation, that the landholders (i. e. the persons with whom the settlement was immediately formed), in concert with their tenants, should revise the abwabs, and consolidate them with the land-rents within a given time; and that they should give or tender to the Ryots' pottahs, specifically stating the amount to be paid for the land they occupied. And it was still further enacted, that no actual proprietors of land, or farmers, or persons acting under their authority, should cancel the pottahs of the khode-khoost Ryots; except upon proof that they had been obtained by collusion, or that the rents paid by them within the last three years had been reduced below the nerkbundy of the pergunnah, or that they had obtained collusive deductions, or upon a general measurement of the pergunnah, for the purpose of equalizing and correcting the assessment.

17. Such having been the sentiments of Lord Cornwallis and the ruling authorities in England, and such having been the acts of the local Government on the first introduction of the permanent settlement, the question naturally occurs, whence it has arisen (to use your own words) "that our institutions "are so imperfectly calculated to afford the Ryots, in practice, that protec-"tion, to which, on every ground, they are so fully entitled;" so that it too often happens, that the quantum of rent which they pay is regulated neither by specific engagements, nor by the established rates of the pergunnahs, or other local divisions in which they reside, but by the arbitrary will of the Zemindars.

18. We have, of late years, taken frequent occasion to call the attention of your Government to the state of insecurity and oppression in which the great mass of the cultivators were placed; but we must confess that, anxiously and fully as this subject had engaged our thoughts, we had not formed an adequate idea of the state of things under your Government, in this respect, until we met, on its proceedings, with the correspondence between the judicial functionaries and the Court of Sudder-Adawlut, which was referred by you, in 1809 and 1810, to the consideration of the Board of Revenue, the answers which were returned by the Collectors of districts, to the circular letter of that Board, dated the 7th June 1811, and the minute of Mr. Colebrooke thereon.

19. To these documents we briefly adverted, in the 198th paragraph of our Revenue dispatch of the 6th January 1815, as not having been mentioned to us, in any letter from Bengal, but as having "attracted our particular attention." The communication which we had before made to you of our sentiments, seemed to us to supersede the necessity of entering, at that time, into a detailed consideration of the papers in question. We therefore contented ourseves with declaring, that the perusal of those papers had served greatly to strengthen the opinion formerly expressed by us, as to the insufficiency of the provisions which had been made for remedying the prevailing disorders.

20. Among the most important documents upon this interesting subject, which have lately reached us, are the report of Mr. Cornish, fourth judge of the Patna Court of Circuit, dated the 26th July 1814; the letter of the Board of Commissioners, and the minutes of Messrs. Roche and Colebrooke, of the Board of Revenue, recorded on your Revenue Consultations of the 12th August 1815; the letter addressed by Mr. Thomas Sisson to your judicial Secretary from Bencoolen, under date of the 2d April 1815, "on the relative state of "the landlord and tenant" in the district of Rungpore; and the Governor-General's minutes of the 21st September and 2d October 1815, on the revenue and judicial administration of the territories dependant on your presidency, together with the reports of the local officers which accompanied them.

21. Without meaning to commit ourselves to an acquiescence in every view and principle which the minutes of Lord Hastings embrace, we think it due to their author to declare, that we consider them as containing one of the most valuable expositions of the actual state of the internal administration of the territories under the Bengal Government that we have had occasion to peruse.

22. The documents here enumerated unequivocally confirm the truth of all the information of which we were previously in possession, respecting the absolute subjection of the cultivators of the soil to the discretion of the Zemindars, while they exhibit to us a view of things, with reference to the landed tenures and rights of that valuable body of the people, which satisfies us that a decisive course of measures for remedying evils of such magnitude must be undertaken without delay.

23. Mr. Cornish states, on this subject, "the Ryots conceive they have a "right to hold their lands, so long as they pay the rent which they and their "forefathers have always done. The Zemindars, although afraid openly to "avow, as being contrary to immemorial custom, that they have a right to demand any rent they chose to enact, yet go on compelling them to give an "increase; and the power of distraint, vested in them by the Regulations, "soon causes the utter ruin of the resisting Ryot."

24. Mr. Colebrooke asserts, from his own experience, that disputes between Zemindar and Ryots, in the Lower Provinces, were less frequent and more easily determined anterior to 1793, than they now are; and he further states that "the provisions contained in the general Regulations for the permanent "settlement, designed for the protection of the Ryots or tenants, are rendered "wholly nugatory;" and that "the courts of justice, for want of definite in-"formation respecting their rights, are unable effectually to support them." —"I am disposed, therefore," he adds, "to recommend that, late as it now "is, measures should be taken for the re-establishment of fixed rates, as nearly "conformable to the anciently-established ones as may be yet practicable, to "regulate distinctly and definitely the relative rights of the landlord and "tenantry."

25. Mr. Sisson, in his letter on the relative state of landlord and tenant in Rungpore, describes the "arbitrary oppression under which the cultivator of "the soil groans, as having at length attained a height so alarming, as to have "become by far the most extensively injurious of all the evils under which "that district labours;" and expresses an apprehension, "that until, by a "steady adherence to the most decisive and vigorous measures, the bulk of "the community shall have been restored from their present state of abject "wretchedness to the full enjoyment of their legitimate rights, it will be in "vain to expect solid and substantial improvement."

26. The sentiments of many other of the local Authorities employed in the internal administration of the country, whose reports are now before us, are equally strong upon this subject.

27. The

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

27. The Marquis of Hastings describes the situation of the village Zemindars to be such as to call loudly for the support of some legislative provision. "This," observes his Lordship, "is a question which has not merely reference "to the Upper Provinces" (of which he had previously been speaking); "for, "within the circle of the perpetual settlement, the situation of this unfortu-"nate class is yet more desperate. In Burdwan, in Behar, in Cawnpore, and "indeed wherever there may have existed extensive landed property at the "mercy of individuals, whether in farm or jaghire, in talook or in zemindarry, "of the higher class, complaints of the village Zemindars have crowded in "upon me without number; and I had only the mortification of finding, that "the existing system, established by the legislature, left me without the means "of pointing out to the complainants any mode in which they might hope to "obtain redress."......"In all these tenures, from what I could observe, the "class of village-proprietors appeared to be in a train of annihilation; and "unless a remedy is speedily applied, the class will soon be extinct. Indeed, "I fear that any remedy that could be proposed would, even now, come too "late to be of any effect in the several estates of Bengal; for the license of "twenty years, which has been left to the Zemindars of that province, will "have given them the power, and they have never wanted the inclination, to "extinguish the rights of this class, so that no remnants of them will soon be "discoverable."

28. His Lordship adds: "It is well known (and even if it were question-"able, the practice of the provinces which have lately fallen under our do-"minion would set the doubt at rest), that the cultivating Zemindars were, by "a custom more ancient than all law, entitled to a certain share of the produce "of their lands, and that the rest, whether collected by pergunnah-Zemindars "or by the officers of government, was collected as the huck of the Circar."

29. The paramount importance, on every ground of justice and expediency, as connected with the welfare and prosperity of the British empire in India, of adopting all practicable means for ascertaining and protecting the rights of the Ryots, has, in our former correspondence, been made the topic of frequent and serious representation; nor can it be otherwise than most satisfactory to us to find that the members of your Government, and those acting under its authority in the internal administration of the country, are now so earnestly occupied in the furtherance of this most important and essential work.

30. We fully subscribe to the truth of Mr. Sisson's declaration, that "the "faith of the state is to the full as solemnly pledged to uphold the cultivator "of the soil in the unmolested enjoyment of his long-established rights, as it is to "maintain the Zemindar in the possession of his estate, or to abstain from in-"creasing the public revenue permanently assessed upon him."

31. At the time when the discussions took place on the subject of forming the permanent settlement in the Lower Provinces, the question was agitated, whether the ascertainment of private rights ought not to have been carried into effect before that arrangement was concluded. Zemindarry oppressions and abuses, during the revolutions that had occurred in the Bengal Provinces at periods not long anterior to the establishment of the British power, and the early measures of our administration, had thrown such obscurity over the rights of the cultivators, that it became difficult to define them. "The vague term usage" (as Lord Cornwallis observed, in his minute of the 11th February 1793) "was the only rule for deciding upon any question of revenue, and the "rights of those concerned in the payment of it; and custom, which varied "in almost every district, and precedent, might be pleaded in justification of "every species of exaction and oppression." The difficulties to be encountered in the pursuit of minute local investigations, deterred Lord Cornwallis from a task, to the untertaking of which, it must be confessed, the sentiments and instructions of the Court of Directors had been unfavourable, from the time of Mr. Hastings to their first dispatch of the 12th April 1786, on the subject of the decennial settlement.

32. Mr. Shore, though fully sensible of the difficulty of simplifying and defining the rates of assessment on the Ryots, was decidedly of opinion, that the Government should first see this accomplished, before they entered into any permanent engagements with the Zemindars, "in order," as he said, "that "justice might be impartially administered according to fixed rules."*

33. He was, therefore, for considering the period of the decennial settlement,† then about to be concluded, as one of experiment, during which the Government should direct their attention systematically, not only to the importance of giving confidence to the Zemindars, but also of procuring a simplification of the complicated rental of the Ryots; so that, "if, at the end of "the fifth, sixth, or any subsequent year, not exceeding the eighth, of the "assessment, it should be found that the desired improvement had been accomplished, that the relative rights of Talookdars, Ryots, and Zemindars, "were rendered definite and precise, and that the country flourished under the "prescribed Regulations and the superintending care of the Revenue officers, "the settlement might again be extended to any period of ten or twenty years."

34. The same view of the subject had been taken by Mr. Hastings, in the course of the discussions which arose, at an earlier period, as to the adoption of a permanent plan for the administration of the land revenue.‡

35. The data with reference to which Mr. Francis proposed to determine upon the amount of the assessment, were the average-collections of the three preceding years. Mr. Hastings was impressed with the importance of being previously furnished with accurate statements of the real value of the lands throughout the country, as the ground on which the settlement ought to be constructed, observing that, to obtain these, "would be the work of much "official knowledge, some management, and unremitting labour in compiling "and collating the accounts of the past collections, in digesting the materials "which might be furnished by the provincial councils and dewans, in issuing "orders for special accounts and other materials of information, and in deputing native officers on occasional investigations." He likewise remarked, that "other inquiries would be useful to secure the Ryots in the perpetual and "undisturbed possession of the lands, and to guard them against arbitrary "exactions."

36. Alluding to the total disregard shewn by the Zemindars to their solemn engagements, and to the peremptory injunctions of Government to grant pottahs to the Ryots, Mr. Hastings observed, "It is the Zemindar's interest to exact "the greatest rent he can from the Ryots, and it is as much against his interest "to fix the deeds by which the Ryots hold their lands and pay their rents, to "certain bounds and defences against his own authority. The foundation of "such a work must be laid by the Government itself." He therefore proposed to collect the materials for it, "by obtaining copies of the existing pottahs and of "the nerrick bundee, or rates of the land, by which they were regulated in each "district, and every other information which might throw light on this subject, and hereafter enable the Government to enter into a more permanent "and regular mode of taxation." Nor did he omit to point out with clearness the manner by which, agreeably to the acknowledged rules of Indian Governments, it was practicable to accomplish the objects in view. A Committee of Investigation was accordingly appointed, by the casting-vote of Mr. Hastings, for the purpose of examining the country records of accounts, and of conducting and superintending the other requisite inquiries; but it was ordered to be abolished by a dispatch from England.

37. It was under the influence of the same feelings and principles, that the Board of Revenue, in 1786, recommended the creation of the office of chief Sheristadar, with a view to the restoration of the "correct ancient revenue-"system of the country" to its former efficiency, which, in their judgment, was "no less calculated to protect the great body of the people from oppres-"sion, than to secure the full and legal rights of the sovereign." This measure was approved of by the government of Sir John McPherson; but Mr. James Grant, the first chief Sheristadar who was appointed, had no sooner entered upon the investigations and arrangements that were to constitute the basis of the intended reforms, than his office was abolished by Lord Cornwallis, who had newly succeeded to the government of India.

38. The experience of the last twenty-four years induces us to believe, that if the policy of Mr. Hastings had not been departed from, or if a stop had not been put to the further prosecution of Mr. Grant's valuable labours, we should not now have to lament, that the objects of the permanent settlement, in as far as regards the security and happiness of the most numerous and industrious class of the community, have hitherto been so imperfectly attained, and that, instead of maintaining their rights, we have not even ascertained what they are.

39. It is also a circumstance which is not to be overlooked, that although so many years have elapsed since the conclusion of that settlement, yet no resort has been had to the exercise of the power we then expressly reserved, of interfering for the purpose of defining and adjusting the rights of the Ryots. We conclude, that the supposed difficulty or impracticability of the operation was the cause of this non-interference. We find, however, that antecedently to the permanent settlement, this power was successfully exercised in several parts of the territory under your government, and that the advantages of this policy are still felt in those districts, although the general system of your Revenue and Judicial administration has been unfavourable to the preservation and improvement of the advantages thus obtained.

40. We particularly allude to the Twenty-four Pergunnahs and to part of Dinagepore, when it was under the management of the late Mr. Hatch. In the vicinity of Calcutta, also, "the Ryots," as Mr. Colebrooke understood, "have been supported, by the decision of Adawluts, in their pretensions to hold their lands upon the rents payable by them, or by the persons whose representatives they are, according to the best general measurement which was undertaken by the authority of Government before the permanent settlement, and of which the record is understood to be preserved in the office of the Collector." It is also stated by Mr. Colebrooke, that "the Regulations of Benares have maintained the table of rates of Fusily 1187, and that the Canongoe office yet exists in that province for its preservation."

41. Mr. Sisson, in the report to which we have already referred, adverting to the measures that had been adopted, in 1788, in Dinagepore, states that Mr. Hatch ascertained, by a local investigation, "1st, the several varieties of rate and pottah, and the proportion at which the illegal cess was made, in the several estates, to bear to the recorded rental; 2dly, by actual measurement, the extent of cultivation in each pergunnah;" 3dly, that he reduced, "the qualities of land in each pergunnah to a certain number of classes, which might readily be distinguished one from the other;" 4thly, that he ascertained "the average gross produce of each class;" and 5thly, that he determined, "reference being had to the present and former rates of rent, what proportion of the average produce should, in each class, be retained by the Ryot, and what proportion of a fixed money valuation, should be received by the Zemindar."

42. Mr. Sisson, while he strongly urges the adoption of the same course of proceeding in other parts of the country, on account of "the incalculable blessings it would confer on a very numerous population," further states, in proof of its expediency, that in 1793 a considerable portion of the tract settled by Mr. Hatch having been separated from Dinagepore and annexed to Rungpore and Rajeshahye, "this change had been fatal to the rights of the cultivators;" and that "Mr. Hatch's rates had been utterly disregarded by the Zemindars," whilst, "in Dinagepore, the system of rates is so generally known, that the proprietors left under the jurisdiction of that district have not as yet dared to alter the rates, though they often strive to evade them by disputing the quality of the lands." Mr. Sisson, in his report, takes occasion to contrast the settlement formed in Dinagepore with that made under the permanent settlement of Rungpore, where he had latterly acted as joint Magistrate. "Thus," he says, "while the settlement of Dinagepore, the state of which district must have been precisely similar to that of Rungpore, was, by the zeal, diligence, and abilities of Mr. Hatch, founded on the result of the minutest investigation into the state of the resources of every pergunnah, that of Rungpore was established on the uncertain criterion of preceding settlements, which had their basis in bare conjecture." This observation must be allowed generally rally to apply to the other settlements that were concluded in 1793 in the Lower Provinces.

43. We have, in our Revenue dispatch of the 6th January 1815, taken occasion to advert to a similar course of measures, in which the Assistant Collector of Bhauglepore was engaged in 1787, and apparently with much success, for the purpose of inquiring into the resources of the country, and of ascertaining and adjusting, on fixed principles, the rights of the cultivators. The measures which he had adopted and completed in one pergunnah were highly approved by the Collector and by the Board of Revenue, who notified their wish that the Assistant Collector "would proceed with all possible expedition in extending "similar Regulations to other parts of the district." Some further progress had been made in the accomplishment of this object, when the execution of it was superseded by the general arrangements which were then determined upon preparatory to the permanent settlement.

44. We are, on this occasion, naturally led to notice what is stated by you on the subject of the Regulations passed in 1793, concerning pottahs, and of those subsequently enacted.

45. With respect to Regulation VIII of 1793, we have to observe that more seems to have been expected from its enactments in favour of the Ryots, than they were calculated to effect unsupported by other institutions, and that it was in fact almost wholly nugatory. By section 2, Regulation XLIV of 1793, it was enacted, that no lease should be granted for a period of more than ten years, and that no lease should be renewed except in the last year of its term; and every lease granted, in opposition to that prohibition, was declared null and void. By another section of the same Regulation it was provided, that whenever lands are sold by public sale, for arrears of the public revenue, all engagements with under-farmers and Ryots, as well as with dependent Talookdars, should stand cancelled from the day of sale, the purchasers being left at liberty to collect from the Talookdars, Ryots, or cultivators, according to the rates and usages of the pergunnah (which rates and usages were left unascertained), as if the engagements so cancelled had never existed: and the operation of the foregoing rule was extended, by Regulation III of 1796, to the entire annulment of leases of lands, of which a part only might be sold for the recovery of arrears of revenue. The primary, and indeed sole object of Regulation XLIV of 1793 evidently was, to guard against a permanent diminution of the public revenue under the settlements that had been concluded with the Zemindars, by which a permanent limitation had been set to the demands of Government upon them; and it was still further to guard against such a consequence, that the modifications it underwent by Regulation III of 1796 were adopted. When we bear in mind the fact stated by Mr. Rocke, in his minute recorded on your Revenue Consultations of the 12th August 1815, that subsequently to the period of the permanent settlement, "probably one-third, or rather one-half, of the landed "property in the province of Bengal may have been transferred by public sale "on account of arrears of revenue," we can readily conceive how prodigiously numerous must have been the instances in which engagements between Zemindars and Ryots were annulled.

46. The original pottah Regulation (VIII of 1793) was also very materially defective, in making no sufficient provision for the ascertainment of the rights in which it professed to secure the Ryots by their pottahs. It was of much more importance, for the security of the Ryot, to establish what the legitimate rates of the pergunnahs were according to the customs of the country; or, at all events, to have ascertained the rates actually existing, and to have caused a record of them, in either case, to be carefully preserved, than merely to enjoin the exchange of engagements between them and the Zemindars, leaving in total uncertainty the rules by which those engagements were to be formed. It is true, that to have taken the rates at which the Ryots were actually assessed by the Zemindars, at the period of the permanent settlement, as the maximum of future demands, would have had the effect, as Mr. Shore observed in one of his minutes, of confirming subsisting abuses and oppressions; but it would, at least, have fixed a limit to them. The necessary information respecting those rates might, in a great measure, have been found in the registers of the Canongoes, had that office been maintained in its original state of efficiency.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

efficiency. But the Canongoe's office had, as we had occasion to remark in our Revenue dispatch of the 28th October 1814, and in subsequent dispatches in the same department, been most unfortunately abolished in the Lower Provinces, when the permanent settlement was introduced, instead of being reformed and brought back to the purposes of its institution; and the Putwarries, whose accounts were of the utmost importance, in all cases of disputed claims between Zemindars and their tenants, and between renters and Ryots, having, at the same time, been virtually made the servants of the Zemindars, naturally became averse to produce any documentary proof of exactions levied by their employers, and little credit was due to their accounts when produced. The consequence was, that the only safeguards left for the Ryots were the pottah Regulation and the courts of justice. That Regulation must have been very inadequate to protect their interests against further encroachment, even had it been generally acted upon: but its originally imperfect construction, together with the modifications and restrictions which it afterwards underwent, indisposed the Ryots to comply with its provisions; and the courts of justice could not avail much in cases of dispute, where there were no data on which to decide, even if they had, in other respects, been competent to settle questions of that nature.

47. But what appears to have had a more sensible operation in the depression of the Ryots than perhaps any other cause, was the power vested by Regulation VII of 1799 in Zemindars, Talookdars, and other landholders and farmers of land, of distraining for rent.

48. The representations which were made by some of the most intelligent of the Judicial and Revenue Functionaries, within a very few years after the passing of that Regulation, and which were generally made in the course of 1809 and the two following years, of the enormous exactions and oppressions which were practised under the last-mentioned Regulation, led in 1812 to a revision of the existing rules respecting pottahs and other engagements between landholders and their tenants, as well as respecting distress and other summary modes allowed to the Zemindars for enforcing payment of their demands; and Regulation V of 1812, which was subsequently explained by Regulation XVIII of that year, was passed for amending some of the rules then in force for the collection of the land revenue.

49. Mr. Colebrooke, on whose suggestions Regulation V of 1812 appears chiefly to have been framed, after stating that "there is actually no sufficient "evidence of the rates and usages of pergunnahs which can now be appealed "to for the decision of the questions between landholder and Ryot," and consequently, no definite rules for the guidance of courts of justice, expressed himself in the following terms: "In this state of matters, it would be better "to abrogate most of the laws in favour of the Ryot, and leave him, for a "certain period to be specified, under no other protection for his tenure than "the specific terms of the lease which he may then hold, than to uphold the "illusory expectation of protection under laws which are nearly ineffectual.

"The parties would be thus compelled to come to an understanding; and "the result would, on every consideration, be preferable to the present state "of uncertainty, which naturally leads to oppression, fraud, and endless litigation" It was avowedly with much reluctance that Mr. Colebrooke suggested the adoption of this alternative; for he immediately added: "If it be "thought expedient, in place of abrogating the laws which were enacted for "the protection of the tenantry, and especially of the khodkasht Ryot or resident cultivator, that the right of occupancy, which these laws were intended "to uphold, should be still maintained, and that the Ryot should be supported "in his ancient and undoubted privilege of retaining the ground occupied by "him, so long as he pays the rent justly demandable for it, measures should "be adopted, late as it now is, to reduce to writing a clear declaration and "distinct record of the usages and rates according to which the Ryots of each "pergunnah or district will be entitled to demand the renewal of their pottahs, upon any occasion of a general or partial cancelling of leases."

50. He added: "I had it, at one time, under consideration, to propose a "plan for the preparation of such records under the superintendence of the "Revenue officers, assisted by the Canongoe office, to be re-established for

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

"that and for other purposes, and in communication and concert with the "Zemindars and principal Ryots of each pergunnah, and I had made a considerable progress towards maturing the plan of this great undertaking; but "after much consultation with the late Acting President of the Board of Revenue (Mr. Crisp) and with other experienced and well informed officers of "the Revenue department, I have been diverted from this project, by the "apprehension that the intelligence and activity requisite for the due superintendence of its execution within each zillah, are not to be universally nor "generally expected, and that, if it were ill performed, it might not improbably add to the subsisting evils instead of remedying them."

51. The same considerations which had induced Mr. Colebrooke to abandon the measures alluded to in the passage last quoted (which measures, nevertheless, he afterwards, as appears from his minute of the 30th April 1815, felt the great expediency of pursuing), probably influenced the decision of the late Government, and Regulation V of 1812 was framed in consonance with Mr. Colebrooke's first suggestion.

52. It had been urged, at the time of passing that Regulation, that although the rights of the cultivating classes had been most materially violated, yet as the Zemindars and the Ryots had reciprocal wants, their mutual necessities must drive them to an amicable adjustment. Upon this doctrine it is well observed by Lord Hastings, in his minute on the Revenue administration of Bengal, that "this reciprocity is not, however, so clear, that the Zemindar "certainly cannot do without tenants, but that he wants them on his own "terms, and that he knows that, if he can get rid of the hereditary proprietors "who claim a right to terms independent of what he may vouchsafe to give, "he will obtain the means of substituting men of his own; and that such is the "redundancy of the cultivating class, that there will never be a difficulty of "procuring Ryots, ready to engage on terms just sufficient to ensure bare "maintenance to the engager."

53. It always appeared to us, that the provisions of Regulation V of 1812 would operate as a very imperfect corrective of the evils which it was intended to remedy; and this we expressed in our dispatches from this department of the 28th October 1814, and 6th January 1815, and in our dispatch from the judicial department of the 9th November 1814. Subsequent information has not only confirmed us in the opinions which we, from the first, entertained, but has satisfied us that, in practice, the Regulation has been the very reverse of beneficial. In Mr. Sisson's letter of the 2d April 1815, to which we have already referred, it is stated to have produced *the most injurious consequences. The Zemindars of Rungpore are represented by him as perverting its provisions to the entailment, in perpetuity, upon their wretched victims the peasantry (by which he means the actual occupants of the land) of a long series of exactions, of which he gives some most striking specimens. Section 2 of Regulation XVIII of 1812 runs thus: "Doubts having arisen on the construction "of Section 2, Regulation V of 1812, it is hereby explained, that the true "intent of the said section was to declare proprietors of land competent to grant "leases for any period, even to perpetuity, and at any rent which they might "deem conducive to their interests," &c. This provision has been construed to give to Zemindars the power of demanding from the Ryots any rent they might think proper, without regard to the customary rates of assessment in the pergunnah. The inference seems unavoidable, that the persons with whom the permanent settlement was made, and those who, by inheritance or purchase, may succeed them, are authorised, by the existing law, to oust even the hereditary Ryots from possession of their lands, when the latter refuse to accede to any terms of rent which may be demanded of them, however exorbitant.

54. In the consideration of this subject, it is impossible for us not to remark that consequences, the most injurious to the rights and interests of individuals, have arisen, from describing those with whom the permanent settlement was concluded as the actual proprietors of the land. This mistake (for such it is now admitted to have been), and the habit which has grown out of it, of considering the payments of the Ryots as rent instead of revenue, have produced all the the evils that might be expected to flow from them. They have introduced much confusion into the whole subject of landed tenures, and have given a specious colour to the pretensions of the Zemindars, in acting towards persons of the other classes as if they, the Zemindars, really were, in the ordinary sense of the words, the proprietors of the land, and as if the Ryots had no permanent interest but what they derived from them.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

55. Lord Hastings, in his minute of the 21st September 1815, mentions another case, in which a serious misconception has occurred in regard to rights of property. Referring to mocurrery jaghires, which we consider in no respect to differ as to their tenure, except in point of duration, or as to the rights they confer, from pergunnah or larger zemindarries, he states that, under jaghiredarry tenures, " all that the Government could make over were the rights " possessed by itself; so that it was incumbent upon the assignees to be " guided in their conduct towards the subjects of Government transferred to " them, by the same rules and principles of action as regulated the proceed- " ings of Government." Lord Hastings goes on to state, that " in practice, " however, it is to be feared that the assignment on the part of Government " is considered to confer a proprietary right, with all the powers and privi- " leges attached to such rights by the Regulations. Thus, as but one proprietor " of the soil is recognized, the rights of all those with whom Government had " till then engaged, (i. e. until the jaghire was granted) are totally annihilated by " the assignment. What was heretofore paid as revenue must now be paid as " rent; those who before held their lands with only the condition of a fixed " payment to the Government, became tenants subject to arbitrary exactions, " and liable to ejectment if they resist the demands."

56. The Board of Commissioners, in their report already referred to, write to the same effect. " As the Government, by the grant of a jaghire, can " assign no more than what they themselves possessed (viz. the right of de- " riving a certain rent from the land), it would naturally follow, that the " assignee could possess no other authority than what Government could have " exercised But, by the universal practice under such grants, the assignees " become virtually vested with all the rights of property, and discharged from all " the obligations imposed by Government on themselves."

57. It is true, that the Board state that the situation of the Zemindars within the jaghires " was not contemplated in any rules proposed or enacted for " the protection of the Ryots in general."

58. We can, however, have no doubt that, wherever the rights of the Zemindars have been affected, by describing the jaghiredar as if the proprietorship in the land had been conferred upon him, the rights of the Ryots must likewise have been affected by it. In fact, where the jaghires are of small extent, the Zemindars themselves must have been no other than Ryots, who were either the parties with whom the settlements had been concluded before the grant of the jaghire, or who, as residentiary cultivators within the village, may have rented the revenue of the circar payable by the other Ryots on their own account, or realized them in the character of the public servants of the village, being answerable for the whole that they collected.

59. The Board of Commissioners, in another passage of their letter, with an express reference to these village Zemindars, state that " the mistake of " making the perpetual settlement with Rajahs as the proprietors of the whole " of the lands composing their rajes, has chiefly affected an intermediate class, " the village Zemindars, to whom no compensation can now be made for the " injustice done to them by the transfer of their property to the Rajahs. In- " deed, the whole of this valuable class of landholders may be considered to " be extinct in the Lower Provinces; with the exception of a few fortunate " individuals who have preserved their estates, under the names of indepen- " dent and dependent Talookdars, by the precaution of their ancestors in pro- " viding themselves with written acknowledgements of the general Zemindar, " who, in consequence of the interpretation put on that title, was considered by " the terms of the perpetual settlement as the universal proprietor of the soil, and " the fountain from which alone any other person could derive a property."

60. These

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

60. These village Zemindars were no other than those Ryots of the villages who are distinctly described by the Board of Commissioners in their official correspondence, and by Lord Hastings in his minute, as the real proprietors of the land in their respective occupations.

61. It is needless to shew, that the state of things here described must also exist in those parts of the country where the settlements have been made with one individual (not a rajah), for the revenue of a whole pergunnah or more, under the designation of proprietor of all the lands included within them, instead of describing him by such a term or terms as had heretofore been in general use under the native Governments, or at least by such an appellation as should not convey a notion of his being that which he clearly was not, and which he is not, under any rights conferred upon him by the permanent settlement. The practice must, as in the two former cases, and in the same manner, affect the rights of all below the pergunnah Zemindar down to the Ryots of the villages. We may add, that the rights of the Ryots of villages must be in the same manner affected, where the settlement is formed by the Government for one village only, but in the name of one person, called, as that person is in the Regulations, by the same term of proprietor of the land within it, in which, as it is now unequivocally admitted, he is only one of many to whom the lands of the village belong.

62. It is fortunate, however, and must not be forgotten, that in the same Regulation in which the Bengal Government, in 1793, conferred rights upon the Zemindars, apparently inconsistent with the rights of the cultivators of the soil, it reserved to itself the full power of passing such laws as, from time to time, might appear necessary for the protection of the rights acknowledged to be vested in the Ryots.

63. There can be no doubt, that a misapplication of terms, and the use of the word "rent," as applied to the demands on the Ryots, instead of the appropriate one of "revenue," have introduced much confusion into the whole subject of landed tenures, and have tended to the injury and destruction of the rights of the Ryots.

64. It is possible that terms which have been so long in use, bound up as they are with the very frame and texture of your Revenue code, could not be dispensed with without great practical inconvenience. It is also possible, that the substitution of other more appropriate terms, derived from the native language, may have the effect of weakening all confidence in the stability of the permanent settlement, by leading to the apprehension, than an intention is entertained to undermine and overthrow the principles of that settlement, as it concerns the rights and interests of those with whom it was concluded, or of those who now standing in the same situation are equally parties to it. These are undoubtedly inconveniences and evils which it is most essential to avoid; but if the gradual introduction of such a change could be effected, without the risk of creating confusion in the practice of your Revenue Administration, and without danger of weakening the confidence of the country in the good faith of Government, we should be glad, for the practical reasons we have mentioned, that the attempt should be made. Should you, however, be of opinion that this cannot be done, we trust that you will particularly consider the view we have been taking of the subject, and that you will find, in the impossibility of removing this source of misconception, a strong reason, in addition to the many others that exist, to stimulate you to the diligent prosecution of that course of measures for settling and adjusting, in the clearest practicable way, the relative rights of the Ryots and the Zemindars, which now happily occupies your attention, and that of the Revenue and Judicial Authorities under your Government.

65. Perfectly agreeing with what is stated by the Board of Commissioners respecting the jaghires (which corresponds with the view taken of the subject by Lord Hastings), that "nothing in the terms of any grant, either by the "British Administration or by former Governments, can be interpreted to "preclude the enactment of any laws which may be deemed expedient for the "protection of the Zemindars and Ryots in jaghire lands," we are decidedly of opinion, that a Regulation should be passed declaratory of that right in the the Government, and that the same measures may be adopted within those lands for ascertaining, adjusting, and securing the rights of the Ryots and all others below the jaghiredar (and, indeed, in all instances where the public revenue from land may have been assigned to individuals, whether on mocurrery or other more limited tenures), as you may deem it necessary to pursue in the zemindarry lands in general.

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

66. The differences which have arisen, under the permanent settlement, between the Zemindars and Ryots, the arbitrary exactions of the more powerful, the fraudulent evasions resorted to by the weaker classes, and the vexatious litigations which have been the consequence of this state of things, afford sufficient evidence, that it is our duty, before any definite system is adopted for provinces not yet finally settled, to investigate most attentively the evils to which the permanent settlement has given rise, to examine the nature and degree of the change in the relative situations of the Zemindar and the Ryot which has taken place under its operation, and to ascertain, as nearly as possible, what were the previously existing rights with which it has either improvidently or unadvisedly interfered.

67. We have already enjoined you to reserve the waste lands in making any future settlement; but we have not been able to satisfy ourselves as to the nature of the interest possessed by the zemindar in the waste lands, in those districts which have been permanently settled. Your construction seems to be, that his power over them is absolute and unconditional, and that he is at liberty to contract for the occupation of them at whatever rates he can obtain. It is, however, the opinion of many considerable authorities, that in the leases of waste, as well as of other lands, the pergunnah rates form a standard of payment not to be exceeded.

68. We are aware that these pergunnah rates, as well as the tenures of the Ryots, vary in different places, and that the utmost circumspection should assuredly be observed in endeavouring to ascertain and define these varieties; and it is very important to distinguish them in your consideration, as they have been affected by the permanent zemindarry settlement, and as they exist in the countries in which that settlement has not been introduced.

Canongoes, Putwarries, and Mal Adawluts.

69. All inquiries into the state of landed rights and tenures will be greatly facilitated by the re-organization of the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry on their ancient footing, which we recommend in our dispatches of the 29th January 1813, 28th October 1814, and 6th January 1815. We much approve of the instructions issued to the Board of Revenue and the Board of Commissioners, of the 21st October 1814 and the 12th August 1815, on that subject. In the latter of these instructions, the Vice-President in Council, after referring to paragraphs 100 and 108 of our Revenue dispatch, dated 6th January 1815, relative to the office of Putwarry, most justly observes, that " to treat " the subject in the most general way possible, it involves an inquiry into the " different products of the earth, the rates of rent payable, whether in money " or kind, by the immediate cultivator of the soil, and the various modifica- " tions to which those rates may be subject through an extensive tract of coun- " try; and that it imposed, likewise, a necessity of establishing such forms of " registers and accounts, as might appear best calculated to record and perpe- " tuate the several particulars above noticed.* Uniform experience (as they " state), both in the administration of civil justice and in the settlement and " collection of the public revenue, has at length fully established, that the offi- " ces, both of the Pergunnah Canongoe and of Putwarry, form necessary, and " we might add, indispensable links, in the chain of public authorities in " India."

70. We are aware, with Mr. Colebrooke, of the difficulty that must now attend the perfect ascertainment of the rates of assessments according to ancient usage; but we entirely agree with him, that the rates should be re-established, " as nearly conformable to the anciently established ones as may yet be practi- " cable."

4 X 71. We

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819

71. We are also persuaded, that this most essential object is to be satisfactorily accomplished through the efficient services of the Canongoes and Putwarries, and from such sources of information as may be available by the Collectors, whether from old records or from tradition among the natives.

72. The expediency of establishing, according to Mr. Rocke's suggestion, an office of the presidency under charge of an intelligent and experienced officer, in which shall be formed and preserved a digest of all the information collected, and the transactions recorded by the Putwarries and pergunnah Canongoes, is, in our opinion, most deserving of consideration.

73. The suggestions of Mr. Sisson, in the thirty-seventh and following paragraphs of his report of the 2d April 1815, are also well worthy of notice, when the details of the arrangement engage your attention.

74. We cannot dismiss this documents without expressing our warm approbation of the ability with which Mr. Sisson has treated several very important points connected with the Revenue administration, and the zeal with which he has advocated the just rights of the Ryots; and we desire that you will communicate to that gentleman the favourable impression we have received from the perusal of his report, of his talents and public spirit.

75. There is no part of your proceedings, connected with the important subject on which we have so fully addressed you, that has afforded us more satisfaction, than that to which you refer in the latter end of paragraph 15 of the letter now under reply. We allude to the resolution you had come to, to revive the Mal Adawluts which existed antecedently to 1793, for the purpose, as you state, "of instituting an authority for deciding upon all disputed claims "between landlord and tenant, and generally, between all persons, from the "Sudder Malguzar to the cultivator of the soil, with promptitude and dis-"patch." This is a subject to which the Vice-President in Council had already adverted, in their letter to us of the 19th August 1815, in which they expressed themselves as follows: "It is well known, that these institutions "were formerly of the greatest utility in the adjustment of disputes respecting "the payment of rent, and we are willing to hope that they may be again ren-"dered highly beneficial, in facilitating the collection of the rent of the Zemin-"dars, on the one hand, and in protecting the peasantry (Ryots) from the ex-"actions which we apprehend that they are at present too often subject to, on "the other."

76. It is of unquestionable truth, that the ascertainment and proper adjustment of the relative rights of the Zemindars and of others, down to the Ryots, by the officers of Government, can be but of little avail to the parties, particularly to the last mentioned order of persons unless a more ready mode be provided for the settlement of disputes upon this subject in each particular case. It was the full persuasion of the utter inaptitude (now, we believe, generally acknowledged by the functionaries under your Government) of the zillah courts for such a purpose, and of the advantage of consigning such matters to the adjudication of the Revenue officers, that induced us, in our Judicial dispatch of the 9th November 1814, to state at some length our reasons for thinking that it would be expedient again to have recourse to that Regulation; and, in truth, the proposition which we recommended to your consideration, on that occasion, is, in principle, substantially the same as that which you have at length determined to carry into effect.

77. The Board of Commissioners, after expressing their opinion of the desirableness of establishing the Mal Adawluts, observe as follows:* "The de-"cision of such suits would then be prompt and free of expense, by the ex-"clusion of all technical pleadings and of professional Vakeels; and the su-"pervision of the controlling Boards," (meaning the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners), "unembarrassed by the formality of regular appeal, "would tend to establish fixed principles, to prevent a deviation from them, "and maintain uniformity of decision. The whole of the Revenue depart-"ment has a clear and direct interest in the maintenance of good faith and "equity between landlord and tenant; and the Revenue department alone can, "generally

Revenue Letter to Bengal, Ceded and Conquered Provinces, 15 January 1819.

"generally speaking, acquire a competent knowledge of the subject." In all these sentiments and principles we cordially concur, and anticipate the greatest advantages from acting upon them.

78. When we addressed you, in our Judicial dispatch of the 9th November 1814, on the subject of bringing the adjudication of disputes, of the nature referred to, again within the jurisdiction of the Collectors, we were aware, as you will have observed, that the adoption of such a measure involved a fundamental departure from that principle of the Judicial system of 1793, which forbids the union of fiscal and judicial functions in the same person. But we then thought, and we have certainly since seen no reason to alter that opinion, that however correct it might be in theory, it was nevertheless practically inapplicable to our Indian system, where, in fact, it had never been acted upon under any native Government; and that, by the rigid manner in which this principle had been adhered to, a most material impediment had been continued in the way of administering justice to the people.

79. The decided opinions which, as your records shew, were about the same period expressed on this point by two members of your Government, Messrs. Edmonstone and Seton, in the minute they recorded on the occasion of preparing certain Regulations in 1814, in the hope of remedying, in some degree, the palpable defects of your Judicial code, and by the Sudder-Dewanny-Adawlut, in their report made on the same occasion, and particularly the sentiments expressed in the able minute of Mr. James Stuart,* of a subsequent date, which has since reached us, could not fail to add considerable strength to our former convictions.

80. We must indeed confess, that when we reflect upon the very serious inconvenience and injuries sustained by the great body of natives engaged in the cultivation of the soil, from the operation of that principle of the Judicial code of 1793, which deprived the Collectors of any authority whatever in the decision of cases of rent and exaction between Zemindars and those below them, we are not without surprise, that your predecessors in the Government should so long have hesitated to retrace the steps that had been originally taken, and should have left it to the present Administration of Bengal to restore judicial power to the Collectors.

81. It is not among the least of the advantages that will attend the revival of the Mal Adawluts, that it will materially relieve the regular courts of judicature from the enormous load of business with which they are overwhelmed, and which still presses upon them, without any thing like adequate means of reducing it, until the measures ordered or suggested by us, in our Judicial dispatch of the 9th November 1814, shall have been brought into operation.

82. We cannot conclude our observations on these truly important subjects, without stating that it has been highly gratifying to us to observe such a coincidence of opinion with us, as that exhibited in your dispatches of the 19th August and 7th October 1815, and in the documents which accompanied them, on matters which we deem to be intimately connected with the character of our administration, and with the welfare and prosperity of the great body of the people; and we join most cordially in the hope you express, that the inquiries and discussions now pending on these matters will lead to the adoption of substantial reforms, in no slight degree beneficial to the general interests of the country. The task in which you are now engaged is one of no small labour and difficulty; but it is one which, if entrusted to persons intimately acquainted with mofussil affairs, will amply reward the exertions of those who may contribute their time and talents to its execution. The work, to be done well, must be carried on progressively and carefully. It is, also, of vital importance to its permanent success, that after the foundations shall be rightly laid, it be steadily superintended, in its ordinary and settled details, by those who, from their knowledge, experience, and activity in the Revenue department of our service, are the most competent to acquit themselves satisfactorily in the duties attaching to that responsible charge.

83. Previous training will, therefore, be more than ever requisite. The best talents and the best intentions, without the practical knowledge which grows out out of such training, will assuredly disappoint our just expectations; and we are confident that our junior servants will feel the necessity of diligent application. In no department of the public service of their country can higher or more important duties be entrusted to their care, than those for which we call upon them duly to qualify themselves. Let them reflect, that by their future exertions great evils may be arrested in their progress, and that good may be done commensurate with the vast extent of the field in which their talents, their acquirements, and their virtues will be brought into full action. The welfare of millions of beings is at stake, and very mainly depends upon the successful application of their labours. This consideration cannot well fail to stimulate them to exertion, while they may rest assured that, in no course which has been heretofore opened in India to the honourable ambition of our civil servants, have integrity, talents, and industry met with more public notice, than may be gained in that career which it will be their lot to run, should the objects we have in view be fully attained.

(65 to 70.) Referring to the sentiments of the Board of Commissioners on the ryotwar system of revenue collection, recommended in the court's dispatch of the 29th January 1813; and, generally, upon the good effects which might be expected from a multiplication of European agency in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces.

86. The opinions contained in the report of the Board of Commissioners, dated the 30th May 1815, and the explanatory statements therewith transmitted to the Governor General, will meet with due attention, when we resume the consideration of the various plans of settlement which have been proposed. We shall not question, in this place, the correctness of the inferences which you have drawn from these documents; but they certainly contain nothing to induce us to withdraw the injunction which we have heretofore conveyed to you, against any permanent settlement of land revenue.

EXTRACT BENGAL JUDICIAL CONSULTATIONS,

The 25th October, 1814.

(Criminal Department.)

Extract Report of Mr. Cornish, the fourth Judge of the Patna Court of Circuit, dated 26th July 1814.

10th Cause. To the rights of the Ryots remaining undefined to this day.

Par. 48. This is a question of very serious importance to the interests of the cultivators of the soil, and of course, to the interests of Government likewise.

Mr. Cornish's Report, 26 July 1814.

49. The assertion may appear extraordinary, but it is nevertheless certain, that the rights of the Ryots remain to this day unexplained and undefined. It is true, that there is something like a provision for preventing the rents of the lands of the Chapperbund or khode-khoost Ryots from being raised, unless the Zemindar can prove that they have paid less for them, for the last three years, than the nerrick of the pergunnah. But what is this nerrick, or how to be ascertained? It is a mere name, and of no kind of use in securing the rights of the Ryots. The py-khoost Ryots are altogether left to the mercy of the Zemindars. Was this intended? If so, what can possibly be the objection to its being declared by a Regulation, that the Ryot is a mere cultivator and tenant at will, and that, if he refuse to take a pottah, he may be ousted by summary process; and that, further, on the expiration of his engagements, the Zemindar may demand whatever rent he thinks proper to ask.

50. The consequence of the confusion and doubts which at present exist on this subject, is, that the Ryots conceive that they have a right to hold their lands so long as they pay the rent which they and their forefathers have always done; and the Zemindars, although afraid openly to avow, as being contrary to immemorial custom, that they have a right to demand any rent they choose to exact, yet go on compelling them to give an increase; and the power of distraint, vested in them by the Regulations, soon causes the utter ruin of the resisting Ryot.

51. These disputes, in general, end by the Ryots appealing to the courts of justice. Suits of this nature are exceedingly intricate and difficult of decision; and the judgments of the courts are frequently given on principles diametrically opposite.

opposite. And this must, and ever will be the case, until the subject is taken into the consideration of Government, and the rights of the Ryots, if they have any, clearly defined; or, if they have none, let their minds be set at rest by being told so. In this case, instead of resisting the attempts of the Zemindars to raise their rents on them, which is sure ultimately to end in their destruction, they would patiently submit to the orders of Government, and secure for themselves the best terms in their power. Mr. Cornish's Report, 26 July 1814.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,
The 21st October 1814.

ORDERED, that the Secretary write the following letter to the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners. Letter to the Board of Revenue and Commissioners, 21 Oct. 1814.

To the Board of Revenue and Board of Commissioners.

Gentlemen:

1. I am directed by the Honourable the Vice-President in Council to transmit to you a copy of the undermentioned papers, viz.

Extract (paragraphs 48 to 51) of a letter from the fourth Judge of the Court of Circuit for the division of Patna.

Extract (paragraphs 29 and 30) of the resolutions of the Nizamut-Adawlut, containing their sentiments on the first-mentioned paper.*

2. The Vice-President in Council conceives that Mr. Cornish has but too strong grounds for the sentiments expressed by him respecting the difficulty experienced by the courts of judicature in the decision of disputes between landlord and tenant, the delay which occurs in the adjustment of cases of this nature, and the contradictory judgments of the courts, arising from the want of recognized principles for their guidance in the decision of such cases.

3. The Nizamut-Adawlut justly observes, that it is provided by the existing Regulations "that the courts of justice will determine the rights of every "description of landholder and tenant, when regularly brought before them, "whether the same be ascertainable by written engagements, or defined by "the laws and regulations, or depend upon general or local usage, which may "be proved to have existed from time immemorial."

4. Experience, however, has shewn, that it is not sufficient merely to refer the parties to the court of judicature, unaided as those courts are by any precise rules, established usage, or recorded precedents, to enable them to administer substantial justice, and at the same time maintain consistency and uniformity in their judgments.

5. It is not by multiplying tribunals, which would probably only multiply the inconsistencies and incoherencies which already exist in matters of this nature, that the evils above-noticed can be obviated, but by the adoption of some plan which may afford to the courts easy and immediate means of ascertaining the law or usage of the district or pergunnah, applicable to disputed questions of rent, and the right of occupancy by the Ryots.

6. It may even be questioned, whether the summary process, so generally observed in the trial and decision of cases of that nature, has not tended greatly to unhinge and unsettle the principles on which the judgments of the courts should be founded, more than would otherwise have happened. It is impossible, in this or in any other country, to maintain the tribunals for the investigation of the endless disputes and differences which arise between individuals, in all the complicated concerns of private life. It is only by the establishment of fixed and defined principles of adjudication, and by affording to the community some convenient medium of ascertaining those principles, and of applying them to their own affairs, that the mass of litigation can ever be kept within any reasonable bounds. This is eminently the case in our own country, where the number of Judges, considered with reference to the wealth and population of

* The substance of them appears in what follows.

Letter to the Board of Revenue and Commissioners, 21 Oct. 1814.

of the country, is extremely limited, but where individuals seldom experience any difficulty in obtaining the legal information required to prevent them from exposing themselves to the embarrassments and expenses necessarily attendant on the prosecution of suits of law.

7. Applying these principles, if they be sound, to the question which more particularly forms the subject of the present letter, the Vice-President in Council conceives that the first step is the establishment of such a seristah, whether it be the Canongoe's office or any other, as may be calculated, by constitution, to furnish the judges themselves with precise and accurate information regarding the law or usage applicable to all cases likely to arise between landlord and tenant; that a brief record should be kept in that seristah, of all judgments passed, in cases of the above nature, by the zillah, city, and provincial courts, aud by the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut; and that means should be afforded to individuals of obtaining, on payment of a moderate fee, any information from such office, either verbally or in writing, according to circumstances, which they might conceive could be of use to them in the arrangement of their private concerns, and the adjustment of differences with other persons. To these arrangements should be added some provision for the registry of engagements contracted between landlord and tenant, in order that the courts of judicature may be further aided in the trial of such cases, when the decision rests, not upon the law or usage of the country, but upon mere matter of fact, as upon the execution of a lease or its counterpart, as must of course frequently happen.

8. It is conceived, that the evil noticed in the preceding paragraphs is felt less in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, and possibly in Benares, than in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa. If this opinion be well founded, it is extremely desirable to ascertain clearly the cause to which the difference is ascribable. If it be referable to the establishment of the office of Canongoe, and to the facilities afforded by that office to the courts of judicature, in ascertaining the local law of the country in cases between landlord and tenant, it furnishes a strong argument for the revival of the office of Canongoe, in those parts of the country in which it does not already exist.

9. The Vice-President in Council desires that you will take the foregoing observations into your consideration, and that you will furnish him with your sentiments on the course which should be pursued, to obviate, in future, the great and serious evil arising from the delay, uncertainty, and incongruity experienced in the decision of revenue suits. It is not wished that you should reduce the plan to the form of a Regulation, but that you should state the outline of it for the consideration of Government. The judicial authorities must, of course, be consulted, before any final arrangement of that nature can be adopted.

I have, &c.

Fort William, 21st October 1814.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

Dated the 12th August 1815.

READ a letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors, dated 6th January 1815.

Ordered, That the Acting Secretary write the following letter to the Board of Commissioners.

To the Board of Commissioners.

Gentlemen:

Letter to the Board of Commissioners, 12 Aug. 1815.

1. I am directed by the Honourable the Vice-President in Council to transmit to you the enclosed extract of a letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors (paragraphs 100 to 108), dated the 6th January 1815, and to acquaint you that you are desired to submit to Government the draft of a Regulation lation for amending the constitution of the office of Putwarry, on the principle suggested by the Honourable Court.

Letter to the Board of Commissioners, 12 Aug. 1815.

2. The Vice-President in Council does not anticipate any material difficulty, on your part, in the performance of this duty, as the suggestions of the Honourable Court correspond in substance with the tenour of the second paragraph of your letter of the 30th May last, to which Government may have occasion to reply more particularly hereafter; but in order that you may have a juster view of the intentions of the Vice-President in Council, with respect to this question, I am directed to state the following particulars for your consideration.

3. It is the wish of Government, that you should not confine yourselves, on the present occasion, solely to the establishment of such rules as may be necessary to render the Putwarries more immediately the officers of Government, but that, taking the most comprehensive view possible of the subject, you should submit a well-digested plan for the constitution of those offices, and likewise of the pergunnah Canongoes, in the manner best calculated to promote the general interests of Government and of the community.

4. The Vice-President in Council is aware that the duty now assigned to you is in a high degree important. To treat the subject in the most general way possible, it involves an inquiry into the different products of the earth, the rates of rent payable, whether in money or in kind, by the immediate cultivators of the soil, and the various modifications to which those rates may be subject through an extensive tract of country. It imposes, likewise, a necessity for establishing such forms of registers and accounts, as may appear best calculated to record and perpetuate the several particulars above noticed; and it is further evident, that a considerable lapse of time will be requisite to enable the above-mentioned officers to collect the materials required, and to digest the whole into that system of account, which was formerly so well known in Bengal, &c. under the appellation of pergunnah rates.

5. It will, of course, be understood from the preceding remarks, that the principal objects to be accomplished are the means of defining the rights of the peasantry, and of adjusting with facility such differences as may arise between landlord and tenant.

6. But exclusively of those objects, the Vice-President in Council observes that we should particularly endeavour, on any revision of the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry, to render those institutions as instrumental as possible in ascertaining the boundaries of estates, and consequently in deciding on the right to disputed lands or crops.

7. It cannot, indeed, be expected, that in the present undefined state of the boundaries of landed property in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, the instrumentality of the Canongoes and Putwarries can be very useful in determining the boundaries of estates; and, under this impression, the necessary measures will be taken, with the aid of a Surveyor-General, to organize an establishment for the performance of that duty, and for ascertaining the quantity of land contained in those estates respectively, and determining the proportion which the cultivated part may bear to the uncultivated part.

8. But such an establishment, which the Vice-President in Council conceives may be rendered highly useful as an instrument for determining the boundaries of estates in the first instance, by no means supersedes, even in that point of view, the utility of the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry. The view already taken of the subject, renders it unnecessary to enter into details upon it; but it may be observed, generally, that in no sense whatever can these offices be rendered more useful and important, than in recording and perpetuating whatever authentic information may be obtained, whether by means of the surveys above-noticed, or otherwise, respecting the limits of estates, and the other points noticed in the preceding paragraphs.

9. Your Board must necessarily recollect, that the present is not the first instance in which Government has expressed its solicitude for the adjustment of the boundaries of estates in the several districts subject to your authority, although the means proposed to be employed on the former occasion, differed from those contemplated in the present instructions.

Letter to the Board of Commissioners, 12 Aug. 1815.

10. In conclusion, I am directed to take the present opportunity to desire, that in submitting the usual reports upon the settlements which may be formed of the several districts in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, you will regularly state the data (that is, the different descriptions of account on which the jumma may have been revised and adjusted), to enable Government to judge of the confidence which should be reposed in the accuracy of the assessment, considered with relation to the gross produce of the lands. Information on these points appears to be particularly desired by the Honourable the Court of Directors.

Board of Commissioners.

To the Honourable N. B. Edmonstone, Esq. Vice-President in Council, Fort William.

Honourable Sir:

Letter from the Board of Commissioners, 30 May 1815.

1. We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Chief Secretary's letter of the 21st October, with its enclosures from the Nizamut Adawlut.

2. The readiest mode of obviating those grievances to which the tenants are liable, from the causes detailed in Mr. Cornish's letter to the Nizamut Adawlut, would be the re-establishment of the Mal Adawluts in the hands of the Revenue officers. The decision on these suits would then be prompt and free of expense, by the exclusion of all technical pleadings and of professional Vakeels; and the supervision of the controlling Board, unembarrassed by the formality of regular appeal, would tend to establish fixed principles, to prevent a deviation from them, and to maintain an uniformity of decision. The whole of the Revenue department has a clear and direct interest in the maintenance of good faith and equity between landlord and tenant, and the Revenue department alone can, generally speaking, acquire a competent knowledge of the subject.

3. The re-establishment of the office of Canongoe in Bengal and Behar, on the same footing as it exists in these provinces and in Benares, would also furnish a useful auxiliary in determining the rates of all ryotee tenures, and in supplying, from personal knowledge of local and traditional customs, the want of specific engagements. But the principal defence and protection of the rights of the tenants would be found in a modification of the Putwarry office, by constituting the Putwarries to be officers of Government, instead of private servants of the Zemindar. As long as the nomination and dismissal of the Putwarry rest with the arbitrary discretion of the landholder, that officer must always continue to be the tool and instrument of his employer. In these provinces, where the Regulations prescribe that the settlement shall be made by specific deduction from the actual produce, and where the accuracy of the assessment must consequently depend upon the accuracy of the estimate of such product, the entire dependence of the Putwarry on the Zemindar cannot but be materially injurious to the interests of Government.

4. But the tenant, although apparently sacrificed to the Zemindar, and debarred from all redress against him by the expense, the dilatoriness, and above all the uncertainty of judicial decisions, does not in practice suffer those hardships, to which, in theory, he would appear to be exposed. When people have reciprocal wants, their mutual necessities drive them to something like an amicable adjustment. The landholder can no more do without the tenant, than the tenant without the landholder. The obligation of the latter to pay the public revenue is certain, and the consequence of his failure is ruin. Starvation is equally certain to the Ryot if he cannot get employment. But nature, in this country, requires little; and although frequent instances have occurred of Zemindars being ruined, no instance has been heard of a Ryot starving for want of work. The law, indeed, has suffered the positive rights of the tenants, as occupants, to pass away sub silentio; but custom, founded on necessity, and stronger than law, has secured to them privileges which appear sufficient sufficient to have made them happy and comfortable, and with reference to all former periods, rich.

Letter from the Board of Commissioners, 30 May 1815.

5. We, in fact, believe the tenants in Behar and Benares to be much better off than they were before Kasim Ally Khan's time. One half of the produce is still the usual share of the Ryot, and he is subject to no exaction. The demand for Ryots is so great, that they can make, and do make, better terms. A Ryot who had but one plough at the time of the perpetual settlement, will be found to have now two or three ploughs. The rate of hire for a ploughman is more than doubled since that period, and grain, on an average, is much cheaper; and although cloth and other articles of necessary use are dearer, the Ryot who was formerly almost naked, is now clothed. If any doubt should exist of the ameliorated state of the tenantry in Behar and Benares, the fact may be proved by reference to the increase of nukdee and the decrease of bhowlee tenures.

6. The mistake of making the perpetual settlement with Rajahs, as proprietors of the whole of the lands composing their raje, has chiefly affected an intermediate class, the village Zemindars, to whom no compensation can be now made for the injustice done to them by the transfer of their property to the Rajahs. Indeed, the whole of this valuable class of landholders may be considered to be extinct in the Lower Provinces, with the exception of a few fortunate individuals, who have preserved their estates, under the names of independent and dependent Talookdars, by the precaution of their ancestors, in providing themselves with written acknowledgements of the general Zemindar, who in consequence of the interpretation put on that title, was considered, by the terms of the perpetual settlement, as the universal proprietor of the soil, and the fountain from which alone any other person could derive a property. These village Zemindars are, however, still numerous in Behar, and more so in Benares, and they will be found, in the large estates of Behar, to maintain their individual property against the general right created by the perpetual settlement, by the possession of the phulker and bunker, and in some instances the julker also. In these provinces we have taken particular pains to avoid the error, and have succeeded with few exceptions.

7. We beg leave to take this opportunity of bringing under the notice of Government the case of the tenants in the jaghires and other rent-free lands, who do not appear to have been hitherto contemplated, in any rule proposed or enacted for the protection of the Ryots in general, as the case of the proprietors of the soil in such jaghires, &c.

8. As Government, by the grant of a jaghire, can assign no more than what they themselves possessed, viz. the right of deriving a certain rent from the land, it would naturally follow, that the assignee can possess no other authority than what Government could have exercised: but by the universal practice under such grants, the assignee becomes virtually vested with all the rights of property, and discharged from all the obligations imposed by Government on themselves. With regard to him, the Regulations become a dead letter. We do not know that such a principle has been recognized by any judicial decision, but we believe that it has never been judicially questioned.

9. The practical effect of this principle may be exemplified in the case of pergunnah Belaspore Sekundra, in the zillah of Cawnpore. The British Government, on its assumption of these provinces, secured to the Zemindars, by an express Regulation, a settlement on prescribed terms, renewable for two periods of three years each, for a third period of four years, and at the expiration of these ten years, in perpetuity. Previously to the commencement of the second triennial period, this pergunnah was granted in jaghire to Nurrender Gueer; and the consequence has been, that the Zemindars of it have found themselves excluded from all the benefits of the legislative enactments by which Government had limited its own demand, and the Jaghiredar has been left at liberty to make his settlement with such persons, on such terms, and for such periods, as he chose.

10. In small jaghires, no injury is perhaps experienced, in practice, from the existence of such a power in the Jaghiredar. His own interest, probably, compels pels him to keep terms with the Zemindar, whose influence with the Ryots might embarrass the Jaghiredar; and we believe that in every, if not in most of these small jaghires, the lands are held on higher terms than in the khalsa villages. But in large jaghires, such as the entire pergunnah above-named, and the more extensive possessions of Rajah Oditnarain, Baboo Sheonarain, and Bussumbur Pundit, in Benares, the rights of the Zemindars are altogether superseded. In the Benares jaghires, particularly, we imagine that the Zemindars are nearly extinct.

11. Nothing in the terms of any grant, either by the British Administration or by former Governments, can be interpreted to preclude the enactment of any laws, which may be deemed expedient for the protection of the Zemindars and Ryots in jaghire lands; and, indeed, some steps have already been taken, with this view, by Section 9, Regulation VIII, 1811. We therefore conceive Government to be at full liberty to frame a Regulation for the purpose; and would beg leave to suggest, that a Regulation be accordingly enacted, for securing to the village Zemindars their zemindarry sayer of phulkur, bunker, julker, and purjote, which the Jaghiredar might be allowed an option of commuting for a payment in money, not less than ten per cent. on the net produce.

12. We beg leave to add, that these important objects having not failed to attract the Governor-General's notice, during his progress through the country, we have already had the honour to submit the same suggestions to his Lordship on his requisition.

We have, &c.

Board of Commissioners, (Signed) E. COLEBROOKE.
Furruckabad,
30th May 1815.

Ordered, That the Acting Secretary write the following letters to the Board of Commissioners and to the Surveyor-General.

To the Board of Commissioners.

Letter to the Board of Commissioners, 12 Aug. 1815.

Gentlemen:

I am directed by the Honourable the Vice-President in Council, to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from you, dated the 30th May last.

2. The Vice-President in Council desires that you will prepare, and submit for his consideration, the draft of a Regulation for the establishment of Mal Adawluts, or tribunals for the trial and decision of disputed claims between landlord and tenant, and generally between all persons in the different gradations from the Sudder Malguzar to the immediate cultivator of the soil, on the footing on which those institutions existed in the provinces of Bengal, &c. previously to the year 1793.

3. The Government has often lamented the abolition of those institutions, by which disputes of the above description were formerly decided with facility and expedition, and with very little expense to the parties, and if Government has not before ordered the revival of them, it was chiefly because, in the actual state of things, doubts might be entertained, whether the Revenue Authorities could act with efficiency in the trial and decision of suits of the nature of those to which this letter refers. In these remarks, the Vice-President in Council alludes to the abolition of the office of Canongoe in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and to the very inefficient state of the office of Putwarry in those provinces, which it is conceived must necessarily have precluded the Revenue Authorities from acting with promptitude and effect in the discharge of the duty in question. The objection, indeed, is less applicable to the Ceded and Conquered Provinces and to the province of Benares, where the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry still exist; but, it is apprehended, in a much less efficient form than might be desired, as more particularly stated in my separate letter to you of the present date.

4. But

4. But as the necessary orders have been already issued to you, with the view of placing the offices of Canongoe and Putwarry, in the district subject to your superintendence, on the most efficient footing possible, and as the Vice-President in Council has it likewise in contemplation to re-establish the former and recognize the latter office in the Lower Provinces and in Behar, no substantial reason exists for postponing the revival of the Mal Adawluts any longer; and the sooner it can be accomplished, the more speedily and effectually will the regular courts of judicature be relieved from a part of the pressure, which is felt as so serious an evil, generally, in the Judicial department. Letter to the Board of Commissioners, 12 August 1815.

5. With a view to the more effectual attainment of that object, the Vice-President is entirely of opinion, that whatever review or appeal it may be deemed proper to allow from the decisions of the Collectors, in cases of the above description, should be to the Board of Commissioners and Board of Revenue, respectively, and not to the zillahs or provincial courts, or to the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut.

6. In framing the Regulations required, it will be an object of your particular attention to distinguish, as clearly as possible, between suits which, on the principles already stated, are to be cognizable by the Revenue Authorities, and those which will still be cognizable by the regular courts of judicature. Any ambiguity on this point would necessarily lead to a collision of authority, which might be attended with great inconvenience.

7. The Vice-President in Council is not aware, that it is necessary to enter into further details on the subject in this letter: but if, in the performance of the above-mentioned duty, you should require instructions on any particular points, you will, of course, state them for the consideration of Government.

I have, &c.

Fort William, (Signed) W. B. BAYLEY, 12th August 1815. Acting Secretary to Government.

To Colonel Colin Mackenzie, Surveyor-General of India (at Madras).

Sir:

1. It being in the contemplation of Government to organize at this presidency an establishment for the instruction of boys in the principles of geometry, mensuration, and drawing, with a view to the employment of them as land-surveyors, I am directed to convey to you the wish of the Honourable the Vice-President in Council that you will prepare and submit to Government the details of the plan which you would recommend to be adopted for that purpose. Letter to the Surveyor General, 12 Aug 1815.

2. In requesting the benefit of your judgment on this occasion, the Vice-President in Council is not less influenced by considerations connected with your official situation and experience, than by a knowledge of the zealous interest and active exertions personally manifested by you in carrying into effect a similar measure at Madras, the result of which is understood to have been productive of the most essential advantages to the public service.

3. The Vice-President in Council is anxious that the establishment proposed to be formed at this presidency should be placed on as economical a footing as may be consistent with the due attainment of the objects immediately in view.

4. To assist your judgment in framing the establishment in the first instance, I am directed to observe that the primary object of Government is to obtain accurate surveys of the several districts (twelve in number), composing the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, with a view to the permanent settlement of the revenues of those territories. Exclusively of that object, it is extremely desirable to obtain surveys of particular estates or tracts of country, in Bengal, &c.; but a small addition to the general establishment will be sufficient for this purpose. It is possible, indeed, that the duty to which these remarks refer may hereafter be undertaken on a more extended scale, with the view of obtaining more accurate geographical and statistical information than we at present possess;

Letter to the Surveyor General, 12 Aug. 1815.

possess; but it will be sufficient to adapt the establishment, as already noticed, in the first instance, to the accomplishment of the objects already described.

5. On your arrival in Bengal, you are requested to communicate personally with the Secretary to the Government in the Revenue department, for the purpose of obtaining any information connected with the discharge of the present duty which his official situation may enable him to afford you.

I have, &c.

To the Honourable N. B. Edmonstone, Esq. Vice-President and Deputy-Governor, &c. &c. &c. in Council, Fort William.

Honourable Sir:

Letter from the Board of Revenue, 13 June 1815.

1. We have the honour to submit to your Honourable Board the accompanying copies of minutes of our Acting President (Mr. Rocke) and of Mr. Colebrooke, containing their sentiments on the revival of the office of Canongoe, as required in the letter from the Chief Secretary, of the 21st of October 1814, repeated on the 9th ultimo.

2. We did not transmit the letter of the Chief Secretary to Mr. Richardson, our other member, who was at that time at Cuttack, under a supposition that the communication might have been made to him separately.

Revenue Board, We have, &c.
13th June 1815. (Signed) R. ROCKE.

Mr. Rocke's Minute.

Mr. Rocke's Minute.

1. It is with diffidence I hazard an opinion on the best mode of remedying the evils stated by the fourth Judge of the Court of Circuit for the division of Patna, in paragraphs 48 to 51 of his letter dated the 26th July 1814, transmitted to us with the letter from the Chief Secretary, under date the 21st of October last.

2. Previously to suggesting a remedy, it may perhaps be necessary to offer an opinion respecting the source of the evil complained of: the more so as, should my opinion regarding its source be correct, it will become requisite for Government to make a declaratory regulation concerning the rights they reserved to themselves, at the period of the permanent settlement, to protect the immediate cultivators of the soil.

3. Whatever difference of opinion may have existed on the subject of the proprietary right in the soil, it now becomes unnecessary to look back. It has been determined that this right vests in the Zemindars, Talookdars, &c. It only remains now for Government to determine the nature and extent of the rights and power they have reserved to themselves, in conformity with Clause 1, Section 8, Regulation I, of 1793.

4. It will, at the same time, be equally necessary, carefully to ascertain whether they may not have subsequently, in some degree, relinquished those rights, or such parts of them as it may now be found expedient to exercise, in behalf of the immediate cultivators of the soil; for, subsequently to the period of the decennial settlement, probably one-third, or rather one-half of the landed property in the province of Bengal may have been transferred by public sale, on account of arrears of revenue One of the rights in contemplation was their power to have confirmed the validity of pottah tenures, which have been declared resumable, in case of public sales for the recovery of arrears of reveuue from defaulting proprietors, and which became a strong inducement to many to become purchasers. Nor must it be forgot, that Government may have benefited thereby, as the lands, in some instances perhaps, would not have otherwise sold at a price sufficient to realize the arrears due, and the proportion of the jumma assessed on them.

5. Another

Mr. Rocke's Minute.

5. Another consequence resulting from the permanent settlement being concluded with the Zemindars, in the capacity of proprietors, was the innovation introduced in the situation of the Putwarries; for although the office was nominally kept up, it was in fact virtually abolished, in respect to its immediate objects, that is, as a check over the former Zemindars or farmers of the land-revenues. The Putwarries were, in fact, the depositaries of the local usages of the country, from whom it was always easy for the Revenue Officers of Government to collect correct information regarding the individual rights of the Ryots, in cases of disputes between them and the Zemindars or farmers. They were then considered the immediate servants of Government; but now, being dependent on the proprietors of the soil, the nature and intention of their original institution are materially altered, and instead of being the protectors and guardians of the rights and privileges of the cultivators of the soil, they are become the zealous and interested partizans of the new proprietors. Of course, little information can now be derived from that source, calculated to secure the Ryots from the gripe of their new masters. The Collectors were strictly prohibited from calling on them for information, except under particular circumstances; so that it would not now be easy to put them on their ancient footing of utility, without perhaps some infringement on the stipulations with the proprietors.

6. The Canongoe's office was, in some respects, similar to the Putwarry's, though less in detail, being confined to objects of greater magnitude between Government and the Zemindars, and other grantees of land, or between the two latter.

7. In order to remedy the evils under consideration, nearly the whole of the revenue Regulations must be most carefully revised. However, it may possibly be advisable to determine, in the first instance, generally, the rights and privileges to be conceded to the cultivators of the soil, and then frame the Regulation on the above subject on correspondent principles.

8. In some instances, many important rights in the cultivators or immediate occupants of the soil have been recognized, particularly in the twenty-four Pergunnahs, where the jummabundee Ryots have the right of transferring their pottah tenures by sale; and if this rule were generally established, and no Ryot be liable to ejectment as long as he paid his rent accceording to the terms of his engagements, or where no engagement had been entered into, according to the purgunnah or village rate of assessment, it would no doubt obviate most of the oppressions and grievances to which they are now subjected.

9. The principal cause of the difficulties and inconveniences which at present exist, is the want of specific engagements, or of some defined data to be governed by. Notwithstanding the rules and injunctions which had been repeatedly enacted, and the endeavours of the different officers of Government to prevail on the landholders and the Ryots to interchange engagements, it is notorious that it has only very partially been effected. The parties can rarely agree as to the terms. The landholder naturally imposes the highest (possibly even exceeding the usual local) rates. The Ryot consenting to the lowest only, or probably to the rent which he has heretofore paid (goozistah pyuristah), the contest ends in no engagement; and the parties go on as they have been accustomed to do, one endeavouring to levy more than he is entitled to, the other withholding what is justly due from him. Thus they are perpetually at issue; and, generally speaking, the Ryot is the sufferer.

10. I shall now proceed to submit my sentiments on the mode to be adopted to remedy the evils complained of; but I do it with diffidence, conscious that they must necessarily be imperfect in the first instance, although I hope they will be found calculated to check, at least, the further progress of this growing malady.

It should be declared, that in acknowledging the hereditary proprietary right of the Zemindars, or rather in conferring that right on them, it was not in the contemplation of Government to annul or abrogate the long pre-existing rights of the immediate cultivators of the soil: on the contrary, that Government expressly reserved to itself the right of enacting such rules and regulations as they might deem expedient for the protection of that class of their subjects.

 Tenures

Mr. Rocke's Minute.

Tenures by pottah, under certain defined provisions, to be hereditary, unresumable, and transferrable by sale or gift; but, in default of heirs at law or bondfide transfer, the lands to be at the disposal of the landlord.

The lands to be liable to distraint on sale for arrears of revenue. The proceeds of the sale to be applicable, first, to the discharge of the arrear, secondly, to defray any expenses attending the sale, and the surplus to be paid to the pottah-holder.

The foregoing rules to apply to all existing khode-khoost and chapperbund pottahs, after the same shall have been registered and rendered conformable to the new rules; and all py-khoost Ryots to be entitled to demand pottahs for their lands on a fixed jumma, and not to be ejected as long as they fulfil the conditions of their engagements.

Putwarries to be declared officers of Government, and to be placed under the orders and controul of the Collectors.

The Putwarries shall be required to deliver to the Collectors copies of all their records duly authenticated; particularly a nerickbunder (or rate of assessment) of every description of land, and produce chittas (or papers of measurement) with the boundaries of each village.

They shall keep registries of all pottahs, as also of all mutations, and deliver authenticated copies of such to the Collector annually.

No pottahs, except such as have been entered in the Putwarries' registers, shall be considered hereditary, or entitling the holder to the benefits before alluded to.

All landholders or others, empowered to distrain or attach lands, previously to so doing shall give notice thereof to the Putwarry, with a memorandum of the amount of the arrears, who, if the Ryot be in arrear, shall allow the attachment or distraint; but if no arrear shall appear due, the Putwarry will not allow the attachment or distraint.

No Ryot to hold more land than is expressed in his pottah, on penalty of double rate of assessment on any excess. The lands to be previously measured, and the assessment fixed at the usual local rates.

Any Ryot refusing to receive a pottah at the foregoing rates shall be liable to ejectment, and shall be held responsible for the rent of the land he holds, agreeably to those rates.

Although pottahs are to be considered hereditary and perpetual, nevertheless a Ryot may take out a pottah for a limited number of years; but it shall not be competent to him to transfer it for a term beyond that specified in the instrument.

A Ryot wishing to relinquish his pottah, shall signify his intention through the Putwarry three months before the close of the year. In default of this, he shall be held responsible for the rent of the ensuing year.

The Putwarries to furnish the Collectors with as accurate statements of the population as they can procure, distinguishing their professions and cast.

11. As connected with the foregoing subject, and in pursuance of the requisition contained in the letter from the Chief Secretary, I shall now proceed to offer my sentiments on the re-establishment of the Canongoe office.

12. Of the origin and objects of this office, or of the considerations which led to its abolition (perhaps arising more from the abuses which existed, or were practised by the executive officers of it, than from any defects in its original institution), it may not be necessary to enter into any detail. The subject has, at different periods, been fully and ably discussed; and of the general utility of the office, with the great convenience which may result from it, under proper rules and provisions, to the landed community at large and the public service, I apprehend there can be no question.

13. Neither does it become necessary, at present, to enumerate the duties to be performed by these officers; they are already sufficiently known from the nature of the office itself, or have been defined in the correspondence which has passed in existing Regulations.

14. That

Mr. Rocke's Minute.

14. That inconveniences have arisen from the abolition of the office is but too generally admittted; and that they have been very inadequately provided for or supplied by the Registers, which were directed to be kept, is manifest. The necessity, therefore, of establishing some office, on a more efficient footing, for the preservation of these records, is obvious; and none occurs to me so well calculated for this end, and other useful purposes, as the re-establishment of the Canongoe office, on principles similar to those on which it has been continued in the Upper Provinces, as far as local circumstances apply.

15. It may be worthy of consideration, whether it would not be advisable to have an office at the presidency, under the charge of an intelligent and experienced civil servant, for the purpose of collecting and concentrating the whole of the records in our office; to digest the present records of the office, and, as far as may be practicable, to supply the deficiency which has arisen since the abolition of the former office; to form a regular digest of all general and local usages; to keep registers of all tahoods, kistbundies, cubbooliats, measurements, nerikhs, or rates of assessment, separations, butwarras, &c., and generally of all the records of all the subordinate Canongoes and Putwarries; also to form statistical statements, as far as may be practicable. Copies of all transfers of land paying revenue to Government to be recorded in this office. The superintendant to report, from time to time to the Board of Revenue on the state of the office, and submit such arrangements as he shall deem necessary for more effectually carrying into effect the objects of the establishment.

16. The revival of the office of Canongoe will, of course, be attended with a considerable augmentation of expense; but this may, in a great measure, be provided for, by a resumption of the lands originally set aside for these officers, and still enjoyed by them, although they now render no services to the state. This observation applies more particularly to Behar, where, there is every reason to believe, this misappropriation exists to a great extent. The resumption of these lands, and of others held under invalid titles, or perhaps no title at all, would, no doubt, furnish abundant sources for defraying the expenses of the Canongoe establishment in that province, which probably would not exceed 25,000 rupees per annum; and, unless it should be intended to adopt the arrangement generally, I would propose that its re-establishment, for the present, be confined to Behar, in which the services of these officers might be more beneficially employed than in Bengal, as it is notorious that the alienations of lands in that province have been very extensive. In Bengal, indeed, I apprehend the quantity of land of that description (Canongoe Nankar) is comparatively inconsiderable; and, in many instances, it was resumed and annexed to the public assessment, so that little can be expected in these districts to meet the increase of expense.

17. Adverting, however, to the general utility of the office, and the convenience which may result from it by affording facilities in the adjustment of Revenue disputes, I can have no hesitation in saying, that I consider the re-establishment of the office expedient, and likely to be attended with many beneficial ends. I am aware that this opinion does not accord with that recorded by me on the 19th November 1811. That opinion, it will be observed, was grounded more on the increase of expense, than on any doubt as to the utility of the measure; and the Board was not then in possession of such information as it has since acquired, of sources from which this expense might reasonably be expected to be defrayed. Subsequent communications have tended, in great measure, to remove that objection, and the considerations which influenced that opinion no longer operate.

18. I regret that such delay should have occurred in preparing this minute; but the ordinary duties of my situation, with other public avocations, have so wholly occupied my time, that I have not had leisure to commit my sentiments to paper at an earlier period.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

On the subject of the reference of Government, contained in the Chief Secretary's letter of the 21st ultimo, I wish to record my sentiments previous to taking leave of the Board, although the many avocations incident to my approaching departure from India render it impracticable for me to do so, as fully and with such explanation of the grounds of my opinion, as I should have been desirous of doing if time permitted.

I have no hesitation in saying, that I am entirely convinced, after the experience of more than twenty years, that the abolition of the office of Canongoe was a radical error in the code of Regulations framed at the close of Lord Cornwallis's government, no office of registry or record calculated to supply its place being then substituted in its room. The Regulations in question did, indeed, provide for the formation of certain registers of land by the officers of the Revenue, which, it seems to have been supposed, would collect and preserve all information which Government might have occasion for. The expectations entertained from these, and from the further registry enjoined by a subsequent Regulation, have been entirely disappointed. It must be acknowledged, they were ill devised, and they have also been very imperfectly kept; and those which have been executed are of little utility. In every view, therefore, no doubt can now, I conceive, remain as to the expediency of rescinding all the Regulations concerning them, and of only requiring from the Revenue officers an annual statement, in the manner of an account-settlement, readily prepared in a simple form.

But had the proposed register been more practicable, and been actually and regularly prepared in the prescribed form, and within the enjoined period, and were they even effectual for purposes that concern the especial interests of Government, still they were totally inapplicable to supply the Canongoe's place, in regard to such of his functions as concerned individuals, and as affected their private interests. That point, in particular, which has been brought under the notice of Government, and is the subject of the present reference to this Board, is an instance conspicuous and important, as it has led to consequences affecting more than one department of the administration, and to evils which urgently call for remedy.

At the period of the decennial settlement, subsequently declared permanent, the rights of Zemindars and Ryots, as well in relation to Government as to each other, underwent much discussion, of which a great portion is to be found recorded on the proceedings of this Board. Among many important points, not unconnected with the present subject, one especially bearing immediate relation to it, which was then distinctly admitted, was, that certain classes of subordinate tenants, and chiefly those denominated dependent Talookdars, or khode-khoost or chapperbund Ryots, possessed certain rights and immunities, which it was just and expedient to uphold, but for which end (the Zemindar's property in the soil being recognized, and he being permanently interposed between the Government and the Ryot) it was become necessary to make special provision, for the security of subordinate tenures and maintenance of the rights of the tenants. With this view, rules were framed which were introduced into the amended code of Regulations for the decennial settlement, from the fifty-second to the seventy-first article of the code passed on 23d November 1791, and re-enacted, with other clauses interspersed in them, in the fifty-first and following sections of Regulation VIII of 1793.

At the date of this re-enactment of those rules, the permanency of the settlement and assessment of the land revenue having been in the mean time proclaimed, it was thought necessary to make particular provision for the protection of the resources of the public revenue from any permanent diminution, through the improvidence of the landholders; and for this purpose, chiefly, a Regulation was then passed (XLIV of 1793), restricting the Zemindars from granting pottahs or leases, or otherwise entering into engagements fixing the payments of their tenants, for any period exceeding ten years, and declaring all engagements between the Zemindar or landholder and the tenants, however strictly conformable to Regulation, void and cancelled from the day of sale, in the event of the lands being sold by public sale for the discharge of the arrears of assessment due by the Zemindar, at the same time providing that the purchaser should should be at liberty to collect from the tenants whatever the former landholder would have been entitled to demand, according to the established usages and rates of the pergunnah or local division, had the engagements so cancelled never existed.

It was subsequently declared, by Regulation IV, 1794, that tenants, whose pottahs might be cancelled or might otherwise determine, should not be required to take new pottahs, at higher rates than the established rates of the pergunnah, for lands of the same quality and description, but should be entitled to have pottahs renewed at the established rates.

When it is recollected how large a proportion of the lands of Bengal changed masters in a few following years, it will be easily conceived how prodigiously numerous must have been the cases, in which engagements between landlord and tenant were annulled by sale for arrears due by the landlord to Government.

Other clauses of the same Regulation last cited, shew that extreme difficulty had been already experienced in the adjustment of the land-rents between the Zemindar and Ryots, under the previous rules of the permanent settlement, which entitled the tenants to receive pottahs at the established rates of the pergunnah Yet not only were no means devised for arranging and preserving a record of those rates, and of the rules by which they were regulated, but an existing institution, the only one in which information could be then found and might be expected to be preserved, was unrelentingly abolished. It cannot be wondered at, that the consequence should have been, as is now generally acknowledged, that (with rare exceptions, in which, owing to special circumstances, a record of the rates exists in the Collector's office, and of course with the exception of Benares and the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, where a reframed serishta, founded on the Canongoe's office, has been kept up) the courts of justice, which are by Regulation required to decide, according to established pergunnah rates, all disputes that arise between the Ryots and their landlords, regarding the rates of the pottahs which they are entitled to, are unable to procure any evidence of those rates, or any other satisfactory information, to guide their decisions.

Consequently, the provisions contained in the general Regulations for the permanent settlement, designed for the protection of the rights of the Ryots or tenants, are rendered wholly nugatory; and it has been repeatedly urged by many of the most judicious officers, who witness the practical operation of the existing laws through the country, as it is now urged by Mr. Cornish, that it would be better for the tenants to declare them destitute of all immunities, and of any right but such as may be specifically conveyed to them by the express terms of the engagements which they may be able to arrange with their landlords, rather than to suffer them to be misled by a vain confidence in supposed or acknowledged rights, in which the courts of justice, for want of definite information, are unable effectually to support them. And certainly there appears to be no complete remedy, but either the sweeping one of abrogating the illusory privileges of the tenantry, or the arduous task of rendering their undoubted rights distinct and palpable, and furnishing the means of upholding them, by now doing what we should have done in the first instance, for the purpose of ascertaining and preserving the rules by which subordinate tenures should, in the various parts of the country, be regulated, according to ancient and established usage, as it subsisted or was understood at the period of the decennial settlement.

There can hardly be any hesitation as to the choice in this alternative. Entertaining, however, but a slender hope of the adequate accomplishment of the latter object, which is now become, from lapse of time, difficult of attainment, I purposed, some time since, a palliative remedy, which was adopted in Regulation V of 1812, but which, I fear, is but an insufficient relief of a serious and inveterate evil; more especially as the remedy provided applies only to individual cases as they arise, and does not operate with much effect to obviate the future recurrence of disputes between other individuals.

I am disposed, therefore, to recommend, late as it now is, that measures should be taken for the re-establishment of fixed rules, as nearly conformable

 to

to the anciently-established ones as may be yet practicable, to regulate distinctly and definitely the relative rights of the landlord and the tenantry.

The power of making laws for the protection and welfare of the tenants, in the several classes of dependent Talookdars, Ryots, and other cultivators of the soil, was expressly reserved to Government by an article of a Proclamation enacted into Regulation I of 1793;* and rules with correspondent rates may be sanctioned by Government, in prosecution of those measures, and in virtue of that power, without any apprehension of violating faith, if they should differ in some degree from the ancient usage, under the difficulty which must now attend the research, and which will impede a perfectly-exact ascertainment of it. Still, however, it is due to all parties interested, that the best practicable means should be used to make the ascertainment as perfect as it is capable of being rendered.

But if Government should be unwilling to interpose its legislative authority, for the purpose of furnishing clear and definite rules by which the relative rights of Zemindar and Ryot may be determined, and which would close an abundant source of mutual grievance and injury, and consequent dispute and litigation, the next best measure is to do what is yet practicable towards collecting and preserving such evidence and information as can be yet recovered, and placing it where persons having an interest therein may inform themselves concerning the existing evidence of their rights, and where courts of justice, when called upon to decide such questions, may find the information requisite to their investigation of the matter.

In either view, or for either purpose, the re-establishment of the Canongoe-serishtah, or the institution of some analogous office of registry and record, appears highly expedient. It would materially assist the recent, as well as the earlier enactments of the Regulations designed for the protection of the tenant: it would greatly assist the adjustment of numerous disputes of every sort between landlord and tenant, which actually arise, and would sensibly tend either to obviate their occurrence, or at least to accommodate them at an early moment, perhaps without previous recourse of either party to a law suit. But the most important of the objects for which the re-establishment of the office is desirable, no doubt, is a retrieval of the knowledge of these rules and rates, by which all questions between Zemindar and tenant are by Regulation to be determined, and without which the relative interests of these parties can no way be settled, unless Government, as before suggested, will enter upon the task of fixing them by fresh enactment of law.

If it be, indeed, practicable to retrieve the requisite information by any means, it is most likely to be done through an office instituted on the basis of that, on which formerly it was expected to be recorded and preserved. Such of the records of the ancient serishtah as yet exist would, of course, be transferred to the revised office, and the fittest among the persons formerly employed in it would naturally be engaged at the re-establishment of it. Their recollection, or the means of inquiry which they would possess, would be most promptly serviceable to the recovery of such written records as yet remain, and to the collecting of information from various quarters, to supply the defect of the records that are imperfect, and the want of those which are lost.

On this account, joined with the consideration of the general utility of the office in the affairs of the land revenue, as experienced in the provinces under the Board of Commissioners, it appears to be highly expedient that an office, on a footing similar to that of the reformed Canongoe of Benares and the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, should be established in Bengal, as has been already recommended by the Board for Behar, and as would have been at the same time recommended by us for the entire province of Bengal, had not the Board been withheld, by the apprehension that the expense (no fund being suggested to defray it) might be an insuperable objection.

The general functions of the office would be the same with those of the ancient Canongoe and of the reformed Serishtahs of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces and the district of Benares. Their special duty, with reference to a principal principal object of the revived institution, would be to prepare a statement of the rates, or the rybundee durbundee, or by whatever other name known, for the pergunnah or other local division, as they stood in the Bengal year 1197, the first year of the permanent settlement, together with the abwab established previously to that year, as well as the rules by which those rents were regulated and applied, ascertaining them from the records and old accounts which they may be able to collect, and from the best accessible sources of information, where records may be deficient.

* Section 8, Clause 1.

Mr. Colebrooke's Minute.

They should be further instructed to prepare statements of the actual rates, according to existing engagements and present collections and payments between landlord and tenant. To enable them to execute this essential duty, the Putwariees should be required to furnish all necessary information, and to allow them to inspect documents and accounts for which they may have occasion, and supply them with copies of accounts and papers wanted for record.

It does not occur to me to be necessary to state more particularly in this place, the rules and instructions which it might be proper to prescribe for the guidance of Pergunnah Serishtahs, in the execution of these and other duties of their office.

Concerning the expediency of the institution, I shall only add, that my recollection of the judicial duties, both in a zillah and in a court of appeal, in the province of Benares, after the Pergunnah Serishtahs were there established on the basis of the Canongoe, and in zillahs of Bengal and Behar, before the abolition of the office of those provinces, enables me to affirm, that disputes between Zemindar and Ryots were less frequent and more easily determined than they now are in the Lower Provinces; and I am assured, from a more recent local experience and personal observation of other gentlemen, who have communicated their sentiments to me, that in Benares, particularly, when the rybundee of a specific year is by regulation prescribed, and is forthcoming in the subsisting serishtahs of the pergunnahs, the controversies between Zemindar and Ryot, when any do arise, are by no means difficult of adjustment. The effect of this, in lightening the burthen of the administration of justice, and on the very important point of promoting the mutual good understanding and consequent ease and happiness of two principal classes of the community, the landowner and the husbandman, requires no elucidation.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 27th September 1815.

Late Joint Magistrate of Rungpore.

To W. B. Bayley, Esq. Acting Secretary to Government, Judicial Department, Fort William.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2 April 1815.

Sir:

1. I have dispatched, per Phœnix, that portion of my report on Rungpore which relates to the state of the police. The result of my inquiries, regarding the Garrow tribes, was submitted to Government previously to my departure from Calcutta; and it only remains for me to represent the relative state of the landlord and tenant, which will be the subject of the present address.

2. What I shall have occasion to bring to notice may possibly prove, that in Rungpore it is not the prevalence of gang-robbery, and other public crimes, which calls the most loudly for a remedy. These are but the ramifications of an an evil, whose root has long flourished in secret. The arbitrary oppression under which the cultivator of the soil groans, has at length attained a height so alarming, as to have become by far the most extensively injurious of all the evils under which that district labours; and until, by a steady adherence to the most decisive and vigorous measures, the bulk of the community shall have been restored from their present state of abject wretchedness to the full enjoyment of their legitimate rights, I fear it will be in vain to expect solid and substantial improvement.

3. In my letter from Dinagepore, to the address of Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell, under date the 14th July last, I dwelt at some length upon the very general perversion which the landholders and farmers of this district and of Dinagepore made of the law of distress and sale, to the furtherance of every species of rapacity and extortion; and I took the liberty, at the same time, to suggest such improvement as seemed to promise a mitigation of the oppressiveness of a law, which though a necessary evil, must, under any restriction, ever continue to be a cruelly-powerful engine in the hands of vindictiveness and rapacity, of crushing the poor and the abject.

4. In the course of the present address, I shall endeavour to shew to what a height rapacity, seconded by this and other instruments, has attained in the district of Rungpore. This enumeration will exhibit the state of the Ryot, far, very far more wretched, than any one perusing in his closet the salutary rules of 1793 and 1794, and the many legislative enactments which preceded them, could conceive it possible for it to have become, under a systematic administration of those laws.

5. It will require little more than a recapitulation of the law itself to prove, that till within the last three years, this evil, so far from being asssisted, has ever been discouraged, nay, under pain of severe penalties, absolutely prohibited, by the legislature.

That, from the earliest times within the reach of public record, the cultivator of the soil has possessed certain rights, which were publicly recognized by the British Government in the infancy of its establishment, and which were clearly ascertained and defined by specific legislative enactment, full nineteen years before the decennial settlement.

That these rights, after undergoing a modification which involved considerable prejudice* to the interests of the various cultivators of the soil, were finally guaranteed to him on one and the same day that the right of property in the soil he tilled was gratuitously conferred on the Zemindar.

That though, probably, with but little reference to the probability of its ever being necessary to exert that power, lest peradventure these vitally-important rights should, in the result, prove incapable of being secured to the poorer classes, by means of the laws by which they were thus solemnly conferred, the legislature has providently reserved to itself, in the clearest and most unequivocal manner (that is, by the express letter of the very law which has conferred on the Zemindar the novel rights he now enjoys) the full and unqualified power of passing such laws in favour of the cultivator, as from time to time may appear necessary.

That this authority, from a cause possibly other than that stated in the preamble of the Regulation,† was the following year exerted; and the rights of the

* To wit, the annual tax imposed upon him and his posterity, to the end of time, of the various cesses levied, in contradiction to the written law, between the 18th May 1772, and the period at which the settlement of the Ryot's tenure might be concluded, under the provision of 1793.

† From obvious circumstances, it would appear that, in point of fact, the provisions of Regulation IV, 1794, were enacted rather to correct an inconsistency in the code of 1793, than to explain a law hitherto misunderstood. I am of opinion, that the limiting of Ryot's leases, in common with all others, to the term of ten years, by Regulation XLIV, 1793, has been the principal cause of the almost utter extinction, in practice, of the right of the cultivator to unlimited possession. Had the framers of Regulation IV, 1794, openly corrected this mistake, in contradiction to the provisions of Regulation VIII, 1793, instead of adding to the confusion, by confirming the intricate and inexplicable system of a decennial renewal of rights which admitted not of alteration, the promulgation of Section 3, Regulation V, 1812, would not have been followed by the injurious consequences it has produced.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2 April 1815.

the Ryot, as they had been established in the preceding year, were, by an express enactment, declared to be guaranteed to him for ever.

5. That thus the faith of the state is, to the full, as solemnly pledged to uphold the cultivator of the soil in the unmolested enjoyment of his long-established rights, as it is to maintain the Zemindar in the possession of his estate, or to abstain from increasing the public revenue permanently assessed thereon.

6. The instructions issued to the Supervisors on the 16th August 1769, contain the first public recognition, on the part of the British Government, of the rights of the cultivator. These orders excite much interest, from the very intimate acquaintance they exhibit with a most intricate subject in the very infancy of our establishment; which renders it the more distressing, that the difficulties proceeding from the novelty of the subject should have eventually rendered the deputation of Supervisors into the interior of the country of but trifling general benefit. Such was certainly the result with regard to Rungpore, the local circumstances of which district seem to have long kept its internal state concealed from the knowledge of Government.

7. In these instructions it is observed: "Another grievance, which is equal "to the former, is the variety of demands which the Collector, from the Aumil "and Zemindar to the lowest Pyke, imposes without any colour or license from "the Government, some of which have been so long exacted and paid, that "the Ryots begin to imagine the oppression is sanctioned by Government, and "is not the mere fraud of the Collectors.

"A third, and equally important object of your attention, under this "head, is to fix the amount of what the Zemindar receives from the Ryot, as "his income or emolument, wherein they generally exceed the bounds of moderation, taking advantage of the personal attachment of their people, and "the inefficiency of the present restrictions upon them, since the presence of "the Aumil more frequently produces a scene of confusion than a wariness of "conduct. When the sum of the produce of the lands and of such demand "on the tenant is thus ascertained with certainty, the proportion of what remains to him, for the support of his family and encouragement of his industry, "will clearly appear, and lead us to the reality of his condition.

"Among the chief effects which are hoped for from your residence in that "province, and ought to employ your thoughts and never to wander from your "attention, are these: To convince the Ryot that you will stand between him "and the hand of oppression; that you will be his refuge and the redresser of "his wrongs; that the calamities he has already suffered have sprung from an "intermediate cause, and were neither known nor permitted by us; that "honest and direct applications to you will never fail producing speedy and "equitable decisions; that, after supplying the legal dues of Government, he "may be secure in the enjoyment of the remainder; and finally, to impress "him with a veneration and affection for the humane intentions of our Government.

"In the Ryot being eased and secured from all burthens and demands, but "what are imposed by the legal authority of Government itself, and future "pottahs being granted him specifying that demand, he should be taught that "he is to regard the same as a sacred and inviolable pledge, that he is liable to "no demands beyond their amount. There can, therefore, be no pretence for "suits on that account; no room for the invention of rapacity to practice its "usual acts: all will be fair, open, and regular. Every man will know what "he can call and defend as his own; and the spirit of lawless encroachment, "subsiding for want of a field for exercise, will be changed into a spirit of industry, and content and security will take place of continual alarms and "vexations.

"The Ryot, too, should be impressed, in the most forcible and convincing "manner, that the tendency of your measures is to his ease and relief; that "every opposition to them is rivetting his own chains, and confirming his servitude and dependence on his oppressors; that our object is not increase of "rents or the accumulation of demands, but solely, by fixing such as are legal,

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2 April 1815.

"and explaining and abolishing such as are fraudulent and unauthorized, not "only to redress his present grievances, but to secure him from all further in-"vasions of his property.

"The truth cannot be doubted, that the poor and industrious tenant is taxed "by his Zemindar or Collector, for every extravagance that avarice, ambition, "pride, vanity, or intemperance may lead him into, over and above what is "generally deemed the established rent of his lands. If he is to be married, a "child born, honours conferred, luxury indulged, and nuzzuranas or fines "exacted, even for his own misconduct, all must be paid by the Ryot;* and "what heightens the distressful scene, the more opulent, who can better obtain "redress for imposition, escape, while the weaker are obliged to submit.

"To obtain an account of these cesses or imposts, there cannot be a more "certain method than what I have before recommended, of getting from the "Ryot himself a statement of what he actually pays, over and above his es-"tablished rents; and from this you are to draw a medium amount of the "cesses levied upon the whole. This should be set against the amount of the "established rents so cessed.

"Your commission entrusts you with the superintendence and charge of a "province, whose rise or fall must considerably affect the public welfare of the "whole. The exploring and eradicating of numberless oppressions, which are as "grievous to the poor as they are injurious to the Government; the displaying "of the national principles of honour, faith, rectitude, and humanity, which "should ever characterize the name of an Englishman; the impressing of the "lowest individual with these ideas, and raising the heart of a Ryot from op-"pression and despondency to security and joy, are the valuable benefits "which must result to our nation from a prudent and wise behaviour on your "part."

8. The first Regulation which treats of the tenures of the country appears to have been passed on the 14th May 1772. Its tenth article provides "that the "farmer shall not receive larger rents from the Ryots than the stipulated "amount of the pottahs, on any pretence whatsoever; and that, for every in-"stance of such extortion, the farmer, on conviction, shall be compelled to pay "back the sum which he may have so taken from the Ryot, besides a penalty "equal to the same amount to the Sirkar, and for a repetition, or a notorious "instance of this oppression on his Ryots, the farmer's lease shall be annulled." Article twelfth. "No mahatoots or assessments, under the heads of maugun, "bawree-gundee, sood, or any other abwab or tax, shall be imposed upon the "Ryots; and those articles of abwab which are of late establishment shall be "carefully scrutinized, and, at the discretion of the Committee, abolished, if "they are found in their nature to be oppressive and pernicious."

9. The thirty-fifth article of the general Regulations, passed on the 8th of June 1787, provides "that the Collector do give the most unremitting attention "to ascertain the rules and rates of assessment on the Ryots under his juris-"diction, and endeavour to fix upon some mode by which they may be re-"gulated, on general, fair, and well-ascertained principles."

Article 50. "Whereas, notwithstanding the orders of Government in the "year 1772, prohibiting the imposition of mahatoot or assessment, under the "names maugun, hauldaree, morocha, bazee-jumma, or sood, or any other new "article of taxation, various taxes have been since imposed, the Collector is "strictly enjoined to enforce this article, and prevent the imposition of any "new taxes upon the Ryots; and if, hereafter, any new taxes should be im-"posed, the Collector, on proof of such exaction, is to decree double the "amount thereof to the party injured, as costs of suit."

10. The decennial settlement was avowedly founded on the principle which had been the basis of the periodical settlement preceding it, viz. as stated in the preamble to Regulation II, 1793, on "an estimate formed by the public "officers of the aggregate of the rents payable by the Ryots or tenants for "each begah of land in cultivation, of which, after deducting the expense of "collection

* It is notorious that, in Rungpore, all fines to which the misconduct of a Zemindar may subject him are levied from the Ryots of his estate.

" collection, ten-elevenths were usually considered as the right of the public, " and the remainder the share of the landholder."

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2 April 1815.

11. It differed from the settlements which preceded it in but three points: first, in its being fixed for ever; secondly, in its formally vesting the property of the soil, under certain restrictions, in the Zemindar, till then a mere ministerial officer under Government; and lastly, in its giving up to the Zemindar the whole of the profit which was certain to accrue from a progressive extension of cultivation, for generations to come. The additional profits which were to accrue to the Zemindar from the permanent settlement of his estate, were confined to but one source, i. e., extension of cultivation. He was vested with no power to enhance the rents of his tenants, with reference even to the waste lands which his exertions might bring into cultivation: he was peremptorily restricted from exacting a higher rent than that which lands of a similar quality might be rated at in the nirkhbundy of his estate. The profit that was to arise to him from bringing the waste lands into cultivation, was the enjoyment of the Government's share of their produce, in addition to his own.

12. The expected result of the decennial settlement was, that " individuals " would thereby be certain to enjoy the fruits of their industry; that it would " dispense prosperity and happiness to the great body of the people, and in- " crease the power of the state, which must be proportionate to the collective " wealth that, by good government, it might enable its subjects to acquire."

13. [There are but 202 Zemindar families in Rungpore. 1793, Regulation I.]—Two hundred families were not to aggrandize themselves at the expense of the rights of a million of under-tenants, but were told that, " to con- " duct themselves with good faith and moderation towards their dependent " Talookdars and Ryots, are duties at all times indispensably required from " the proprietors of land, and that a strict observance of these duties is now " more than ever incumbent upon them, in return for the benefits which they " will themselves derive from the orders now issued: the Governor-General " in Council, therefore, expects that the proprietors of land will not only act " in this manner themselves towards their dependent Talookdars and Ryots, " but also enjoin the strictest adherence to the same principles on the persons " whom they may depute to collect the rents from them.

" To prevent any misconstruction of the foregoing articles, the Governor- " General in Council thinks it necessary to make the following declarations to " the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and the other actual proprietors of " land.

" First, it being the duty of the ruling power to protect all classes of people, " and more particularly those who, from situation, are the most helpless, the " Governor-General in Council will, whenever he may deem it proper, enact " such Regulations as he may think necessary for the protection and welfare " of the dependant Talookdars, Ryots,* and other cultivators of the soil; " and no Zemindar, independent Talookdar, or other actual proprietor, shall " be entitled, on this account, to make any objection to the discharge of the " fixed assessment which they have respectively agreed to pay."

[1793, Regulation VII, Section 52.]—" Every engagement contracted with " under-farmers shall be specific, as to the amount and conditions of it; and " all sums received by any actual proprietor of land, or any farmer of land, of " whatever description, over and above what is specified in the engagements " of the persons paying the same, shall be considered as exacted, and be repaid, " with a penalty of double the amount."

[1793, Regulation VIII, Section 54.]—" The impositions upon the Ryots, " under the denominations of abwab, mahatoot, and other appellations, from " their nature and uncertainty having become intricate to adjust and a source " of

* The orders of the Honourable Court of Directors on the subject of this declaration are very remarkable: " And you will, in a particular manner, be cautious so to express yourselves, as to " leave no ambiguity as to our right to interfere, from time to time, as it may be necessary, for the " protection of the Ryot and subordinate landholders, it being our intention, in the whole of this " measure, effectually to limit our own demand, but not to depart from our inherent right, as " sovereigns, of being the guardians and protectors of every class of persons living under our " government." General Letter, 19th September 1792.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815

"of oppression to the Ryots, all proprietors of land and dependent Talookdars "shall revise the same, in concert with the Ryots, and consolidate the whole "with the assessments into one specific sum."

[1793, Regulation VIII, Section 55.]—"No actual proprietor of land or "dependent Talookdar, or farmer of land, of whatever description, shall impose "any new abwab or mahatoot upon the Ryots, under any pretence whatever. "Every exaction of this nature shall be punished by a penalty, equal to three "times the amount imposed; and if, at any future period, it be discovered "that new abwabs or mahatoots have been imposed, the person imposing "the same shall be liable to this penalty for the entire period of such imposi- "tions."*

[1793, Regulation VIII, Section 60.]—"No actual proprietor of land or "persons acting under their authority, shall cancel the pottahs of the khode- "khoost Ryots,† except upon proof that they have been obtained by collusion, "or that the rents paid by them within the last three years have been reduced "below the nirkhbundy of the pergunnah, or that they have obtained collusive "deductions, or upon a general measurement of the pergunnah for the purpose "of equalizing and correcting the assessment."

[1793, Regulation VIII, Section 61.]—"After the expiration of the year "1198, no engagements for rent, contrary to those ordered, are to be held "valid; and in the event of any claims being preferred by proprietors of estates, "or Talookdars, farmers, or Ryots, on engagements wherein the consolida- "tion of the ussal, abwab, &c. shall not appear to have been made, they are "to be nonsuited with costs."

[1794, Regulation IV, Section 7.]—"The rules in the preceding section "are to be considered applicable, not only to the pottah, which the Ryots are "entitled to demand, in the first instance, under Regulation VIII, 1793, but "also to the renewal of pottahs which may expire or become cancelled under "Regulation XLIV, 1793; and to remove all doubt regarding the rates at "which the Ryots shall be entitled to have such pottahs renewed, it is declared "that no proprietor or farmer of land, or any other person, shall require Ryots, "whose pottahs may expire or become cancelled under the last-mentioned "regulation, to take out new pottahs, at higher rates than the established "rates of the pergunnah for lands of the same quality and description; but "that the Ryots shall be entitled to have such pottahs renewed at the esta- "blished rates, upon making application, for that purpose, to the person by "whom their pottahs are to be granted, in the same manner as they were "entitled to demand pottahs in the first instance, by Regulation VIII, 1793."

14. The recorded sentiments of the Court of Directors, on the subject of the decennial settlement, are well worthy attention. "It would be doing Mr. "Shore an injustice, not to acknowledge that, as his opinions in general against "such a settlement are advanced with ability, so there are several of his ob- "jections, which are very serious in themselves, and have considerably im- "pressed our minds. These are drawn from the still imperfect knowledge of "our Government, respecting the real resources of the provinces, as well as "of the respective rights of the Zemindars, Talookdars, and Ryots, from its "inability to discriminate what part of the taxes levied from the two latter "classes by the Zemindars ought to be sanctioned by Government in a perma "nent settlement, from the uncertainty of accomplishing that settlement with "a due regard to the rules prescribed for it, and especially from the extreme "difficulty of forming and executing such Regulations as shall reserve to the great "body of the Ryots the same equity and certainty as to the amount of their "rents

* I fear but few of the Rungpore landlords would escape utter ruin, if this provision were rigorously enforced in Rungpore.

† It is imagined by many, that this clause restricts the operation of the above clauses of Section 7, Regulation IV, 1794, to khode-khoost, or as they are sometimes called, chappeibund Ryots; but this construction is clearly erroneous, the manifest intent being to exempt the khode-khoost Ryots, under certain circumstances, from the operation of the above rules. All Ryots, py-khoost as well as khode-khoost, were held equally entitled to the benefit of a fixed nirkbundee, though py-khoost Ryots would not generally benefit by the privilege, since they would obtain, as an encouragement to till in a strange village, better terms than the rate which the khode-khoost tenants would pay for land of the same quality.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

" rents, and the same undisturbed enjoyment of the fruits of their industry, " which we mean to give to the Zemindars themselves. Upon these grounds " it is contended, that as some districts of the country will probably be over- " rated, and others suffer from drought and inundations, the proprietors, unable " to make good their assessments, will, without any thing blameable on their " part, be deprived of their lands by judicial sale; that the Company will, from " such cases as this, be exposed to a continual diminution of the stipulated " revenue, without a possibility of any augmentation to balance their loss; and " that, after all, unless we succeed in introducing and establishing equitable " Regulations between the landlords and their tenants, the great objects for " which such sacrifices and a permanent settlement will have been made (that " is, the improvement and happiness of the country) will be unattained, and " therefore the evils of the old system still subsist.

" There remains but one subject to mention in this letter. That, however, " is a subject of the last importance: which is, the watching over, rearing, " and maturing this system, and maintaining under future administrations, " the energy which has commenced it. All the benefits hoped for from it to " the country and to the Company, all its success, must depend upon the vi- " gilance and fostering care of our Government and our servants. No mistake " could be more fatal, than that of supposing that it may be left to its own " execution, and that all the effects it is indeed fitted to produce will necessa- " rily, and of course, flow from it. If any conclusion is to be drawn from the " descriptions given of the people, it is surely that the powerful are op- " pressive, and the weak fraudulent. Having neither wisdom nor confidence " to act for distant good, and being unrestrained by moral considerations, they " are prone to avail themselves of present opportunity. It is true, that the " new system reckons upon their self-interest, and this is an excellence in it; " but it will take time to assure them the system is solid, and to discover to " them that their interest is best promoted by following the dictates of justice " and humanity. The business of our Government must be to prevent them " from violating these principles, injuring each other, and obstructing the " gradual development of the effects which the new institution is calculated " to produce. When the effects are become obvious, and the people are " taught by sensible demonstration, the system will then, as we have already " suggested, be better able to stand by itself. In the meantime, it must be " the duty of our servants to watch incessantly over its progress; to see that " the landholders observe punctually their agreements with Government and " with the Ryots; that they neither pass invented claims on the eve of a " permanent settlement, nor fraudulently shift the burthen of revenue by col- " lusive transfers, nor by any other sinister practices diminish the payment of " their stipulated assessment; that they likewise uniformly give to their " Ryots written specific agreements, as also receipts for all payments, and " that these agreements be on the one side and the other fairly fulfilled. In " this way, and in this only, can the system be expected to flourish. But it " is not enough that complaints are redressed when they reach the seat of " authority: many injuries in the remoter parts of the districts may thus be " committed with impunity. It will be the Collector's duty to inspect every " part of the province entrusted to him, to see the state of cultivation, to " enquire into the condition of the Ryots, and thus to afford opportunity for " representation, and check the propensity to abuse." Vide General Letter, 19th September 1792.

15. I have observed, in a preceding note, that the confusion, as to the law of Ryot-tenure, introduced by the provisions of Regulation XLIV, 1793, had created considerable doubt in the minds of many, as to the extent of the rights of the cultivators of the soil. The vague language used in the abrogation of certain parts of Regulation IV, 1794, by Section 3, Regulation V, 1812, may possibly appear but ill calculated to dispel those doubts: That it has had a contrary effect in the instance of many, I can maintain without fear of contradiction.

16. I am aware, that the intent of the section last quoted is to promote the cause which it appears to me to have prejudiced; but though I may be very willing to allow that the express letter, if carefully considered, will be found not to take away any rights which the Ryot possessed previously to its enact- ment, ment, yet I cannot help continuing steadfast in the opinion, that the opposite interpretation given it by the natives is precisely what, on comparing its contents with the provisions of Regulation XLIV, 1793, and Section 7, Regulation IV, 1794, they might have been expected to form.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

17. It had been enacted, by Section 2, Regulation XLIV, 1793, that no lease whatever, except for the erection of houses and for gardens, could be made for a longer period than ten years. This rule had been modified, in favour of the Ryot, the following year; but not by exempting him from the operation of that Regulation, but by entitling him to a renewal of his lease, after the expiration of the period which had been limited by the rule above cited. Regulation V, 1812, annuls the provisions of Regulation XLIV, 1793, and provides that the renewal of pottahs, as prescribed by Regulation IV, 1794, is no longer necessary, and that the landlord and tenant are at liberty to come to such agreement as may mutually appear to them conducive to their respective interests.

18. It will be allowed, that the illiterate Ryot could never, under the old rules, have felt his right to perpetual possession confirmed by a deed, which expressly limited his lease to ten years. On the contrary, it is well known to those who have been at the pains to enquire into the opinions of the lower orders, that the Ryots, in general, have always felt a solicitude to avoid the taking such pottahs, under the impression that they would thereby be compromising their right to unlimited occupancy.

They see nothing of the law but what, to all appearance, militates against* the existence of such a right, and therefore they can have no opportunity of reconciling the circumstance of limitation with the preservation of it. Let them go to their Mundel or Peramanick, he is equally ignorant with themselves; or if he has casually heard vague mention of the favourable clause, being in nine instances out of ten bribed to the interest of the Zemindar, it is not likely that he will be communicative. Let them go to their Putwarry: he is in the regular pay of the Zemindar, and is removable from office at his pleasure; from him, therefore, they will collect nothing favourable. Let them go to the Moonsif: here they not infrequently find as much ignorance as before, and always as much collusion in favour of the opposite party.

19. Under these circumstances, it may easily be imagined that a Ryot whose lease, granted in pursuance of Regulation XLIV, 1793, for a period of ten years, had expired in 1803, considering his right to unlimited occupancy to have been destroyed by his having taking a pottah for a limited period, would feel himself, at the end of that period, altogether dependent upon the caprice of his landlord for a renewal of his lease upon any terms. This I know to have been a very general effect of the limitation noticed. Is it to be wondered at, that the Zemindar should convert this ignorance on the part of the Ryot into a means of self-emolument? After the expiration of the period of the decennial pottah, where such pottahs have been granted, the Zemindar has, if he found the condition of the land admitted it, very generally enhanced the rate of the former lease, and given the new pottah for a much shorter term than ten years. If this practice prevailed before 1812, would not the landlord readily find wherewithal to support his rapacity by the semblance of law, in the provisions of the fifth Regulation of that year?

20. With a view to perspicuous illustration, I shall beg to suppose a case.

A is a Ryot, who has been on B's estate from the year 1790. In conformity to the provisions of the decennial settlement, B, in the year 1793, adjusts the rates of the estate which A cultivates, and establishes a form of pottah, agreeably to which A obtains a lease from B for a period of ten years (that is, till the expiration of the year 1803), at the rent of thirty rupees per annum. In 1804 A finds his lease expired, and goes to B for a renewal. B says "No; "the value of land has increased: you must therefore give me forty rupees a "year, or I will give the land to another tenant. It is also my intention to "limit my leases, in future, to five years." A sees no alternative but compliance, and reluctantly agrees to the terms. In 1808 the same scene is acted over again, and if the condition of the land and other circumstances admit admit of it, a further enhancement takes place. A reluctantly complies, and now pays forty-five rupees. In 1818, the third lease being expired, A solicits a renewal. "No," says B, "times are altered: the law now allows us to "make whatever bargains with our Ryots we may find most conducive to our "interests. Your lease was but for five years, which have expired, and with "it your occupancy has ceased. I have had an offer of sixty rupees for your "land, and unless you consent to this enhancement you must give place "to C."

* The pottah drawn out agreeably to Regulation 44, 1793.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

21. Will any one maintain that a case can never have happened as above assumed? Will any one maintain, that the solitary circumstance of a fraction of a section not having been repealed (a section of which the Ryot never heard) precludes the possibility of its ever happening? Would that those that think so were right, and that I and those who think with me were wrong. I have no object in complaining without grounds; my sole view is to further the cause of the oppressed.

22. Government may possibly imagine that my apprehensions are not without foundation, when I inform them that, at this very moment, the Zemindars of Rungpore are perverting the provisions of Section 3, Regulation V, 1812, to the entailment, in perpetuity, upon their wretched victims, the peasantry, of the long series of exactions of which the following are but a few specimens.

23. Rajchunder Chowdry, proprietor of the four annas, portion of pergunnah Coonry, who pays 15,976 rupees malguzarry to Government, purchased, in the year 1812, of Messrs. Colvins, Bazett, and Co. a lower-roomed pukka house, situated nearly opposite to the European Burial-ground at Rungpore, formerly the property of one Nichols, a shop-keeper, for the sum of Sicca Rupees 2,100: he likewise held a deba pooja, to render his entry on the premises duly auspicious, which cost him 2,000 rupees more. It is a notorious fact, that Rajchundry Chowdry has collected from the Ryots of his estate, with a view to defray this expense, no less a sum than 11,000 rupees, under the bold item of dalan khurchu (house or hall money).

21.* The ceremonies attending the birth of this Zemindar's grandson cost him 1,200 rupees; and he has collected from his Ryots, on this account, five thousand.

22. Sudasheb Raee, a joint proprietor of the seven annas, portion of the same estate, had his house burnt down, a little more than ten years ago, on which occasion he is said to have lost a considerable quantity of property. This Zemindar is notoriously known to have fully indemnified himself for this loss, by collections from his Ryots, and the temporary addition thus imposed on the rent-roll of his estate is said to have outlived the cause which gave it birth, and to have become a permanent increase upon the former rent, under the title of ghur bunaee (house-building).

23. Sadasheb Raee commemorated the Mahabhaunt some years ago, which ceremony lasted three months, and in which 20,000 rupees were expended. The whole brunt of this vast expense fell upon the tenantry of his estate.

24. Jyram Baboo, a man whose boundless extravagance has reduced him to a very low ebb, farms the whole of his estates, which, though much of his property has gone to the hammer, are still of great extent. This man, though, as above-stated, his lands are all in farm, has for many years been in the annual practice of visiting his villages in the cold season. On these occasions he proceeds in great pomp, travelling with a set of double-poled tents, and several elephants and led horses following in his train.

25. It may be imagined, that this annual visit is with a view to alleviate misery and to extend the hand of charity to the distressed among his tenantry. Far different is his object. He proceeds from village to village, levying contributions as he goes, under the name of mangun and bhukka, which in name only are voluntary; for all must give their quota, or look to the consequences of a refusal. I am unprepared to state the probable amount of the annual collections lections thus made: the very mode in which they are levied bids defiance to all inquiry on the subject. Suffice it to say, that these collections are yearly made, and the worthy landlord has probably but just returned from his annual ramble.*

* The subsequent paragraphs misnumbered. See original.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

26. Moonshee Himayutoollah, once Sheristadar of the Judges' Court, and late Dewan of the Collectorship, bought a very large estate in the Dinagepore district† a few years ago; and so happy was his bargain, that he is said to have levied, in the course of the first visit of ceremony to his new tenants, a full moiety of the purchase money. This he is said to have managed with such address, as to have left the contributors mightily pleased with the moderation and forbearance of their new lord and master.

27. Himayutoollah had occasion to buy an elephant a year or two ago, which cost him 500 or 600 rupees. This was a mere flea-bite to his tenants, whom he found it no difficult matter to persuade that it was as essential to their respectability as to his own, that he should no longer mount the back of so mean a quadruped as a horse.

28. Race Danishnund Niteeanund, who has very extensive estates in Rungpore, Dinagepore, and Moorshedabad, and who pays an annual revenue to Government for his estates in Rungpore alone of 69,742 rupees, yearly levies, in the most open and barefaced manner, a cess of an anna per rupee from the whole of his tenantry, for the avowed purpose of defraying the daily expense of the offerings to his household-god, Bunwaree; and I am given to understand, he quiets his conscience by the reflection, that he is not guilty of malversation, not even the vast sums thus levied being, as he maintains, adequate to the expense incurred on account of his favourite idol.

29. A man named Bhyrub, commonly called Bhyrub Baboo, about three years ago farmed the extensive pergunnah of Dimla, comprising the extent of a whole thana jurisdiction, and with the view to increase the revenues of the pergunnah, carried into the mofussil, at the first outset, above a thousand rupees-worth of broad-cloth, coarse and superfine, with which, assisted by the proffer of more substantial personal immunities, he bribed the Puramanicks of the several talooks over to his interest, who without remorse consigned their inferiors to exaction and to plunder.‡

30. The above are but a few of the many practical proofs which might be adduced, in support of what I have advanced relative to the state of the Ryot in Rungpore. Every doorgah, every cartick, every kalee-poorja is paid for by the Ryots, who in Rungpore, to add to the cruelty of the oppression and to the insult, are full three-fourths of them Mussulmans. Not a child can be born, not a head religiously shaved, not a son married, not a daughter given in marriage, not even one of the tyrannical fraternity dies, without an immediate visitation of calamity upon the Ryot. Whether the occasion be joyful, whether it be sad in its effects, to the cultivator it is alike mournful and calamitous. Surely it will be sufficient to have stated these facts. I feel that I should only be weakening the cause, by dispassionately discussing the probable effects of the continuance of so woeful a system of remorseless tyranny.

31. It may be asked, how these oppressions are reconcilable to the provisions of the legislature. For an explanation of the mode pursued with the refractory, I beg to refer to my letter of the 14th of July last, on the subject of distress and sale. To conclude that the penalties of the law are sufficient to restrain one removed, by a distance of possibly seventy coss,§ from the eye of the

* Lest it be thought that this practice is confined to one instance, I beg to observe that this is the most general of all the modes of illegal exactions practised in Rungpore. It has even, on one occasion, been recognized by the Collector of the district. Vide Appendix A.

† This forms part of the tract separated from Rungpore, on the adjustment of the boundary in 1798. Mr. Hatch's settlement did not extend to this estate

‡ The Puramanicks and Munduls are by far the most villainous of all concerned in these oppressions; for the Ryots are presumed to elect these officers out of their own body, for no other purpose than to have one to act, as circumstances may require, as their protector They often defray, out of the common purse, the expenses of this man, who is all along playing a double game, and actively employed in subverting, at the moment he is thought to be promoting, the rights of his electors.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

the judge, who is left to the unshackled control of the whole internal economy of his estate, and who is immediately supported in his oppressions by the irresistable phalanx of Police Darogah, Moonsif, Putwarree, and Puramanick, distress and sale laws, and a long purse, is, I fear, taking too favourable a view of the subject. For my own part, under the general inefficiency of the system, it seems to me clearly to be the interest of the tenant to bear with the oppressions of his landlord, as long as they may leave him wherewithal to drag on a comfortless and miserable existence; and when they shall exceed this pitch, tacitly to bear with the hardness of his fate, and seek for a temporary mitigation of his sufferings under a new master.*

32. I will not deny that the Ryots are, in their turn, often guilty of fraud; but fraud is a defence with which weakness will always endeavour to shelter itself against oppression, and with removal of the cause the effect will also cease. At present, it cannot be disputed that the Rungpore Ryots, many of them, have more land than what stands against them in the village register, and that it is a short-sighted anxiety to conceal this, in order to avoid a permanent increase of their legal rental, which gives the Zemindar so ample a field for the exercise of arbitrary exaction. The cultivator submits to a temporary imposition, however heavy, in preference to exposing the extent of his cultivation, whereby he would furnish the Zemindar with an ascertained basis on which to found a permanent increase of exaction. The intermediate agents of the Zemindar greedily avail themselves of this feeling, to enrich themselves at the expense of their employer; and the Ryot, after a vain struggle against tyranny, in the result finds himself far more impoverished, than if he had patiently given himself up a victim to the caprice of a single oppressor. Thus the present system of exaction is, in reality, as adverse to the true interests of the landlord, as it is destructive to the rights of the tenant, and both parties will be equally benefited by its subversion.

33. It is argued by many, that the native of Asia requires a stimulus of a peculiar nature to goad him to exertion: in him the order of human nature is reversed, and however great and manifest be the advantages which industry may hold out, such are his indolence and apathy, that under no circumstances will he exert himself, further than barely to keep himself and his family from starving. This sentiment has gained much ground of late, and the arguments it affords its advocates are, at the present moment, held forth as conclusive against the policy of bettering the condition of the poor. It is seriously maintained, that nothing short of state bankruptcy would follow any measures that might be adopted to restrain the landlord from exaction, and that the higher the industry of the tenant be taxed, the more he will exert himself, and by consequence, the better will be his condition. Will these theorists venture so far as to contend, that improvement thrives best under that state of things, by which the labourer tills in utter ignorance of the proportion which rapacity will allow him to reap? But, I should hope, the happiness or misery of millions does not depend upon mere speculation. Specific and determinate rights have long since been conferred on the peasantry by the most solemn enactments of the legislature; and I trust the question now is, not whether these rights are to be upheld or annihilated, but in what manner it may be possible to establish them on a substantial and practical basis.

34. In no district in the provinces will this prove so difficult to effect as in Rungpore; for in none are the poor more abject, and in none the rich more tyrannical. In other districts, the demands of the state have been always regulated, in a great measure, by the ascertained resources of the country. In Rungpore, these resources have never been ascertained: there the demand of Government has often been increased, on the mere conjecture of the country's ability to pay an enhanced revenue; and this has even been done, when a heavy balance of the lighter assessment of the last year has indicated that more had

* The Putwarries, who, as may naturally be expected from the mode of their appointment, are mere instruments in the hands of the Zemindar, will never give a receipt for any sums of illegal cess which they or their employers may have levied, so that documentary proof of such exaction is effectually evaded, and the Ryot invariably fails in establishing it before the court. A double set of accounts is at the same time kept by every Putwarry; and a fabricated rental, from which all entry of illegal cesses is carefully excluded, is produced to the judge, in proof of the falsehood of any complaint of exaction.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

had already been imposed than the established system of collection was competent to realize.* During these times, repeated orders and proclamations, special as well as general, had from year to year been passed, enjoining the abolition of the abwabs, and commanding the universal issue of regular and specific pottahs. Written engagements had also been exacted from the landholders to the same effect;† and all to no purpose, because the utter ignorance of the local authorities, as to the resources of the country, absolutely prevented their interposing their authority to enforce rates, of the operation of which they foresaw not the extent. The performance of these requisitions was, in consequence, left to the discretion of the party, whose obvious interest it was to disregard them, whilst the ignorance and abject state of the tenant afforded the landlord every opportunity to conceal from him the real nature of these orders, and even to persuade him that the change projected was fraught with danger to his dearest interests.‡

35. The principle on which the permanent settlement was formed (namely, that in "fixing the amount of the assessment, the jumma of the preceding "year, compared with accounts and information supplied by the Collectors, "and the recommendation of the Board founded thereon," should furnish the standard) was obviously calculated to perpetuate the mischief. "Minute exa-"minations, or new local investigations into the actual value of the lands," were discouraged by the Honourable Court of Directors; and though, in the orders of the 5th of February 1787, the Governor-General in Council informed the Board of Revenue that it was not meant thereby "to preclude local in-"vestigations, in order to obtain a knowledge of the actual resources of a "district, where a want of all good information or other circumstances might "render it expedient," yet the district of Rungpore, which fell so exactly under this exception, was unfortunately not exempted from the operation of the general principle. Thus, whilst the settlement of Dinagepore, the state of which district must have been precisely similar to that of Rungpore, was by the zeal, diligence, and abilities of Mr. Hatch, founded on the result of the minutest investigation into the state of the internal resources of every pergunnah, that of Rungpore was established on the uncertain criterion of preceding settlements, which had their basis in bare conjecture.||

36. The necessary consequence of this state of things has been, that in Rungpore the rights of the tenantry have always depended upon the will of the Zemindars; for when the legal dues receivable by the proprietor have never been ascertained, it is impossible to detect, much less to prevent exaction. With regard to the provisions of Regulation VIII, 1793, those rules, from their application, having been left entirely to the discretion of the Zemindar, cannot but have proved nugatory in a district labouring under the above disadvantages: accordingly, the rates of pottah established by such of the Zemindars as, after reiterated injunctions, did obey the requisition of the law, were regulated by the mere caprice of the individual; and the endless and arbitrary variety thus introduced, but added to the confusion which the plan was intended to remedy. In the Appendix G, I have inserted the correspondence held by the Collector with the Board of Revenue on the subject; and some idea may be formed of the inefficiency of the pottahdaree system as pursued in Rungpore, from the fact that, in less than ten years subsequent to the issue of the pottahs, neither the Collector, the judge, nor the register, could ascertain whether, in the form of decennial pottahs established by the Collector for general observance, the abwabs had been consolidated with the assul, or been left a separate item in the engagement.§

|| Mr. Hatch made a circuit of his district, thereby ascertained the real state of the country, entered upon the arduous duty of settling what was all confusion with unremitted perseverance, and thus perfected a settlement which will hand down his name in honour to after ages.

Mr. Purling yielded to the intricate confusion of the Mofussil economy of Rungpore, and thus entailed upon future generations the evils which it is now found so difficult to remedy. The Board finally applauded Mr. Purling's zeal, and recommended his services to the favourable consideration of Government.

Mr. Sisson's Report, 2d April 1815.

37. It is far easier to describe than to remedy these evils. The only effectual mode of attaining this importaint end in Rungpore will be, in the first place, to ascertain by a local investigation, to be superintended by a covenanted servant of ability and experience, the several varieties of rate and pottah throughout * the district, and the proportion which the illegal cess is made in the several estates to bear to the recorded rental; secondly to ascertain, by actual measurement, the extent of the cultivation in each pergunnah; thirdly, to reduce the qualities of land in each pergunnah to a certain number of classes, which may be readily distinguishable one from the other; fourthly, to ascertain the average gross produce of each class; and fifthly, to determine, reference being had to the present and former rates of rent, what proportion of the average produce shall, in each class, be retained by the Ryot, and what proportion, at a fixed money valuation, shall be received by the Zemindar.†

38. This is the principle on which the admirable settlement of Dinagepore was established by Mr. Hatch. That gentleman made but six distinctions in the quality of land throughout the district. These were, 1st pullee (first sort); 2d pullee (second sort); 3d kheear‡ (first sort); 4th kheear (second sort); 5th bhor, or lands liable to inundation; and 6th, lands waste previously to 1196, B. S. The rate of each of these sorts varied in different pergunnahs, the waste lands being in every case liable, after the third year, to the full pullee or kheear rate, according to their quality. In consequence of this methodical arrangement, attempts were made by the landlords to enhance the rent of the land of an inferior, to the rate of a higher quality, and differences as to the actual extent of a Ryot's tillage are, to this day, the only sources of dispute between landlord and tenant, in that part of Dinagepore which was settled by Mr. Hatch.§ The pergunnah rate can never be disputed when the quality is once

* If I could hope that this step would be sanctioned by Government, my anxiety that the plan might not fail through want of zeal and ability in the execution, would impel me to solicit that Mr. Fendal might be selected for this important duty.

† To provide against any future sensible reduction in the price of silver, a reservation might be made, that the present valuation of the crop should be liable, at the discretion of Government, to revisal at the expiration of every tenth or twentieth year, and in order to introduce this reservation, so as to avoid giving the Ryot suspicion that his lease conferred not a right of perpetual occupancy, the rate of rent ought to be specified in kind, in some such manner as this: " at the " yearly rent of two maunds of rice, valued at one rupee sicca." The terms of the reservation should also be expressly mentioned in the pottah; and should be accompanied with the proviso, that under no circumstances it should be competent to Government or to the proprietor, to raise the rate of the rent, beyond the current value of two maunds of rice per begah. Rice would appear to be the nearest measure of value in the province of Bengal; it should therefore be established as the measure of rent, even of land which might produce other crops. There can be no disputing the fact, that in many parts of the country considerable improvements have been introduced by the proprietors, by cutting water-courses and raising embankments; and when, as seldom happens, this may have been done at his own expense, the Zemindar ought, in justice, to enjoy an enhanced rent. But improvements of this kind are unknown in Rungpore; and where they may be made, the Zemindar might be rewarded by the enhancement of the rent of his land to the rate of the quality to which he may have improved it, a second reservation being inserted in the pottah to the effect that, " provided by cutting water-courses or raising embankments, the " Zemindar's exertions raise the capability of the land to that of a higher quality, it shall be com- " petent to the Government to direct a survey of the improvements, and to award payment of the " rent of the quality to which the lands may thus have been improved." But care must be taken, that the reward is not thus bestowed when it is not deserved. In most cases of such improvement, it will be found that they have been made at the expense of the unrewarded labour of the Ryots themselves, collected en masse for that purpose, and that projection of the improvement constitutes the sole merit of the Zemindars.

‡ The second, fourth, and fifth rates were introduced into but few mehals. In general, there were but two distinctions of quality, viz. pullee, or land yielding crops at every harvest; and kheear, or land which admitted but of one crop.

§ In 1798, a considerable portion of the tract settled by Mr. Hatch was separated from Dinagepore, and annexed to Rungpore and Rajeshahy. This change has been fatal to the rights of the cultivators; for since the annexation to Rungpore and Rajeshahy, Mr. Hatch's rates have been utterly disregarded by the Zemindars. In Dinagepore the system of rates is so generally known, that the proprietors left under the jurisdiction of that district have not, as yet, dared to alter the rates, though they often strive to evade them, by disputing the quality of the lands. Incalculable blessings would be conferred on a very numerous population, if the Judges of Rajeshahy and Rungpore were officially furnished with copies of Mr. Hatch's rates, and of the rules followed in the establishment of them, and if it were published for general information, that the rates established by Mr. Hatch were, in every instance, to be held inviolate, throughout the tracts comprehended within the limits of his settlement

In 1798, many annexations were also made to Dinagepore from Rungpore. In these tracts, the state of the Ryot is at present precisely what it has been described to be in Rungpore.

Mr. Sissons Report, 2d April 1815

once ascertained; and the several qualities, from their being defined by the broadest principles of distinction, such as the capability of the land to bear one or more crops, are readily determinable on judicial investigation.

39.* The extent of each cultivator's tillage, and the several qualities of his land, should be noted down as the survey proceeded, and each cultivator should be held entitled to receive a fixed pottah, in perpetuity, for the full extent of his lands at the established rates. The pottahs of every village should be numbered, and the particulars of each pottah be recorded in a numerical register to be kept by the Canongoe of the pergunnah. The land-measure should be reduced to one standard throughout the district; and to avoid fraud in the measurement of land, an iron chain, or one made of short bamboos linked together with iron rings, should be adopted for general use, instead of rope, which is apt to stretch or shrink according to the season of the year, or of a rod, in the use of which there are various opportunities of fraudulent measurement. The rate of standard should be promulgated for general information, and a counterpart of the established cubit, made of bamboo, should be furnished to each landholder, which should bear an impression of the court seal at both ends, as a mark of its being of the proper standard. The different rates of land should be defined by such distinguishing circumstances as might be readily ascertainable, and the performance of this important duty should be vested exclusively in the Superintendant, who might be directed to adopt the plan pursued by Mr. Hatch as his model. The measurement should, in the first instance, be made by Aumeens to be appointed, by the Superintendant; and it should be the duty of the village Putwarry and Mundul to report to the Canongoe all subsequent alterations as they might occur. A table of the rates established in each pergunnah should be hung up in a conspicuous part of the Moonsif's cutcherry, and in that of the Thanadar of the jurisdiction; and they should be regularly recorded, both in the Judge's and in the Collector's office. The Canongoe should be required to furnish the Collector with an attested copy of his register when completed, and to transmit to that officer, at the close of every year, a list of the mutations that may have taken place during that period.

40. The Putwarries should be appointed by the Zemindars, as heretofore; but to ensure impartiality of conduct in the execution of this responsible office, their appointment should require the confirmation of the villagers: neither should these officers be removable without the consent of both parties, except on the ground of misconduct, proved to the satisfaction of the Moonsif of the pergunnah. A Mundul should be appointed to every village, in order to superintend the conduct of the Putwarry on the part of the Ryots, and to assist that officer in the collection of the revenues. The Mundul should be elected by the majority of the villagers, and be removable at pleasure by the same authority. The office of Canongoe should be re-established, whose duty, as formerly, should be to record every particular relating to the tenures of land and the state of the cultivation. He should likewise be required to keep a register of the leading particular of every Ryot's pottah throughout his jurisdiction. He should superintend the conduct of the several village Putwarries and Munduls, keep a regular register of those officers, and report all instances of neglect, on their part, to inform him of any alteration that may take place in their several villages. The Canongoe's records should be regularly entered in strongly-bound books of durable paper, each leaf of which should be numbered and authenticated by any officer the Judge may nominate to that duty: in these records all vacancies and interlineations should be prohibited under pain of the severest penalties.

41. To assist the operation of the above, or any other system that may be adopted for the relief of the Ryot, it will be essential to add, as much as possible,

* The tenures on which land is cultivated in the tracts east of the Sunecoss and Burhumpooter, are not regulated by the extent of tillage. The rents, in that part of the district, are levied in some places at so much per plough, in others at so much per house. Illegal cesses even extend to these wilds; but the competition for cultivators generally screens the poor from oppression, in situations where land is always abandoned, when a few years of tillage has deprived it of luxuriant fertility. There is here no local attachment to assist the Zemindar in his exactions; the Ryot abandons his hut with indifference on the slightest provocation, and seeks a more indulgent master.

sible, to the respectability and efficiency of the Mofussil Commissioners. With this view, I would earnestly beg leave to recommend that none be eligible to these situations, but such as may have established a character for respectability, ability, and erudition, in the public seminaries, the studies of which institutions might be regulated, so as to render the students eminently qualified for judicial situations; that all vacancies in the office of Sudder Aumeen, Moonsif, native Commissioner, and Cazee, be henceforward supplied exclusively from the list of those who may be reported duly qualified by a committee of examiners, and that the appointment of these officers, on the report of the examiners, be vested in the Governor-General in Council; that all persons now holding these appointments, of whom vast numbers are, from various causes, totally unworthy of being continued in office, be subjected to the examination of committees to be formed for that purpose at the head station of each provincial court; and that all those who may be found disqualified for the office they hold be removed, and their places filled from the public seminaries, in the manner above noticed.

Neither the Zemindars, in this nor any other part of the country, will pay it from any stock of their own, but, as usual, levy it from the country, under the denomination of maugun or want; * and as a measure of finance adopted by the Government, it will then meet a ready and voluntary concurrence.† In well regulated zemindarries, even when maugun has been privately asked by the Zemindars, the Ryots understanding it as a necessity of the Zemindar's household, or requisition for services beneficial to the Zemindarry, it has been known to meet a ready and voluntary consent. If such supplies were readily furnished under the Mogul Government, when neither life, liberty, nor property were secure, it ought not to be supposed that, under the mildness and security of English protection and laws, when those blessings are sacredly preserved to them, as far as the English arm can reach, landholders will be less inclined to lend the same acquiescence.‡

Account of the Settlement of Rungpore, given in on demand of the Collector, by the Canongoe of Rungpore, previously to the Bengal year 1169.

The particulars of the jumma of Rungpore are not amongst the records of this office; but, so far as I have been able to learn the circumstances of the settlement before the accession of the Company, I shall here state them for your information.

In the Bengal year 1147, Cosseen Ulee Khan having given a tahood for rupees 3,36,000, came to this place, and that bundabust was continued without alteration till the end of 1164. In the year 1175,‡ Chelah Abid Oolsoobhan, who was Cossim Ulee Khan's servant, being discontented with his master, went to Moorshedabad, and told Meer Cossim that the district was capable of yielding an increase, for which reason Meer Cossim gave a tahood for an increase of one lack upon the former jumma, and having appointed Chekh Abid Ooltoobhan his naib, he sent him up to Rungpore, where he died five or six days after his arrival. The Nabob Meer Cossim having received account of the

The Ryots rose in 1783, on account of a cess of three annas in the rupee being imposed on them by Deby Singh, of famous memory, under the heads derivillah, battah, hoondewun, and kurtuny. On this occasiou they, with weapons in their hands, demanded, first, the abolition of the present derivillah; secondly, the re-establishment of the nurraiñy currency; thirdly, the abolition of kurtuny and hoendeean; fourthly, the deduction of the firary tax from the kistbundy. Neither did they lay aside their arms before they got all these demands unconditionally granted them.

the said Chekh's death, immediately set out for this place; and after his arrival having laid an increase upon the whole district, he took from Bhya Rampershad a tahood for ten lacks of rupees, and then returned to Moorshedabad. The revenue was not realized, and therefore Rampershad and his relations were imprisoned in the fort. In 1166, a decrease was granted on the former jumma, and Dewan Shamsoondur gave a tahood for the revenue, which continued under his management during the years 1166 and 1167.

In the year 1161, Dewan Bydnath und Meer Murdun Ulee arrived, and having laid an increase of a lack and odd thousand rupees, they again took a tahood for the amount from Dewan Shamsoondur; but from the revenue not being paid up, Meer Dour Buksh was appointed sijawul. This man deprived a great many Hindoos of their caste, and exercised the greatest severities in the collections, but was unable to realize the revenues.

In the end of the year 1168, or the beginning of 1169, in the month of Assur, a soobadar with near a hundred men came from Monghur, and having confined the Sijawul, Meer Dour Buksh, and the Umlee, he carried them on board a boat, together with Ramchund Roy, the Gomaster of Bhadee, &c. After that, in the year 1169, Dewan* Soba Chund gave a tahood for the same jumma, and began to make the collections; but, in the mean time, a numerous body of Ryots belonging to Carjuhaut rose into rebellion, and seized upon the Mofussil collections, report of which being sent to Monghur, a message came from them to the Ryots, informing them that if they did not return to their duty forces should be sent against them.

The son of Sobachund was accordingly sent with some forces, and used every mode to encourage them to return to their duty, but without effect, and the troops were at last under the necessity of engaging and putting a great many to death; after which the aforesaid Dewan was confined and carried to Monghur, for having failed in his payments. Some time after this, the Nabob, Meer Cossim Khan, fled from Monghur, and the Company got possession of the country. Cossim Ulee Khan, who was formerly at Rungpore, returned in the year 1170, on the part of Meer Jaffeer, and having granted large deductions, he made a settlement for rupees 6,17,262 : 15 : 8 : 3. (Vide Appendix F.)

APPENDIX D.

Extract from a translation of the general Amilnama given to the Zemindars of Rungpore, by Mr. Purling, in September 1777, as submitted to the Governor-General on the 30th of that month.

Article 11. You shall collect the malgoozary of the lands cultivated by the Ryots, assul and abwab, in the Mofussil, according to the rate of the pergunnah. You shall not exact any new heads of collections, and shall not demand mhatoot, maugun, &c.

Art. 12. Your shall carefully settle all waste and deserted lands; and to all such Ryots as are willing to rent these lands, you shall give pottahs at the proper seasons, and collect their rents agreeably to them. If any Ryots cultivate your lands without pottahs, you will demand from them only according to the rate of the pergunnah; nor are you permitted to force any of your Ryots to pay the deficiencies of others, nor to take the lands of such as run away.

Art. 13. You are to collect from your Ryots according to the last year and the year before, and according to the new pottahs you may grant Should it be proved that you have collected more, you will be made to return it, and be fined by Government; and if you repeat this oppression, your zemindarry will be forfeited and made khaus

Art. 14. Agreeably to the engagements you have entered into with Government, according to your harvests you will make your bundobust with the Ryots in the Mofussil, and collect your rents according to the harvests, and not put them to the expense of interest by demands out of the proper season.

Art. 16. You are not to exact from your Ryots any nuzzurs or salamies, nor sums on account of religious ceremonies, nor are you to give any.

Art. 17. Whatever money you advance to your Ryots, you will take a kistbundy for, after settling accounts in their presence, and collect them according to such kistbundy.

Art. 22. You shall give your Ryots regular receipts for the payments they make at each kist. At the end of the year you shall settle accounts and give them a rufu-nama or general discharge.

APPENDIX E.

Extracts from the Cabooleats of the Zemindars under the Collectorship of Rungpore, for the Bengal Year 1193.

I will exact no money from the Ryots on account of duree, mangun, interest, batta, &c., but will collect the revenue, and such other charges as have been allowed prior to and in the Bengal year 1191, independent of which I will make no other demand. I will not collect any moruncha (custom on marriage), layer chilunta (custom on grain, &c., carried over-land), goliah maugun (custom on boats &c.), which having been forbidden by the Company were expressly mentioned in the former settlements, and I will give the Ryots dakilahs for the money they pay to me.

I will accept of no presents from them on account of nuzzurs, or salary, or tuhwary.*

APPENDIX F.

Extracts of a Letter from Mr. McDowall to the Board of Revenue, 1787.

In the Bengal year 1177, a hustabood of these districts was made by Mr. Grose, and the revenue was collected according to the Moofussul settlement. Two subsequent hustaboods were also made, in 1183 and 1191; but it does not appear that they took effect in the formation of the settlements.

The Zemindars complain of the increase of 1191 and 1192, and acknowledge that taxes were imposed to enable them to pay it, but I am not acquainted with the particulars of them. An account of these taxes has been demanded from the Zemindars, and shall be transmitted to you with as little delay as possible.

It is more than probable that the lands of Rungpore have never been measured since the country first came into the possession of the kings of Hindostan; and the records of the district afford not the smallest information as to the quantity of land fit for cultivation, nor of the bazee-zumeen in the possession of individuals. For this reason, the Zemindars complained loudly of the increase of 1192, alleging that it was not laid on proper grounds ascertained from an examination of the Moofussul resources; and it was this circumstance which created so much difficulty to me at the time of making the present settlement, as represented in my cutcherry proceedings, accompanying my letters of the 11th June and 3d July last. It were to be wished, therefore, that a particular examination were made of the actual resources of the district, and the ensuing settlement formed upon a firm and permanent basis, unsubjected to the complaints which the Zemindars now make respecting the manner in which the increase of 1192 was levied upon them. This proposal I humbly beg leave to submit to your consideration. The examination once made, will ever be of singular use in defeating the claims of Zemindars for deductions. I have restored the Canongoes to the full possession of their functions in the Mofussul; and in the event of a new hustabood being made, I should cause them to keep regular Mofussul accounts of the annual increase and decrease in each village throughout the district, thereby preserving a constant stant check over the Zemindars, as well as ready means of affording redress in cases of oppression.

In the districts of Boda and Patagaon, a Ryot is permitted to cultivate as much ground as he chooses upon a large plain, for which he pays a fixed rent per annum, subject to no taxes whatever. If he happens to die or desert, his successor pays nothing more than the balance due from him, nor will he suffer the Zemindar to measure the ground. If a measurement is attempted, the ground remains unoccupied.

APPENDIX G.

Zillah Proceedings held by Mr. Purling, under date the 3d June 1790.

Took into consideration the form of a pottah to be adopted in the country, in every situation which would not set aside ancient custom or destroy the rights of the individual.

Several of the Zemindars and their Naibs being in attendance, they are informed of the orders of the Governor-General in Council, concerning the establishment of a pottah, and that they were required to attend, in order that such information might be obtained as to prevent any infringement of their rights or the customs of the country, and at the same time it was intended to render the accounts of the Ryot with his Zemindar perfectly easy and simple to be adjusted upon reference to the collector.

The Zemindars reply, that they do not think the form of a pottah universally to take place will be at all approved by the Ryots, who have in very few instances a fixed jumma, but they will give in a representation in writing on the subject.

They are now ordered by the Collector to prepare this memorial, and to bring a certain number of their most respectable Ryots from their several pergunnahs.

The Petition of the Zemindars of Rungpore, delivered to Mr. Purling on the 1st of Aghoon 1197, B. S.

We are directed, by a publication issued from the hoozoor, to fix the rents of assessment to be paid by the Ryots, including both assul and abwabs, and to grant pottahs at the beginning of the year, specifying the quantity of land and the amount-jumma to be paid by them.

The Ryots of this country objected to engaging for any certain quantity of land, and to the revenue being fixed, on account of its being contrary to the custom of the country, and the lands never having been measured according to rukbabundy, they paying revenue only according to the quantity of land actually cultivated by them, after deducting moojraee, or a certain part remitted to them as an engagement. The Ryots of this country are not fixed residents, nor is the jumma permanent. Scarce any of them are possessed of valuable property or houses; and if the settlement be not made with them according to the established custom of the country, they desert, and the revenue is detrimented.

This country being of a sandy soil, and the crops consequently not being always good, the Ryots cannot cultivate one piece of land more than two or three years together, after which they let it lie fallow, and cultivate the waste lands;* for which reasons, the amount of the jumma and the quantity of land in cultivation are yearly fluctuating.

We have now laid before you all the particulars concerning our several zemindarries, and the Ryots are forthcoming. If the bundobust be not concluded agreeably to the customs of the country, the collections will be endangered. You are the master of the country: be pleased to cause the bundobust to be concluded in such manner as to enable us to assess the jumma on the country and pay our revenues to Government.

Appendix to Mr Sisson's Report.

Extract of a Report to the Board of Revenue from Mr. John Lumsden, under date the 17th January 1792.

No general measurement having ever taken place, it will not, I conceive, without such previous step, be possible to furnish accounts of the lands so particular as is required. The same difficulties which are alleged to render a compliance with this regulation impossible to be carried into effect, are also stated to occur in many parts of the district to the general plan of granting pottahs to the Ryots, many of whom have absolutely refused to take them out.

Petition presented to Mr. Lumsden by the Zemindars, and submitted to the Board with the above.

It is required in the cabooleats that we shall annually prepare accounts of the jumma, and insert in it all the particulars both of the revenue and of the rent-free lands. There is no ruckbabundy measurement of the lands in this district, and we cannot therefore give any particular account of the lands. The different boundaries are ascertained from a knowledge of what we have always possessed. If the ancient custom was to be changed, and a rukbabundy measurement was to be made, the revenue would suffer; on this account we cannot give in any specific accounts of our lands.

A Letter from the Collector to John Rawlins, Esq. Secretary to the Board of Revenue, under date the 2d July 1793.

I have received your letter of the 12th ultimo, together with the form for the report for the distribution of pottahs enclosed, and I now have the honour to transmit to you my report, by which you will observe that a very considerable progress has been made in this business since I last addressed the Board on the subject.

I have received the form of the pottah recommended by the Acting President of the Board of Revenue; and had it been sent up sooner, there would have been no objection to have adopted it in the pergunnahs of Idrakpore, Looroopoor, and Putlada, where the lands are of the kind mentioned in it: but as the form recommended by the late Collector to the Zemindars is not much different, and as blank pottahs for the whole of the lands in the district have been prepared at a considerable cost, though in some places the Ryots have not taken them, it would be hard to make any alteration now, as it would put the landholders to much additional expense and trouble.

In the pergunnah of Putlada, the distribution of the pottahs, I understand, is not begun; I shall therefore recommend it to the Zemindars to adopt what the Acting President laid before the Board.

APPENDIX H.

Letter from Mr. A. Wright, the Collector, to J. Wordsworth, Esq. Judge of the Dewanny-Adawlut of Zillah Rungpore, under date the 14th April 1801.

I find it a duty incumbent upon me to submit a copy of a representation delivered in by the Zemindars of this district, and request to be informed as to the extent and nature of the proclamation issued, prohibiting the Ryots paying the charges of collection inserted in their pottahs.

If it be contended that the pottahs are not drawn out agreeably to the rules laid down by Section 54, Regulation VIII of 1798, A. D. I have to observe that only one form of an improved pottah has been in use since the formation of the decennial settlement, and which the landholders unanimously declare to have had the sanction of Mr. Lumsden, in whom both the offices of Judge and Collector were then vested.

In the form of pottah promiscuously taken and submitted, you will observe the quantity of land specified, viz. 12 doons, 13 kunnees; the assul jumma of which is stated at Rupees 11. 8. 8. 3, and the charges of collection surunjamy at Annas 13. 11. 1, making in all Sicca Rupees 12. 6.

If

If any revision of the form of pottah should appear to you requisite, I beg leave to suggest the expediency of a limited period for the issue of such amendment; which would be so far productive of general benefit to the inhabitants as to prevent any misconstruction of the orders, at the same time that it will afford the whole body of the Zemindars an opportunity of extricating themselves from the embarrassment which they at present labour under. The loss which the Zemindars are likely to sustain by the issue of the present orders prohibiting the Ryots paying khwichu, inserted in the body of the pottahs, may be, at a moderate computation, estimated at one lack of rupees.

Letter from the same to the same, under date 5th May 1801.

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, and to repeat the information communicated in my letters of the 14th and 16th ultimo, viz. the unanimous declaration of the landholders, that the form of pottah, copy of which was submitted to you, had the approbation of Mr. Lumsden, who then officiated in the capacity of Judge and Collector of the district, and which form of pottah, it is presumable, was destroyed by fire among the records of the office in 1797.

I have, pursuant to Section 7, Regulation IV, 1794, directed forms of pottahs to be drawn out, and shall, after signifying my approbation, transmit the same to be registered in the Adawlut.

Letter from Mr. Wordsworth, Judge of Rungpore, to Charles Buller, Esq. Secretary to the Board of Revenue, under date 7th May 1801.

Having received a letter from the Collector of this zillah, under date the 14th ultimo, enclosing a petition presented to him by the Zemindars, Talookdars, and other description of landholders in this district, which attributes a considerable loss of revenue to a perwannah issued on the 10th of December last, by the late Acting Judge of Rungpore, and the Zemindars having subsequently presented to me another petition of a similar tendency, I have, after mature consideration, deemed it expedient, for the more speedy realization of the public revenue, and to do away all manner of pretext on the part of the said landholders for withholding the same, to recal the said perwannah of the late Acting Judge, and issue another in conformity to the wishes of the landholders, of both which I beg leave to submit translations, marked Nos. 1 and 2, for the information of the Board of Revenue.

Immediately upon the receipt of the Collector's letter and Zemindars' petition (vide copy and translation, Nos. 3 and 4), I addressed the letter (No. 5) to Mr. Montgomery; and from the accompanying copy of his letter (No. 6) it will appear that he was induced to issue the perwunnah of the 20th December last, in consequence of the summary complaints which had about that time been presented to him, of unlimited moofussul kurchu being decreed by the Moonsifs against the Ryots, in direct violation of Sections 54, 58, and 60, of Regulation VIII, 1793.

As it appears, upon examination, that no regular forms of pottah, made out in strict conformity to the above section, have ever been approved by the Collector and promulgated in the district, it may perhaps appear somewhat extraordinary, that this circumstance should not have been formally noticed, either by me or my predecessor; but as no exception was ever made to the forms of pottah in any cause brought before me for an arrear of revenue, I naturally concluded that the whole had been drawn out, approved, and promulgated, agreeably to the existing orders of Government. It is within the last few months only, and in consequence of additional imposition, that the irregularity of the pottahs in general use has been noticed; and the form transmitted by the Collector of this zillah, with his letter of the 14th ultimo, and said to have been sanctioned by Mr. Lumsden, though by no means perfectly regular, appears to be the most unexceptionable in use in this district. But as none of them are perfectly consonant to the Regulations, except in the mehals separated from Dinagepore and annexed to this district, and many exhibit a variety of clauses which give to the landlord a wide-extended latitude for oppression and every species of undue exaction, I have deemed it my duty to take immediate notice of the same, and to call the Collector's attention to the sections contained in Regulation VIII, A. D. 1793, that a general revision of the whole

Appendix to Mr. Sisson's Report.

'whole of the pottahs throughout the district may be made, and new pottahs granted and promulgated, as directed in Regulation VIII, 1793, being, I humbly conceive, the only effectual means to secure to landlord and tenant, respectively, their just rights; and I trust my conduct on this occasion will be approved.

In the mean time, the perwannahs I have issued will preclude any excuse for the non-payment of the revenue, should it, as the Zemindar alleges, be withheld, in consequence of the one issued by Mr. Montgomery, but which there are strong grounds for suspecting is not absolutely the case, as it would appear that, in several talooks, the whole has been actually paid; and in other places, where regular pottahs are in use, the order for the non-payment of khurchu could not possibly have produced any bad effect.

Extract of a Letter from the Board of Revenue to the Collector of Rungpore, under date 19th May 1801.

The Board direct me to observe, that if the pottahs given in by the Zemindars be drawn out in the form mentioned in their petition, that is if the amount of the khurchu be specified and added to the amount of assul, as follows:

Assul	5	0
Khurchu	0	5

they do not see the smallest objection to such a pottah, it appearing to them to be strictly conformable to both the spirit and the letter of the Regulations in regard to pottahs.

The Board observing that the Judge has expressed a wish that a general revision of the pottahs should be made by you throughout the district under your charge, they direct me to observe that they are of opinion, that whether the pottahs be strictly proper or otherwise, at this late period you should not adopt a measure of so extensive an influence, without a previous reference to the Board, who, in a case of this kind, would deem it their duty to represent the circumstance for the orders of the Governor-General in Council. You will, accordingly, communicate this opinion to the Judge.

Bencoolen, April 2, 1815.

(Signed) THOMAS SISSON,
Late Joint-Magistrate of Rungpore.

REMARK.

The Vice-President in Council remarks, that the measures which have been recently adopted, with the view of obtaining accurate information on all those points which appear to be of primary importance to the protection of the peasantry from exactions, and to the permanent security of their legitimate rights and interests, preclude the necessity of any detailed remarks or orders on the subject so forcibly and so ably discussed by Mr. Sisson, in his report on the relative state of the landholder and tenant in the district of Rungpore.

At the same time, the Vice-President in Council remarks, that when the arrangements now in progress shall have been so far advanced, as to admit of the enactment of any specific provisions on the points above noticed, it will be desirable that Mr. Sisson's report should be again brought under consideration, with a view to the eventual adoption of any of the suggestions offered by him which may appear calculated to be of practical utility.

Secretary.

Letter from Lord Moira, 13 Jan. 1816.

Par. 1. By this opportunity I have the honour of transmitting to you the results of those observations which I was enabled to make during my late tour.

To

Letter from Lord Moira, 13 Jan. 1816.

To them I add some other necessary documents. The mass of these papers is such as I am almost ashamed to obtrude; yet I think you will not, on the perusal of them, be of opinion that I trespass unnecessarily on your time. It must be of importance to you to have the means of recurring to precise information respecting the various branches of your interests; and such an exposition of them could scarcely be made with a better chance of accuracy, than by one whose duty and whose pride concurred in urging him to be strenuous in those investigations, which he commanded the means of pursuing with superior advantage. I do not believe that I have gone into superfluous details. Howsoever desirous, I have been unable, on subjects of such magnitude, to compress more closely the numerous explanations which I conceived requisite for your satisfaction. At all events, I shall have proved to you that I have not been deficient in attention to any circumstance which may advance the prosperity of the Honourable Company, or indolent in reducing my observations into such form, as might best enable you to exercise a confident judgment.

2. I sincerely regret, that the labour of methodizing the notes, which I had originally minuted in a very unconnected manner, has, amid the many other avocations pressing on me since my return, delayed the completion of these reports so long, that there has not been time for their being circulated to the Members of the Council previously to their being dispatched. Anxious that you should receive them speedily, I am forced singly to usher them to you.

3. The documents are as follow :

Minute on the Judicial administration of this Presidency, dated the 2d October last, with copies of the reports from the several Judicial officers enumerated therein.

Minute on the Revenue administration of this Presidency, dated the 21st September last, with copies of the Reports from the several Revenue officers enumerated therein.

FROM the time of my departure from the Presidency, in the course of my passage through the several districts of the Lower Provinces which lay in my route, as well as during my whole tour through the Western Provinces, I have constantly turned my attention to the several subjects connected with the territorial revenue of this country. Your Honourable Board is aware of the instructions I issued to the several Collectors through whose zillahs I expected to pass, directing each to meet me as I approached the confines of his jurisdiction, and to bring a report of every thing connected with its actual state, as well as to be prepared to communicate any other information I might require.

2. The reports presented to me, in consequence of these instructions I have now the honour to lay before your Honourable Board.

3. The series for the Upper Provinces will be found to be complete; for as there were only the two districts of Bundlecund and Goruckpore which I had not visited, I subsequently called upon the Collectors of those zillahs to transmit reports, in order that the body of information I had collected, in illustration of the system of revenue administration adopted in these provinces, might not be defective from the want of them.

 4. I have

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

4. I have not thought it necessary to do the same in the Lower Provinces, because the information already possessed by Government respecting them is ample: neither are the circumstances of those districts in which the settlement has been declared perpetual, such as to excite so warm an interest in their favour; nor are the observations and inquiries I was enabled to make, while passing rapidly by water through them, sufficiently particular to justify my offering my sentiments respecting them with equal confidence. Those reports, however, which I did receive in several of the districts of the Lower Provinces, are sufficient to enable me to draw a comparison between the two divisions of our territorial possessions in this country, and to trace the points of analogy, or the discriminating features of the system pursued in each, as far as may be necessary for the purposes of general illustration.

5. The whole of these reports may, therefore, be considered to form a body of information in the highest degree valuable, as exhibiting the views and sentiments of ministerial officers of the Revenue branch of the service, besides containing many useful and important suggestions respecting the nature of the systems pursued, and their operation on the body of the people.

6. I had also the pleasure to receive from the Board of Commissioners for the Upper Provinces a most satisfactory report, accompanied by statements of the whole revenue of every description derived from the provinces under their charge as assessed and collected in each successive year from the time the country fell under our dominion. But this report, however valuable in itself, is the least of the obligations I am under to the members of the Board. I have seized the opportunity of consulting them, individually as well as collectively, on every occasion when I entertained doubt; and I gratefully feel how much instruction I owe to their extensive information, their liberal and enlarged views of policy, as well as their accurate and minute acquaintance with every branch and principle of our administration. I have, indeed, no hesitation to declare, that if I have been able to settle my opinions on many of the very intricate questions with which the science of revenue relative to this country is replete, it is entirely through their assistance, and in consequence of the advantage I derived from constant unreserved communication with them, that I have done so.

Advantages to Government from the Administration of the Board of Commissioners.

7. The report of the Board of Commissioners exhibits the very flattering picture of an increase of seventy-four lacks of rupees in the land revenue and abkarry receipts of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, beyond the amount realized in the first year of their falling under our dominion. Of this excess, no less a proportion than fifty-five lacks and a half has been added to the land revenue, between the years 1807-8 and 1813-14, or since the appointment of the present Board of Commissioners. A decrease has also been effected in the charges of collection, to the extent of fifteen lacks and a half, by the reduction of the tehsildarree establishments, a measure exclusively attributable to them. The advantage, therefore, derived by Government from their administration of the revenues of these provinces, is actually calculable at the amount of seventy-one lacks annually realized beyond what Government could have hoped to obtain by any other means. By another mode of calculation, the net revenue of these provinces is shown to have received an increase since the commencement of their management, to the extent of seventy-three lacks annually. I, however, beg to refer your Honourable Board to the report and statements themselves, which I have now the pleasure to lay before you, and have only been desirous of calling your particular attention to this important result in the first instance.

View of the Land Revenue of the Upper Provinces.

8. It appears that the present total jumma, or demand, on account of the land revenue of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces amounts to somewhat beyond two crore and eighty lacks; that this is collected at an annual charge of about eighteen lacks, or a little more than six per cent., including the expense of the establishment of the Board; that the balance, at the end of the year of collection, did not last year exceed eight lacks, or about three per cent.; and that that the whole is realized upon 3,37,40,598 recorded begahs of land in cultivation.

9. The reports received from the several Collectors of the districts in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces afford me the means of pursuing this statistical analysis of the land revenue still more minutely. I will therefore give a comparative view of the revenue of each district, as derived from these reports, or from information I procured from the records of the Board, when any of the particulars I required were wanting in the reports.

Cawnpore.

10. It appears that the district of Cawnpore is recorded as containing 3,439 villages and 29,46,315 kucha begahs, of which 17,68,745 are cultivated and 10,43,381 wholly unproductive. The Government demand is Rupees 27,36,297, which was realized last year, with only a balance of 14,355 Rupees, little more than one-half per cent.; so that, in this district, the assessment of Government would appear to be nearly one rupee eight annas per begah.

Bundlecund.

11. The district of Bundlecund is said to contain 21,18,991 kucha begahs in cultivation, which yield a revenue of Rupees 29,01,510, being at the rate, therefore, of about one rupee six annas per begah. There are also 8,94,387 begahs fit for cultivation. The revenue of this district is realized with a balance of less than one per cent.

Bareilly.

12. The district of Bareilly is stated to contain 44,58,380 kucha begahs of land in cultivation, assessed with a jumma of 22,66,280 Rupees, which was realised within a sum of 27,830. This gives an average of a trifle more than eight annas per begah. There are in this district 33,62,022 begahs of land fit for cultivation, but not in actual tillage, and 35,58,899 entirely waste.

Shajehanpore.

13. The district of Shajehanpore is stated to contain 38,56,187 kucha begahs in cultivation, and to be assessed with a jumma of 16,24,235 Rupees, affording the average rate of something less than seven annas per begah. It contains further 29,07,430 begahs fit for cultivation, and 40,10,411 entirely waste. The revenue of this district was also realized last year with a balance less than one per cent.

Seharunpore.

14. The district of Seharunpore contains 18,79,998 begahs of land in cultivation, assessed at Rupees 25,79,817, which was realized to within the sum of 26,092 Rupees. The assessment is therefore at the rate of one rupee six annas per begah. The waste lands are said to amount to 24,44,317, and those cultivable but neglected to 21,34,705.* The begah, in this instance, is the pucka begah, equal to three kucha.

Moradabad.

15. The district of Moradabad is said to contain 8,263 villages, and 17,10,443 kucha begahs in cultivation, assessed at Rupees 25,46,417, or one rupee twelve annas per begah, which was collected with a balance of only Rupees 40,564. There are 20,93,437 begahs of land fit for cultivation (in three descriptions, Chunchur 44,055, Bungur 13,17,638, Dhaka and Jungul 7,31,754), 7,27,860 entirely waste, and 11,95,641 rent-free.

Agra.

16. The district of Agra is said to contain 12,22,667 begahs in cultivation, assessed at 14,25,802 Rupees, or one rupee two annas and nine pice per begah, 3,30,807 begahs fit for cultivation, and 9,02,740 entirely waste. The calamities of three successive seasons had occasioned a balance in the district of 1,20,326 Rupees.

Etawah.

17. The district of Etawah is said to contain 44,41,788 begahs in cultivation, assessed at 30,62,068 Rupees, which was realized to within two and a quarter per cent. The average per begah would thus appear to be about twelve annas. The

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

The number of villages in this district is 3,813; the quantity of land fit for cultivation 5,75,564, and of waste 17,81,564.

Allyghur.

18. The district of Allyghur is said to contain 16,40,242 pucka begahs in cultivation, assessed at 31,49,809 Rupees, or one rupee fifteen annas per begah. It is remarked, however, that the Talooks of Dia Ram and others are not included in the above ruckba, no particulars respecting them being known. There are in the district 11,47,045 begahs fit for cultivation, and 11,88,665 waste. The balance at the close of the year 1221 fusly amounted to Rupees 3,03,354.

Goruckpore.

19. Goruckpore is divided into two distinct portions by the Gogra, the Southern Azimghur* and the Northern Goruckpore Proper. These may be considered separately. Azimghur appears to contain 3,50,190 begahs in cultivation, assessed at 9,54,135 Rupees; about two rupees twelve annas per begah. The number of begahs fit for cultivation is 2,63,003, and waste 12,91,772. Goruckpore Proper contains 3,63,872 begahs in cultivation, assessed at 7,92,205 Rupees, or two rupees three annas per begah; 7,68,272 begahs fit for cultivation, and waste 5,69,986. The begah here is, of course, the pucka begah. In the collections of this district, a balance had accrued in the last year of upwards of two lacks, owing to the incomplete state of the new settlement.

Allahabad.

20. Allahabad was found, at the last settlement, to contain 16,55,106 begahs in cultivation, assessed at 27,93,244 Rupees, or one rupee eleven annas per begah, which was realised to within a trifle of three annas and a half per cent. The number of begahs fit for cultivation was found to be 3,95,012, and waste 11,09,777. The Collector of this district has stated the settlement to have been made with 1811 engaging proprietors, and sixty-four farmers.

Furruckabad.

21. Furruckabad contains 18,05,383 begahs in cultivation, assessed at 10,28,485 Rupees, which was realized to within three rupees two annas per cent. The rate of assessment per begah would appear to be nine annas. There are 2,97,350 begahs fit for cultivation, and 10,46,704 waste.

22. The above is a compendious view of the state of the land revenue in the several districts of the Ceded and Conquered Provinces at the close of the fusly year 1221, or official year 1813-14. I have not the materials, nor indeed is it necessary, to pursue the analysis through the several districts within the circle of the perpetual settlement. The Collectors of Kishennagur, Behar, and Sarun alone have furnished me with the extent of Khalsa land recorded in the quinquennial registers of their respective districts: on comparing these with the jumma of each zillah, it would appear that the rate per begah in Nuddea is six annas and a half, in Behar five and a half, in Sarun eleven and a half.

Benares.

23. With respect to Benares, I have only to observe, in this place, that notwithstanding the advantages which might be supposed to have attended the perpetuity of its settlement, the land revenue of that district appears to fluctuate in its amount without improving, and was the last year near half a lack below the rate assessed originally by Mr. Duncan. The causes of this may be stated generally to be the necessity of occasional remission in cases of over-assessment, or where land has been injured, while the corresponding increase of under-rated assessments was impracticable, together with the law which requires that, in cases of lapsed farms, proprietors shall be admitted at the original Tushkhees jumma, by which increase even in these cases is prevented. The assessment or demand of Government stands at present at 44,68,497 Rupees, which is not realised without a heavy arrear approaching to nearly five per cent. This is, however, always ultimately recovered, just in time to stop the actual sale of the estates of the defaulters.

Inaccuracy

Inaccuracy of the Record of the Extent of Land deduced from the above View.

24. In the above view of the land revenue of the Upper Provinces, what will most probably first strike your Honourable Board is the very great variety in the rate of assessment per begah exhibited by the records of each zillah. The rate in Shajehanpore and Bareilly is seven and eight annas, while that of Moradabad (the remaining zillah of Rohilcund) for the begah of the same description is one rupee twelve annas. This very great variation is the more extraordinary, as it is not to be traced to any difference of fertility in the respective districts, nor generally to any difference in the dimensions of the begahs; besides that there is no reason to believe that the high or low rate of assessment per begah has any operation in producing an accumulation of arrears, or promoting the facility of realization.* Indeed, with the exception of the districts of Goruckpore and Agra, where the existing arrears are clearly traceable to other causes, there are grounds for the remark, that the amount assessed is realized with comparative punctuality in those zillahs in particular, where the rate of assessment would appear the highest.

25. The only inference, therefore, deducible from this variety of rate is, that the rukbas, or statements of the Canongoes and Putwarries, from which the record of the extent is formed, are manifestly erroneous; and that if a proprietor can venture to engage for so high a rate per begah as the records frequently exhibit, it is only from the knowledge that he has other lands unknown to the assessor, from the proceeds of which, united with those recorded, he has the means of raising the amount of jumma beyond the necessary returns of his capital and labour.

26. The assessment is fixed, therefore, upon his total receipts, without reference to the extent of land supposed to be assessed; and considering that it is a tax on produce, and not on land, there certainly can be no reason why it should not be so. The question, however, with Government is, in what way the total amount of produce can best be ascertained? And I think it may be satisfactorily shown, that a knowledge, by measurement or survey, of the whole extent of land, is the only secure ground on which an estimate of the average produce can be formed, and consequently the only criterion of assessments which Government can reckon upon in general practice.

Necessity of Surveys as a Criterion of Assessments, advanced.

27. With a view to illustrate this, it will be necessary to explain shortly the nature of our settlements, and the mode of their formation.

The Nature of the Right of Government, and the Modes of its Realization, explained.

28. The right of Government is to a certain proportion of the produce of every cultivated begah. Such has been the recognized right of the ruling power in this country from time immemorial,† and has descended to us entire and unimpaired. The mode of realizing it with most advantage is a question which has often been discussed by Government, though even to this day it remains undecided.

29. The modes which seemed to present themselves for its choice may be generalized into the following.

The Government might collect annually from the actual cultivators on an annual estimate of the actual produce,

Or the Government might realize its rights through the intervention of middle men, whom it might bind by special engagements, of such a nature as might be deemed most proper and secure.

Ryotwarry Settlements, why impracticable.

30. The first is the system of Ukbur. It is the ryotwarry system pursued by Colonel Munro at Madras, as lately explained and recommended to us by the Honourable

* On the contrary, the Bareilly portion of Rohilcund is more fertile and better watered than Moradabad. The whole centre of the latter district is comparatively unproductive land. The fluctuation of rate per begah between individual contiguous estates is yet greater.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

Honourable the Court of Directors; and it has had its trial at this presidency also, being, from what I have been able to collect, the system pursued in several parts of the assigned territory in the neighbourhood of Delhi, as well as in cases where land was held in khas management by the several Collectors of the Upper Provinces.

31. A system of this description, however, requires for its adequate execution a minuteness of inspection and of detail; superintendence by no means suited to the present scale of our European agency. The nature of our establishments has required the division of the country into jurisdictions of so large an extent, and has induced so rapid a succession of officers, that it is impossible for a Collector to obtain a sufficient acquaintance, either with the land or with the cultivators, to pursue a system which brings him into dealings with a whole population.

32. A ryotwar settlement could not be made without a personal acquaintance with each individual cultivator, and at least a view-estimate (or as it is technically called, nuzurandaz) of the land once a year, if not at every sowing season. Neither could it be realized without an estimate of the produce of every harvest; for the crop, as it stands on the ground, is the only security of Government, and it must be watched in its growth and as its ripens, that Government may not be defrauded of its share.

33. It is obviously impossible for the Collector to do this in person, except in his own immediate neighbourhood; so that a swarm of subordinate native agents would have to be entertained, to whom a power must be delegated, over which the Collector's general control would be quite inadequate for the prevention of abuses.

34. Experience has shown, that the principles of no class of natives are proof against the temptations of a situation giving any concern with land or with the land-revenue. Indeed, though every mode and every scale of remuneration have been tried, still has it been found that even Tehsildars are not to be trusted. A system, therefore, involving the necessity of maintaining so large a body of native ministerial officers, would be oppressive to the body of the people in its execution, besides being, on other grounds, highly objectionable.

35. It is, however, unnecessary to enter further into the detail of this argument; for I think it may safely be assumed as absolutely impracticable for us to pursue any system with effect, of which the principle is that Government should, by its ministerial officers, have annual dealings with each individual cultivator, and demand from each the share of the produce of his capital and labour, whether in kind or valued as it stands. It is equally impracticable for Government to bind each individual Ryot by fixed engagements for a period. Indeed, experience has shown that they would not be willing to enter into such, insomuch that even the Zemindars of Bengal have failed in introducing such a system, though prescribed by the legislature.

Fixed Settlements by Engagement necessary.

36. It only remained, therefore, for our Government to adopt the other alternative, and simplify as well as secure the realization of its right, by the introduction of a class of middle men, each of whom might be answerable, in person and property, for its realization over a certain extent.

37. But the middle men who presented themselves were also of several classes; besides that, the engagements which Government might enter into with them admitted of variety in the length of period for which they might be granted.

Their several kinds.

38. Government might admit middle men of the description of temporary farmers, the class approaching nearest to its own ministerial officers; for the Tehsildars, when paid by a commission of ten per cent. on the jumma, and answerable for all arrears, were, as will be hereafter more fully explained, farmers in every thing except in name. This is the system of Kasim Ulee Khan; and though admitted to be of all the most pernicious, is still adopted in many cases where estates fall on the hands of Government from the want of bidders at at a sale, the recusance of proprietors, or any other causes. These farms are generally for a limited period, when they are called meeadec ijarahs; but should they happen to be for the life of the farmer, or in perpetuity, they are then called istumrars and talooks.

39. Government might admit an hereditary class of middle men, of the description of Pergunnah Zemindars, as has been done in Bengal, where this class was previously in existence in many places, and where many farms also had, from prescription and the long oversight of Government, acquired the stability of this description of tenure.

40. Our Government might, with a view to preserve the rights of the existing cultivating Zemindars, admit the intervention of one or more of this body as their representative or Mokuddum, and suffer him to engage for the whole of a village, leaving the settlement of the shares of each individual cultivator to be adjusted in detail amongst themselves, with an appeal to the arbitration of the civil courts. This is the system which the present Board of Commissioners have every where sought to introduce, and their success in which is, no doubt, one of the greatest blessings to the body of the people attendant on their management.

41. But since the agency of contracting with middle men of one class or other was assumed, and found by experience to be indispensable, the question recurred, by what criterion, under this system, was the amount demandable from each engager to be regulated?

Criterion by which fixed Settlements should be formed illustrated by Reference to what has occurred.

42. Under the ryotwarry, which is the primitive form of settlement, the crops as they stand on the ground are valued, and the share of Government regulated accordingly. The impossibility, however, of referring to this standard in general practice, induced the introduction of the middle men, with whom an assessment is to be made by previous adjustment on the average rate of produce. The Government compounds for the share which is its right, in a certain money payment supposed to be fixed on equitable principles, as a fair equivalent for what it might have expected to realize from a valuation of the actual produce. The rate is, of course, an average, having no reference to any particular year; so that the profits of a favourable season and the losses of a bad one fall upon the contractor.

43. This is the spirit in which all settlements that are made by contract or engagement must necessarily be fixed. I have made particular inquiries, with the view to ascertain the mode in which the rate is usually regulated in the settlements of the Upper Provinces, and the checks which exist against imposition on the Government or oppression on the landholder.

44. Had the introduction of the middle men immediately succeeded the practice of levying a share of the actual produce from off the ground, there can be no doubt that a recurrence to the actual receipts, under the existence of that practice, would have formed the best criterion of the rate at which it would be to the advantage of Government to accept an offer: but this has not been the case. This system was never generally adopted; and where partially introduced from necessity, was never pursued in such a manner as to inspire any confidence in the results it afforded.

45. When the country fell under our Government, we found no uniformity of system in any part of it. Every description of middle men and every kind of opposing interest was in existence. We had to form our first settlements merely from the record of what had before been received, as kept by officers notoriously corrupt; neither could we at the first do without the agency of similar officers.

46. The same heterogeneous mass of engagers was, therefore, necessarily continued (indeed it still continues in a manner); and the same tehsildaree agency which had so long been in the practice of defrauding the former Governments was employed as the medium of communication between Government and the engagers, with no other modification than that, instead of contracting tracting as the former Government did with the Aumils for a certain extent of country at a certain gross sum, and leaving them to remunerate themselves in the appointment of the mofussil settlements, these settlements were adjusted, in the first instance; between Government and the engagers, and the realization of the aggregate amount was contracted for by the Tehsildar, at a specific remuneration of ten per cent.

47. This modification, and a more strict control than former Governments had been in the habit of exercising, produced a considerable excess of revenue beyond what former Governments had realized. There is reason, however, to believe that the formation of such mofussil settlements was originally left, in too many instances, to the Tehsildars, and that it was not until the abolition of this contract agency that settlements began to be made generally by the European officers of Government in person.

48. The first general attempt that was made to form a settlement, by means of the Collectors in person, on a knowledge of the actual assets, may therefore be dated from the year 1807-8.

49. There was a difficulty, however, of obtaining materials to be trusted. The Canongoe-offices were restored on the part of Government, and it was expected that the information these would afford, combined with the mofussil accounts of the Putwarries, to which they formed a check, would be sufficient materials for an accurate and equitable settlement.

50. They are the only regular materials possessed at the present day; but as the Putwarries are the servants of the Zemindar, and not in the interest of Government, while the old records of the Canongoes' offices were found in a most confused and mutilated state, no confidence can be placed in the authenticity or correctness of either.

51. A Collector, however, about to assess a pergunnah, procures first from the Canongoe a general rukba of its extent, and a doul, or estimate of its average produce. He is convinced that these are not to be relied upon; indeed the materials on which they are formed are not sufficiently known to him: he accordingly looks out for such other information as may be within his reach, and as no village is without a spirit of party and opposing interests, khyrkhahie information, anonymous and otherwise, is always obtained without difficulty. The Putwarry accounts of each village are then called for from the Zemindar; but as it is evidently his interest to withhold the true accounts, those produced cannot be expected to be authentic: indeed, every item of information is contradictory, and nothing but the names of a number of villages are known for certain.

52. After determining with whom the Government is to engage (a question frequently of the utmost nicety) the Collector considers the former assessment of the village, compares it with all the information he has received, and having endeavoured to form an estimate of its capability, offers it to the proprietor at the rate of assessment he conceives it capable of yielding. The proprietor denies the extent of capability, when the Collector threatens measurement, the dread of an exposition of the real state from which will generally induce an acceptance of the offer. Sometimes, indeed, the threat of seeking another, who will contract on the terms proposed, either as a farmer, or from among the joint proprietors, may be superadded to the threat of measurement, and contribute with it to the acceptance of the offer. But the measurement is the most legitimate check the Collector can exercise; and so long as it is only the dread of this which operates as an inducement to accept, there can be no fear that the rate proposed is beyond the capability of the village: on the contrary, the proved efficacy of the threat affords the clearest inference, that the real extent and produce of the village is still unknown, and that Government has not its full legitimate right.

Surveys shewn to be the only true Criterion.

53. Should, however, the Collector have over-rated the capability, the proprietor is the party who will solicit measurement. Indeed, this is the only criterion to which they can both resort with confidence in their dealings one with another.

54. It

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sep. 1815.

54. It is to be regretted, however, that the shortness of the period for which settlements are made, and the consequent haste the Collector is in to complete them, render him averse to the adoption of a mode of assessment attended with much trouble and delay, and prevent him from having more frequent recourse to measurements. But it must be obvious to every one, that until the Collectors may be afforded the means of recurring more frequently and readily to this criterion, by the preparation of an accurate record of the extent of every pergunnah, taken from actual measurement or survey, there can be no security that the assessment is at the rate intended, or that land is not withheld from the rent-roll of Government.

Nature of Surveys.

55 I do not mean that a survey should take place, of so minute a nature as that it should exhibit the cultivation and name of the occupant of every begah of land; for I am aware that a survey, including such particulars, could not be completed within a very long period. But pergunnah surveys, exhibiting the area and general view of the cultivation, might be prepared with comparative facility; and they would be amply sufficient to check the rukbas and village accouhts, by placing in the hands of the Collectors a general outline, which he possesses the means of filling up, after slight inquiry and inspection, when he may conceive himself imposed upon.

56. I am aware that it is maintained by many, and particularly in a report of Mr. Newnham upon the system of village accounts, to which I shall hereafter have occasion to call the attention of your Honourable Board, that those accounts would, of themselves, be a sufficient criterion of the capability of the land, if only proper pains were taken to secure the production of the authentic ones.

57. Admitting, what is in itself questionable, that fabricated accounts are always distinguishable from the true, a knowledge of the actual extent of each pergunnah must still be the only means of determining with confidence, whether those accounts include every portion of land within its limits. The accounts may be correct for each village named, as far as the lands of it may be there entered; but there may yet be much land in toufer or excess, beyond the recorded limits, which though equally in cultivation remains unnoticed in the accounts.

58. That this is the case everywhere, appears to be the universal opinion; and the daily discovery, even of whole villages unknown to the records, is the best evidence of the advantage which would attend pergunnah surveys.

59. The quantity of toufer land which might, by this means, be expected to be recovered to the khalsa or rent-roll of Government, is incalculable. Let only a comparison be made of the recorded extent of every zillah with the extent yielded by a calculation of the area from an accurate map, and the difference will be found surprizing.

60. A survey of a part of Goruckpore, which has lately been made by Lieutenant Blake, for military purposes, affords me the means of making such a comparison of one pergunnah in that district. I understand it is one of the best cultivated in the province, and that there is not a single begah in it unappropriated. The pergunnah of Nujeemabad is recorded in the offices of Revenue as containing 3,12,179 begahs in all: the trigonometrical survey yields an area of 5,19,230 begahs, of 1,600 square yards to the begah. Until, therefore, we may have information that may be relied on of the actual state of every pergunnah, I cannot think, were there no other objection, we should be justified in recommending that our settlements should be fixed in perpetuity, on an assumption that the grounds of them are perfect.

61. The high importance, and indeed necessity of pergunnah surveys, has, I understand, been frequently urged by the Board of Commissioners, and their suggestions have met the general concurrence of this Government. The measure has not, however, yet been adopted, from the want of a sufficient number of professional men. Ensign Gerard, it is true, was last year appointed to survey the district of Seharunpore; but as he could not be spared from his military military duties, in consequence of his corps being sent on actual service, even this partial commencement has not yet been carried into effect.

62. The importance of having these surveys executed, prior to taking any steps with a view to render our present settlements perpetual, will naturally suggest itself to your Honourable Board. Where settlements are only for a period, the discovery of toufer land is comparatively easy, and when discovered it is at once assessed. But the difficulty which appears to have been felt in Benares and in Nuddea, as stated by the Collectors of these districts respectively, of discovering the toufer in the first instance, of fixing its limits afterwards, and ultimately of bringing it under assessment, should warn us of the imprudence of declaring the settlement as it stands perpetual, in the vain hope that toufer land, subsequently found to exist, may with ease be added to the khalsa hereafter. Indeed, if further arguments in support of this position were necessary, they might be found in the obstacles which have been experienced, with regard to the attempted resumption and assessment of the lands lately brought into cultivation in the Sunderbunds, though notoriously toufer, and in the feeling of fruitless regret with which we discover the actual extent of estates in every district of the Lower Provinces, compared with the records of the quinquennial register, whenever a division happens to impose the necessity of a measurement.

Expediency of Survey further deduced from the Consequences of disallowing the perpetual Settlement.

63. My opinion, that it would be injudicious to declare any settlement perpetual, for the correctness of which we may not have the security of such surveys, has been strengthened greatly by the inquiries I have made respecting the settlements which it was before proposed to declare perpetual in these provinces.

64. The settlement of Bareilly, made subsequently to that proposed to be rendered permanent, has yielded an increase of six lacks of rupees: in Moradabad an increase of four lacks is confidently anticipated by the Collector. It is to be remarked, indeed, that of those districts upwards of half were in farm at the expiration of the leases, although the settlements with proprietors had been declared perpetual. In Etawah, also, where an increase of about three lacks has been effected, it has been occasioned chiefly by the subdivision of several large talooks, the holders of which could only have been considered as proprietors entitled to a permanent jumma under the system of Bengal. In all these districts, however, there is no doubt that each re-settlement has afforded the means of detecting errors, and of equalizing and giving system to the assessments without incurring loss, although no great addition may have been obtained.

65. In Cawnpore a decrease of about 20,000 rupees was experienced: but this decrease would have been much greater, from remissions and irrecoverable balances, had the permanency been allowed; for in this district, especially, much toufer land was recovered to Government on the occasion of re-settlement, and the further discovery of it is daily taking place. In Goruckpore, also, a decrease is anticipated; yet the disallowance of the permanency will have obviated in this district a still greater decrease, if the re-settlement had been confined to those lands only, the proprietors of which might not have chosen to continue at the present jumma.* In Allahabad and Furruckabad a clear increase has been obtained, which would have been lost had the former settlement continued.

66. Throughout the several districts of the Conquered Provinces, also, though the re-settlement has not yet been commenced, an increase appears to be anticipated, except in Agra and Allighur, where peculiar circumstances exist to interrupt the expectation.

Increase of Revenue not solely attributed to improvement of Land.

67. I cannot find that the increase realized or expected is altogether attributable to the progression of improvement; but, on the contrary, I rather am inclined to think it has arisen chiefly from the circumstance, that the former settlement settlement was made with an imperfect knowledge of the assets, and from the increased experience of a lengthened administration, which must have contributed to the discovery of many of its defects, and have afforded the ability of removing them.

* Goruckpore proper cannot be ready for permanency in less than half a century.

68. The presumed inaccuracy of all the ruckbas, from which the records of the extent of land in cultivation are drawn up, leaves me without the means of declaring, with any confidence, to what extent cultivation has extended since that period. The general opinion certainly is, that it has extended greatly; and what I have witnessed leads me to think the belief well founded. The Collector of Bundlecund, indeed, reports the extent of land in cultivation, at the present time, to exceed in a ratio considerably beyond one-third the extent in cultivation in the year 1807-8: but he acknowledges he has no reason to believe the statements of either period accurate; and the excess arises possibly as much from toufer land, since discovered and annexed, as from waste since cultivated.

69. Improvement, however, if it has been progressive, will still continue to be so; nor is it at all dependant on the permanency of our settlements. On the contrary, a system of periodical assessment, administered with cautious moderation and with the constant object of equalizing its operation and relieving partial hardship, must offer encouragements to improvement equal to those of perpetuity. It is not from the anxiety, however equitable, of participating in the profits of this improvement, so much as from the desire of recovering what Government may be supposed to be defrauded of by present concealment, that I advance the opinion of its being injudicious to make our present settlements fixed and unalterable for ever, without some further security for their correctness.

Russudee Jummas discussed.

70. I had entertained the idea, that cultivation must have been advancing in the Upper Provinces, with a rapidity of progression which it might be to our advantage to meet, by concluding settlements with a russudee jumma, increasing proportionably each year of the term. The inquiries, however, I have been able to make, have satisfied me of the delusive nature of such a measure, and of the inexpediency of a general resort to it. If an estate already entirely in cultivation be assessed in the first year at the full rate of its produce, no increase of industry would be secure of adding to that produce; so that, it is to be feared, the progressive russud, instead of acting as a stimulus to further exertion, would afford the disheartening prospect of an assessment the cultivator knows not how to provide for. Heavy arrears, the ruin of the proprietor, and perhaps his absconding, would be the inevitable consequence.

71. Judging, indeed, from an account of the several settlements of this kind I obtained from the Board of Commissioners, it appeared that such had been the practical result of the measure, whenever the russud had been added beyond the full rate of assessment the land could afford in the first instance. Whenever, on the contrary, the russud assumed the shape of a remission or forbearance in the first year of settlement, below what could be considered as the ordinary produce of the land (a mode of encouragement frequently adopted, in order to assist proprietors in recovering from the effects of temporary calamity, or in cases of land recently and imperfectly cultivated), the measure was attended with every advantage, and the annual excess appeared to have been punctually realized I am fully convinced, that it is only in these cases that it would be expedient to deviate from the established mode of forming the assessment on the existing amount of produce at a fixed and even rate each year, and that it would be attended with the worst consequences, to calculate as an available asset or source of revenue, the profits of an improvement speculative and remote.

Periods of Settlement discussed.

72. With respect to the periods for which the settlements of the Upper Provinces have usually been concluded, I must confess I do not believe them of sufficient duration to give fair play to the system pursued. In this also, I am supported by the general opinion of the Revenue authorities whom I have consulted, so that I have the less hesitation in recording my sentiments on the subject.

73. Three

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sep. 1815.

73. Three, four, or even five years, may rather be considered as the period which it is necessary to employ in the formation of a settlement, than as affording the means of judging from its operation whether it be a good one. Indeed, under the practice of adopting such periods, I am confident it must frequently have happened that the rate of assessment of a village has been fixed for the term of one settlement only, at the very eve of its expiration;* so that, instead of having any prospective operation, it has been, in cases of increase, an exaction of past profits presumed to have been withheld, and for which there is no security that they have not been long since otherwise appropriated.. The settlement, therefore, will have ceased to be a contract or engagement, and have become a demand for an old debt, then only known to have been contracted.

74. The superior advantages, however, of lengthened periods on general principles, need no exposition from me. Your Honourable Board is already fully aware of them; and I have only alluded to the subject, in order to suggest for your consideration, whether it would not be advisable that application should be made to the Honourable the Court of Directors for leave to extend the period of five years, fixed by the Honourable Court for the ensuing settlement, to the longer term of nine years. Three years of this period have, indeed, already expired in the Ceded Provinces, and in many districts the settlements are still only in formation.

75. I am satisfied, also, that no advantage could be derived from reckoning the period prospectively from the year of the actual settlement of each pergunnah or village, and that it is perfectly useless to introduce a fiction, and suppose the new assessment to have had operation everywhere from a given date, merely because, from that day, it began to be adjusted somewhere.

76. It is desirable that a Collector should be frequently employed in the business of settlement; for nothing is more calculated to enlarge his views and extend his general information, than this particular branch of his duty. But when the settlement of a whole zillah is at once thrown upon his hands, in a manner requiring speedy accomplishment, the sense that the utmost individual exertion on his part would scarcely be adequate to effect it as he would wish, must necessarily operate in inducing, if not personal remission, at least an extended employment and reliance on native ministerial agency. Were the settlements to be made by pergunnahs, according as the period of each should successively expire, the Collector would have the advantage of the means of a personal superintendence of them all; and as there would be no such hurry for their completion, they would, no doubt, be made on better information, and after more particular inquiry.

Effects of our Revenue System on the Body of the People.

77. I have hitherto considered the Revenue system adopted, and the mode of its administration, in the several lights in which the Government were most concerned. I have sought to define the way in which the rents might be realized with the most effect, and settled with most advantage. There is, however, another point of view, in which the system requires to be contemplated, and that is in its operation on the body of the people.

78. I have before described, generally, the class of people with whom the settlement in these provinces has usually been concluded. The Board of Commissioners have sought to uphold the village Zemindars; and in the Upper Provinces, as well as in Behar and Benares, no doubt can be entertained that these have the only hereditary pretension, and are the only persons fundamentally connected with the soil.

The Insecurity of landed Tenures discussed.

79. A notion has, I believe, been entertained by many, the representation of which may perhaps have reached your Honourable Board, that the system of our Revenue administration in the Upper Provinces has induced all the evils of insecurity to landed property, so that, in its operation, numbers have been ousted from their rights and left to want and misery.

80. I have been careful to make very particular inquiries into this subject; and I am happy to be able to assure your Honourable Board, that any opinions of of this nature which have circulated, owe their origin to the want of sufficient information, and to an inaccuracy of deduction from appearances. Our system has certainly some very serious defects, but these lie as much in the Judicial as in the Revenue branch of its administration; and except the partial operation of sales of land for arrears of Revenue, and of private purchases by the native officers of Government, I cannot believe that any revolution in the property of the soil has at all been one of its effects.

81. Your Honourable Board is well acquainted with the theory of the property and economy of villages in the possession of the indigenous proprietors or cultivating Zemindars. The rights of all are well ascertained and defined, and though the divisions and subdivisions appear intricate to a distant observer, they are productive of no confusion amongst themselves, it being only when disturbed by the operation of external causes that the general harmony suffers interruption.

82. This system of village property was yet in being in the Upper Provinces when they fell under our dominion; for the farmers and officers of former Governments, though arbitrary and unmerciful in their exactions, seldom had the hardihood to attempt to interfere with this state of real property. The village community was thus complete; and though there was usually one amongst the sharers, whose name was entered in the public accounts as the person who collected and paid the revenue, he was merely a Malguzar, in the same manner as a farmer or officer of Government, and the circumstance of his name being so entered was never held to convey any special privileges or exclusive rights.

83. Our settlements have been, when made with proprietors, of the mauzawaree kind, in which engagements are entered into for entire villages. In the first instance, the selection of the different parties who might offer themselves as the proprietors of villages, for the purpose of engaging with Government, would rest with the Collector. There was, in fact, no other authority at that time in the newly-ceded Provinces, and the selection, in the first instance, was clearly a fiscal operation, subject to be disputed by any person who might conceive himself aggrieved by it, in the Dewanny Adawluts, on their subsequent introduction.

84. I have already observed, that there is reason to believe the executive duty of the settlement was frequently left to the Tehsildars, whence it may be apprehended that, in the selection founded on their reports, a preference has been sometimes given to parties possessing no title to admission. Such, indeed, is known to have been the case in some pergunnahs of Cawnpore; and I am told that instances of glaring injustice of this sort, grounded even on the falsification of public records, have come before the Board of Commissioners. But the Board have, even in these cases, preferred leaving the aggrieved parties to seek redress by regular application to the Adawlut, rather than run the risk of disturbing the stability and security of landed property, by an attempt to render justice in an extra-judicial manner.

85. The same discretion of original selection, which I have stated to have necessarily existed in the Revenue authorities at the first settlement, was similarly exercised by them at the second, third, and fourth settlements, in the admission of claimants to the proprietary right of such villages as had been let in farm at the first settlement, in consequence of no proprietor being at the moment forthcoming. Many of these villages, indeed, would, under the provisions of the Regulations, remain in farm until the expiration of the third settlement, in consequence of the proprietors claim not being preferred within a prescribed period. All persons thinking themselves aggrieved by such selection, when ultimately made, were at full liberty to advance in the Adawlut their superior title.

86. Many suits have accordingly been instituted in the Adawluts, and some persons have been admitted under judicial decrees reversing the exclusion originally awarded against them by the revenue authorities. That many suits have not been brought, may be ascribed partly to the difficulty of proving long dormant claims, partly to the expense and delays of litigation in our courts, and partly to a hope, founded on the shortness of the settlements, that the exclusion might last no longer than the present lease. The undeviating principle adopted by the Board of Commissioners, of not disputing or questioning rights once recognized, on whatever grounds, ought, however, to have long since removed this hope; and although, under the influence of the two other causes, this principle may operate, in fact, as a denial of justice in some individual instances, it is obvious that it tends materially to the solidity of landed property.

87. But although the Board, in the express view of avoiding the very consequence which has been since laid to their charge (that of weakening the security of tenures in land) have cautiously refrained from all interference in rights recognized, by whatever authority, previously to their administration, they have, with a most scrupulous attention, revised the proceedings of the subordinate Revenue authorities on claims to the proprietary right of lands remaining in farm, which may subsequently have been preferred, and the selection has, in such cases, undergone the strictest revision and the most deliberate scrutiny.

88. Where no doubt or dispute existed in regard to the right of property, a modification of the right was apparently introduced, in some instances, by the measure adopted for the settlement of Putteedaree estates. The Collector, for the greater security and facility in collecting the public dues, would be solicitous to have engagements from one person for each entire village or estate, instead of looking to ten, twenty, or a hundred engagers. This measure is, in fact, grounded on the Regulations, which direct the selection of single managers for all joint undivided estates, and make the entire estate liable for the default of such manager. The same measure was found to have prevailed during the former Governments, as is manifest from the old wasulbakees of the Canongoes, which exhibit in no instance, even of estates the most extensively subdivided in Putteedaree tenure, more than one name of Cabooleatdar. The consequences of this measure, in the instance of sales of land, are what I before alluded to.

89. The same description of property exists equally in Benares, and the same mode of management (namely, that of taking engagements from one general representative) having been adopted in that district, corresponding consequences have occurred there also to a still greater extent. The nature of these tenures was so well known to Mr. Duncan, that in the code of Regulations formed by him for that province in 1795, an express stipulation was made that, in the event of recourse being had to a sale of land, no such recourse having till that time ever been had, the purchaser should be understood to have acquired no more than the specific right of the person for whose default the sale should be made. What was contemplated by Mr. Duncan as a remote and barely possible contingency, soon became general: sales of land on the application of the contract Tehsildars were daily made with indiscriminate precipitancy; the Tehsildars themselves became the purchasers; and under the construction of another clause in the Regulations, which declares all joint undivided estates liable for the whole of the assessment, the purchasers were admitted to have acquired, not only the specific share of the defaulting manager and the right of succeeding to him as a representative of the partnership, but the entire fee simple of the estate, to the total extinction of all Putteedaree right.

90. That such a result should have been the necessary, or even the natural consequence of the system, does not appear, when it is found that during eight years of Mr. Duncan's own superintendence of the contract Tehsildars, not one sale of land had ever taken place.

91. Having mentioned that some estates were let in farm at the first settlement, in consequence of no proprietors being forthcoming, I should observe that such estates were not untenanted or deserted; nor was it supposed they were destitute of proprietors. In the frequent recourse which the Aumils of the former Governments are known to have had to adventitious farmers, with the view of obtaining the greatest possible rent, and the precarious and inadequate subsistence which the Zemindars thus derived from their lands, many of them had emigrated to distant parts of the country, in search of service, principally in the armies of Hindostan, and their existence could not be immediately traced.

92. This

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

92. This result of the numerous exclusions given to the Zemindars of Benares by Rajah Bulwan Sing, and his successor, Rajah Chete Sing, must be familiar to your Honourable Board, through the daily re-settlements of farmed lands which are submitted for the sanction of Government; and those instances will also exemplify the difficulty of tracing satisfactorily claims to the proprietary rights after any length of dispossession, as well as justify the discretion, above alluded to, which is exercised by Government, on the recommendation of the Revenue authorities, of selecting one party from contending claimants, and of leaving the rest to a prosecution of their claims in the Adawlut.

93. It appears, also, that many estates were let in farm, at the first settlement, on this plan, although the proprietors were not only forthcoming and in the actual possession of their lands, but also anxious to engage for them.

94. When the agency of the Tehsildars was resorted to in the executive detail of the settlement, many unfounded pleas of this sort were brought forward by them, as a cloak for the farms which they had given to their own servants and connections, of the lands of these supposed absentees. Many estates were similarly let in farm by them, on the equally unfounded allegation, that the proprietors, although present, had declined to engage: and one of the first measures of the Board of Commissioners for the benefit of the landholders, was to procure the enactment of a Regulation for the removal of the doubts, relative to their admission to the third settlement, arising from the misconception under which the second settlement had, in several districts, been renewed indiscriminately with the same parties, as well as at the same jumma as the first.

95. Some estates, also, were let in farm, not because the proprietors were not forthcoming or not willing to engage, but because they could not readily agree among themselves in the choice of a representative, or a manager for the whole partnership. In these cases, as the Collector, during the hurry of a general settlement, had neither leisure to investigate the allotment of each Putteedar's proportion of the aggregate assessment, nor sufficient information in regard to the nature of their tenures, the readiest mode which suggested itself for the security of the public revenue, in preference to holding the lands khas, which is a measure always attended with loss to Government, was to lease the whole village to a farmer who should be responsible for the whole jumma, and who was left to make his own arrangements with the occupants.

96. When the nature of these partnership tenures came to be more clearly understood, a Regulation was passed for the better management of them, combining the support of private rights with the security of the dues of Government; and although it is not to be understood that, even under the former system of taking engagements from one of the number for the entire village, any authority was intended to be vested in, or was actually assumed by the engager, incompatible with the rights of the general brotherhood, this provident check, under the watchful administration of the Board of Commissioners, has contributed essentially to give greater independence and security to this valuable class of our subjects, the importance of which will be appreciated by your Honourable Board, when it is recollected that our native soldiery is principally recruited from the numerous ramifications of the hereditary stock of village Zemindars.

97. As these remarks do not exactly apply to the province of Rohilcund, and as the Bareilly portion of it has been quoted for the chief proof of the supposed insecurity of landed rights, it will be proper to observe, that under two sucessive revolutions, in the first of which the old Hindoo proprietors had been superseded by the Afghan invaders, and in the second of which these Afghans had, in their turn, been ousted by the Lucknow administration, the province, on our acquisition of it was found almost wholly in the hands of large farming contractors. The enlightened views of Mr. Deane, whose example was, with the same liberal policy, followed by Mr. Leycester (the two gentlemen originally selected at the cessions as the Collectors of Bareilly and Moradabad), led them to undertake the tracing of proprietary rights and the unravelling of this confused state of things. The last settlement of Bareilly, concluded under Mr. Deane's own personal inspection, has brought into direct engagements with Government upwards wards of two thousand village Zemindars. In Moradabad, also, where two-thirds of the lands were in farm at the first settlement, the proportion is already reduced to less than one-third.

98. From the above view of the principles by which the Board of Commissioners have hitherto regulated their conduct, and of the state of things they found in actual existence at the time they first took charge of their duties in the Western Provinces, your Honourable Board must be sensible, that whatever may be the nature of the insecurity to landed property alleged to have resulted from our system, no share of such an effect is in any way attributable to their administration of it. But as those who allege the existence of this insecurity have used the broad appellation of landed property, without stating precisely the kind of property in land, or the class of proprietors to which they intend to apply the term, it will be necessary to say a few words on this point.

99. If by it was meant, that under the system we have pursued, hereditary rights were, in the first instance, not sought out and maintained with sufficiently scrupulous attention, but that men were frequently acknowledged as actual proprietors, who had either no interest, or but a very partial one, in the land, the fee-simple of which was thus assigned to them, or if it be asserted that actual proprietors were often injured by the needless farming of their lands to strangers, such a degree of insecurity to the rights of individuals must certainly be admitted to have existed on our first occupation of the country, before the appointment of the Board of Commissioners took place. In the confusion of such a juncture, it would be difficult to say how it could have been otherwise; but this has before been traced to the necessity we found ourselves under of keeping up, for a time, the system of contract tehsildaree, with which, though we could and did modify or regulate it, so as to make it less injurious than before, we could not at once altogether dispense.

100. We have seen, however, that it was the first act of the Board of Commissioners, when they were subsequently appointed, to procure a legislative enactment, providing a remedy for the most crying part of the abuses which arose from a misinterpretation of this system, and that it was their second act to strike at the root of the evil, by entirely abolishing the objectionable part of that system. Claims to proprietary right are no longer decided on the reports of Tehsildars, neither is it on their recommendation that recurrence is had to the farming of any estate: both these points are now universally investigated by the Collectors in person and their report is again subject to the most scrupulous inquiry and reconsideration by the Board of Commissioners.

101. I have taken especial care to ascertain the mode in which all cases of this nature are scrutinized by each authority, and I feel satisfied it would be impossible, in any way, to secure a more fair or full inquiry, than what they now actually receive on all occasions. Though, therefore, in the first instance, under the contract Tehsildaree system, there does not appear to have existed any adequate security to landed property against the abuses of that system, it must be obvious, that the present administration of the Board of Commissioners not only is no way chargeable with these abuses, but has the high merit of having remedied them. As it is the spirit infused into the several Collectors by the active control and superintendence of the Commissioners, which first enabled us to dispense with the mischievous features of the system; and as its entire abolition finally was a measure of their own, it is to the Commissioners, evidently, that the country is indebted for the securities these interests have since procured.

102. But neither is the antecedent administration of the system of our Government chargeable with the neglect of these interests, which is stated to have been at first experienced. The Government promised to the country a more just and liberal system than had hitherto been pursued; but this was only to be effected by the gradual improvement of that which they found in being. Perfection is not the work of a moment. Before our occupation of the country, the Aumils and Tehsildars contracted with the Governments, and the whole internal settlement was entirely left with them. They farmed or admitted proprietors to engage at pleasure, and there was no consistency of system, either between each Aumil and his successor, or between the Aumil and the person to to whom he under-farmed a portion of his jurisdiction. On the other hand, from the first of our occupation, the mofussil settlement was made with Government; and though, perhaps, considering the unpropitious circumstances and want of information under which it was made, the whole proprietary class could not be at once recovered and secured in all their rights, still, as far as they were ascertained, security was afforded, and the class was guarded from any further encroachment, on the part of those to whom they owed the confusion and difficulties under which they laboured at the time. The gradual improvement of our system has procured their gradual further restoration and additional security. That it should entirely have redressed the wrongs inflicted by antecedent systems, is more than could have been rationally expected.

103. It is not, therefore, either to the system of the Board of Commissioners, or even to that pursued by Government before their appointment to the Upper Provinces, but to the vices of administration anterior to our possession of the provinces, that any apparent disregard of landed rights must be attributed. In truth, our inquiry after such rights was necessarily partial or tardy, because we could only gradually discover the extent to which they had been subverted.

104. That the Board did wisely, in only seeking to supplant the farmers, and in leaving to the judicial authorities, exclusively, the power of restoring to the actual owner rights before awarded to others in full property, without sufficient cause, is a point on which, I should conceive, no doubt can be entertained. Had a different conduct been pursued, though only in the most flagrant cases, it must have left the impression, that even acknowledgment of landed right by Government afforded no security, and that, should a different Board at any time be constituted, the whole of the acts and measures of the present would be equally open to revision and annulment.

105. The alleged insecurity may, however, have reference to other features of our system: perhaps the holders ol large talooks and estates are meant, and certainly it must be admitted to have been an object of our system to keep down this class. These were not, however, proprietors of the soil, as I have before explained, and never had been so considered in the Western Provinces. They had only a more permanent sort of lease or contract than a common farmer; and whatever rights or privileges such tenure could legitimately be held to convey, our Government did not attempt to supersede. But our Government exerted its undoubted right of fixing its assessment on such tenures, by a mofussil ascertainment of their produce. Its ministerial officers made themselves acquainted with the payments of all the village proprietors, and offered to confirm the tenure to the holder assessed at the rate thus yielded, with such deduction as the nature of the tenure entitled him to. With this, however, he was seldom satisfied: he claimed the rate assessed by former Governments, a rate standing on a permanent basis, and which fraud, intrigue, or fear, had enabled him to extort for the moment from their weakness. Sic. orig.

106. The forfeiture of the tenure will therefore generally have been occasioned by his recusance, and cannot be attributed to any insecurity resulting from the system. In such case, the mofussil village settlements were made direct with the village Zemindars, in the same manner as elsewhere, and the holder of the tenure was left to the receipt of such allowance for his maintenance, as on just competition, he might have heretofore been entitled to enjoy. That the full rate of assessment imposed, or even an excess beyond it, has almost always ultimately been realized from large estates so taken from the holders, affords the most satisfactory proof that such insecurity, if such was meant, is not a defect of system.

107. The alleged insecurity may, however, apply to the village Putteedar proprietors, who, until the passing of the Regulation for the admission of them all to engage, were, by the letter of the law, almost left at the mercy of the single engager to the Government. It was certainly a great oversight in the legislature of this country, not to have earlier discovered the necessity of providing for the security of this class; yet, as long as the engager was himself one of the class, I have seen no reason to believe that he assumed the powers of sole proprietor, or that the general putteedaree property was at all infringed upon. There was, indeed, always between the engager and the other sharers a community of principle and of caste, which secured them from any attempt at usurpation on his part, when there may not have existed any interruption of this community from external causes: but whenever a stranger to these interests may have acquired any right to interfere, whether a surety by intrigue had obtained a mortgage of the estate, or it had been purchased by public or private sale, then certainly will the putteedaree right of the other sharers have been in danger of being sacrificed to his avarice.

 infringed

Sales of Land considered.

108. If, therefore, our system does exhibit any defects, of a nature injurious to the existing state of property, it is in the regarding mokuddumee right, constituted as above explained, to be a saleable and heritable property; but more especially in the exposure of it to public sale by auction, in the view of recovering arrears by the price for which it might sell. It is from this process that the community and general economy of the village is violated, and the institutions of the country outraged. The auction purchasers are generally the Vakeels, the Omlah, and dependents of the courts and other cutcherries, who have acquired their notions of property from the Regulations or from the Bengal practice, and who proceed to take possession of their purchase, with the conception that no one has any right but themselves.

109. The expediency of sales for the recovery of arrears of Revenue admits in itself of doubt. The object of them is to recover an arrear which cannot be realized by other means, and to secure a more punctual liquidation of the public dues in future. But numerous instances have occurred, particularly in Goruckpore and Benares, where the sale has produced, on the contrary, a further accumulation of annual balances on the part of the purchaser, who pleads his not being able to obtain complete possession; besides that the low price at which land generally sells, occasions frequently a disappointment in the primary object of the measure.

110. The advantage is, therefore, at all events precarious; but such as it is, it is purchased at the expence of the rights of a whole copartnership, which it virtually annihilates, and at the expence of the peace and well-being of the district, which it invariably disturbs. An endless litigation in the courts of judicature, between the Government, the purchaser, and the former engager and proprietors, is an evil which always attends it; and frequently it gives rise to a systematic defiance of all legal authority, disgraceful to Government, and to the administration of civil justice.

111. I have been happy to find, that the Board of Commissioners have been able to realize the land revenue of the Upper Provinces with extraordinary punctuality, with but rare resort to this unpopular and injurious measure: but it is with much regret I have learned, that through the intrigues of the Tehsildars, at a period anterior to their administration, large portions of the three districts of Goruckpore, Cawnpore, and Allahabad, had been transferred from the hands of original proprietors by public sale for the arrears of rent, and that, particularly in the former district, very valuable villages had been frequently sold, at a price of from two to five rupees. The purchasers were generally the Tehsildars themselves; and even to the present day, the local authorities lament the consequence of the oppression which ensued, nor have their united efforts yet been able to arrest the course of its injurious effects.

112. The Board of Commissioners are, I believe, fully aware, that the system of auction sale for arrears is but ill adapted to the state of property in the provinces under their charge; it is therefore unnecessary to impress upon their minds, that the measure should be resorted to with caution. But perhaps they might be consulted with effect, on the practicability of entirely doing without it, and of striking so harsh a feature from the code of our Revenue administration.

113. If the engaging proprietor be considered as a chosen representative of the community of the village, it will naturally suggest itself to your Honourable Board, that the wishes of that community should be consulted, prior to the transfer of the tenure to another. Before, however, proposing any specific enactment enactment on this subject, I am naturally desirous that the Board of Commissioners should be called upon to give their opinion on the state of village property in general, and its accordance, or otherwise, with the several parts of our system, especially how it is affected by the practice of auction sales, and to suggest the nature of the rules they may concieve best calculated to preserve it inviolate, without risking the just rights of Government.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sep. 1815.

Putwarrees recommended to be made Servants of Government.

114. To ascertain the several rights of the proprietors must obviously be the first step; and the most likely method that occurs to me of effecting this, is to re-establish the office of Putwarry, on a footing independant of the engaging Zemindar, the person interested in infringing on them. The community may thus be induced to regard him as the record-keeper and guardian of their rights, and a reference to his accounts as a satisfactory criterion by which to decide their mutual differences.

115. Upon this subject, however, I beg leave to lay before your Honourable Board the accompanying able and interesting report from Mr. Newnham, dated the 1st May, submitting a translate of a set of Putwarry accounts, which came into his hands while he officiated as Collector of Cawnpore. He has furnished an explanation of the use and object of every separate part of this system of book-keeping, as well as of the mutual connection of the whole. He details the several important interests, both of Government and of the tenantry at large, which such a system of accounts is calculated to secure; and recommends, with a view of ensuring their accuracy and authenticity, that the Putwarry of every village should be made the servant of Government, instead of the nomination being left, as at present, to the Zemindar.

116. This measure was, I believe, proposed so far back as by Sir John Shore, at the time of forming the perpetual settlement, as well as by several authorities since; and it appears to have already been adopted by the presidency of Bombay, in a legislative enactment, a copy of which Mr. Newnham has procured from his brother, the Secretary to Government at that presidency, and has annexed to his report.

117. The points directly connected with the Putwarry accounts are chiefly the adjustment of the revenue of Government, the apportionment of it in shares of estates, and the ascertainment of the rent payable by each under-proprietor, and of the actual payments of each, in cases of a contested demand on the part of the engaging Zemindar. In all these points (Mr. Newnham observes) the interests of the Zemindar are only as one to eight or ten, in comparison with those of Government or of the under proprietors. The Zemindar is, at the same time, the only party who can have an object in falsifying the accounts, while the power of nominating and dismissing the village accountant unquestionably furnishes him with the means.

118. During the former Governments, the Putwarry was considered to be a public officer, and in many parts of the country, was appointed by the Canongoe. There appears, indeed, to be a necessary dependance of these two offices on each other, inasmuch as the general record of the district-accountant can be no more than the aggregate of the details derived from the several village accountants.

119. In constituting the Putwarry an officer of Government, it appears unnecessary to prescribe to him any particular form of accounts. The system detailed by Mr. Newnham is clear and comprehensive, and seems to contain every requisite check for insuring accuracy; but any other mode of accounts which may already be in use might be equally advantageous, although not so complete and scientific. The Bengal system of Putwarry accounts, a translate of which is already in print,* differs materially; and the practice of Behar, of Benares, of Rohilcund and the upper Dooab, and of the west bank of the Jumna, may differ not only from that of Cawnpore, but from each other. It seems immaterial in what shape the accounts are kept if the fidelity of them can be secured; and this object is more likely to be effected by abolishing the dependance of the Putwarry upon the Zemindar than by any penalties or punishments.

120. Mr.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

120. Mr. Newnham infers, from the inherent checks which the system of accounts detailed by him possesses on its own accuracy, that falsification is impracticable or would be readily detected, and that the attempt to falsify them in such a manner as to escape detection, by making the whole series of false accounts to accord with one another, would exceed the patience and skill of the most industrious and acute Hindoo. It is not easy to define the extent of labour of which a native is capable when a profit is in view; but as all fabrications of accounts are made on the spur of the moment, when the accounts are called for, such attempts might be more effectually obviated, even in the present constitution of the Putwarry office, if the accounts, instead of being called for only when wanted, were to be deposited annually (that is to say, copies of them) in the hands of the Canongoes.

121. A difficulty occurs in regard to the constituting the Putwarry a public servant, that when he ceases to be a servant of the Zemindar, he will cease to be the depositary of the latter's accounts It is well known, that even at present the Putwarry is not always entrusted with the details of the land held by the Zemindars in Nizjote or by his menials in Chakeran; and if the Zemindar should chose to employ an accountant of his own for the rest of the villages also, the Putwarry will be left to form his accounts on the information of the under-proprietors only, or like the Canongoe, on such information as he can pick up.

122. It may be recollected, that the Canongoe office was intended to be a register of leases, by making it the Canongoe's duty to record all pottahs and caboolcats; but as no obligation was enforced on the Zemindars to register these documents, the object of the Regulation has never been effected. It will deserve consideration, whether this should not be obviated by a legislative enactment, the purview of which might extend to the securing all necessary information for the Putwarry also.

123. The pay of the Putwarry must be provided for by law: Government cannot be expected to defray the charge of such a numerous establishment. The Putwarry is usually paid by a cess, or a russoom, of half an anna per cent. on the jumma contributed by the under-proprietors, who may be expected to pay it still more cheerfully hereafter, when their own interests are more clearly connected with the existence of the office than at present. I propose, therefore, that the Board of Commissioners, or Mr. Newnham in person, whose report evinces the extent of his information on the subject, be directed to prepare the draft of a Regulation making the Putwarry independent of the Zemindar, and embracing all those several points.

Claim of recusing Zemindars to Malikanah considered.

124. A question connected with the nature of the landed property of the Upper Provinces was brought to my notice in the course of my tour, and I believe it has also been laid before your Honourable Board. I allude to the claim of recusing Zemindars to a malikanah allowance for their maintenance. The subject is one of the utmost importance; and I have accordingly been careful to make the fullest inquiries in every quarter, with a view to satisfy my mind respecting it.

125. The claim of recusing Zemindars is founded on a legislative provision, and an assurance, by proclamation, that a Zemindar declining to engage for his estate shall be allowed the same nankar as he may have been authorized to receive on recusance from the former Government, provided the rate of such allowance does not exceed the amount of ten per cent. on the jumma. The obvious import of this stipulation, and of the rules connected with it for the formation of the settlement, is, that such Zemindars as under the former Government were accustomed to receive a personal allowance of nankar, should be continued in the possession of that nankar, whether they chose to engage or not; in the first alternative, by a deduction of the nankar in their jumma, and in the latter case, by a money payment from the treasury. But in the progress of the discussion of this subject, by substituting the word malikanah or huki melkeent as a convertible term for nankar, and applying the rules contained in the provisions for the settlement of the Lower Provinces to a part of our territories altogether distinct, an idea has been promulgated and anxiously caught at by our new class of landholders, the auction purchasers, that every proprietor who who may think proper to decline the management of his lands and the responsibility for the dues of Government, is entitled to receive from the treasury of Government a perpetual annuity of ten per cent. on the jumma.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sep. 1815.

126. The only nankar, of a description similar to the malikana of Bengal, of which the proceedings of Government furnish any knowledge, is the special provision or reservation to the large Talookdars and Rajahs for the support of themselves and of their families, independently of their engagements with Government; and this was oftener an assignment of rent-free land than a fixed money reduction from the jumma. The evident object of the rule was to continue the same provision which they had hitherto enjoyed to this class of middle men, whom it was in the contemplation and the wish of Government to exclude or dispense with, by the invitation held out to the village Zemindars, who had heretofore paid their rents through the medium of these persons, to engage direct with Government.

127. It is evidently, therefore, only this class that can claim under the above rule; neither was the spirit of the rule intended to have application to any other: and this class have invariably received their established malikana, whether of money or land, from the first of our acquisition of these provinces, when thus divested of the management of the revenue.

128. I am further informed, that the nankar of the village Zemindars is also a matter of record, and that the wassil-bakees of the Canongoes are generally, in some districts invariably found to exhibit, not a malikana payable to them in the event of their exclusion (for no such allowance was known to the Vizier's administration in the case of the village Zemindars), but the nankar allowed was a deduction from the jumma of the village to the engagers, whether proprietors or farmers, and therefore technically known by the name of nankar moojrayee wassil bakee.

129. Whether this specific allowance, or any other, should be now extended to the recusing village Zemindars, and to their successors the auction purchasers, is a point which requires deliberate consideration. The inexpediency of thus holding out a premium to them for discharging themselves and their lands from all responsibility for the revenue of Government, must be evident. Could we imagine such a resignation of the landholders to become general, the consequence would be a charge on the public treasury of a perpetual annuity of nearly thirty lacks of rupees, and the total loss of the collateral security which Government now holds on the lands themselves. The very amount of such a possible burthen seems to decide the question, and to expose the fallacy that lurks in the pretension. The nankar was clearly personal, and allowed from considerations applying to the individual, not to his function of village Zemindar; of course, it could not be transferable.

130. If, indeed, the want of some provision to excluded Zemindars should have been productive, as has been surmised, of outrages against the peace of society, policy will require that a remedy should be sought for so serious an evil. It may be questioned, however, whether the evils of this nature, alleged to have arisen from the exclusion and the consequent ruin of proprietors, may not be traced to cases of exclusion from other causes than recusance. The sales of land which violate the rights of whole communities are much more productive of the ruin of the landed interest, and contribute much more to drive the class of proprietors to acts of desperation, than any operation which a voluntary recusance can be supposed to have, wherein a single individual only retires from the management to the right he may before have possessed, while a farmer or officer of Government quietly assumes it in his stead. But, at any rate, consequences of this nature cannot have occurred in regard to the auction purchasers, whose subsistence has not depended on the profits of their landed concerns.

131. With respect to the original village Zemindars, a further question arises from the nature of the putteedaree tenures, to what parties the nankar should be paid and in what proportions. As the person who may have hitherto engaged singly can be looked upon in no other light than as managing representative of the partnership, and is perhaps the actual owner of a very small portion of the estate, he has clearly as little title individually to the entire allowance of malikanah from the estate, if let in farm, as he would have had on his exclusion from the management by the introduction of another manager in his stead.

 ance

132. With respect also to the auction purchasers, it seems a legitimate construction (and I believe the opinion is maintained by good authority), that they obtain the estates they purchase with all their liabilities as well as the privileges they confer: so that, if any one has bought the tenure of an engaging proprietor, in which there are other sharers, he has only bought the privilege of making his own arrangements with those sharers, and of engaging for them with the Government. The same rights that the sharers held against the old engager, they should thus, in equity, possess against the auction purchaser of those rights; and if the right of malikana on refusing was not before the exclusive privilege of the single engager with the Government, the auction purchaser has evidently no ground on which to claim it. In the same manner, if at the ensuing settlement the person who has so obtained the land will not agree to the Collector's rate of assessment, and the other sharers should come forward and accept it, the auction purchaser, though he loses the advantage of being Malguzar, could not complain, for this was one of the liabilities of the tenure he purchased.

133. From this circumstance, however, if from nothing else, the extreme inaptitude of auction sales to such a state of property, while our assessments are only periodical, must be evident. The Collector does not know what he sells, nor the purchaser what he buys. The very next settlement that takes place may entirely annihilate the property put up to sale, and the purchaser is without redress; nor has he any secure equivalent for his purchase-money.

134. The above view is, as your Honourable Board will observe, founded on the supposition, that in an auction-sale it is the tenure of the defaulter only which is sold; and this is rather supported by the spirit of the provisions introduced by Mr. Duncan into the Revenue Code of Benares, as above alluded to. It may, however, be urged on the other hand, that as it is the land which is made responsible for the dues of Government by the process of sale, it must be the land itself which is sold, without reference to the tenures of those upon it, so that a new property is created by the process: but however complete this may be held to be, the class of proprietors by auction purchases can evidently have little claim to a malikana, in such case, under the provisions of the existing Regulations, as they cannot be of the class which used to receive such allowance from the former Governments. These persons have, indeed, been induced to purchase, in the idea that they were purchasing something; and it may perhaps be incumbent on the Government to see that what they purchase shall not be a nonentity. The question, however, of the relative rights of the auction purchasers and Putteedar proprietors of the estate which may be sold, is at present involved in much uncertainty. But Government is no way answerable for the motives which induce the purchaser, and knows nothing of the views with which he buys, or of the information on the strength of which he expects to remunerate himself. Indeed, Government has itself often discovered, to its cost, that tenures it has exposed for sale have been no just objects for which pecuniary considerations should be demanded, their liabilities having been found to exceed their privileges and profits. The auction purchaser may, perhaps, be deemed to have voluntarily taken on himself the risk of this. At all events, under the above view, the act of purchase cannot give him rights beyond those attached to the particular tenure which he buys; so that he can never have a title to infer, as involved in his bargain, privileges which were not possessed by his predecessor as directly appendant to the tenure. Whether, therefore, it is the actual tenure that is purchased, or a new tenure be held to be created by the sale, the generality of purchasers can have little title to the malikana under the existing rules, any more than the village Zemindars they have supplanted.

135. In either case, it would be gratuitous, and certainly I cannot discover sufficient grounds for making generally to the auction purchasers, in particular, the gift of any annuity such as that to which they pretend. This contingent boon undoubtedly did not influence the award of their bidding at the sale. The inadequate price at which land is usually found to sell throughout the Upper Provinces, Provinces, and the frequency with which estates are left in the hands of Government for want of any bidders, afford the best evidence that the ulterior benefit in question is not anticipated from a purchase. A clear annuity of ten per cent. on the amount of jumma, if put up to sale, would at any rate fetch a considerable price when it was to be secured by a mere recusance. Under no view, indeed, should I conceive the auction purchaser to be entitled to the allowance of malikana, unless in an instance where the right to it should have been previously recognized as inherent in that individual tenure which he bought, or where an engagement for its eventual payment was implied by the magnitude of the price paid.

136. The rules for the award of this allowance are, as they stand at present, evidently indistinct; nor could a judicial decision well be grounded on them. Indeed, they were passed only as a temporary measure, insomuch that it is stated in the legislative provisions themselves "for the present." I beg therefore to suggest to your Honourable Board the propriety of revising those rules, and rendering the enactments on the subject more pointed.

137. What I have stated above, accords, I believe, with the opinion entertained by the Board of Commissioners on the subject. I understand that, though to other classes they have generally refused the allowance, they have usually granted it to the Rajahs and large proprietors, as in the cases of the Rajah of Khyreeguth in Illahabad, Sheeorajpoor, and Buddik, and to a number in Goruckpore.

Condition of Ryots in Jageery and large Estates.

138. Among the questions connected with the operation of our system of revenue on the body of the people, there is a point which has so strongly and so frequently been forced upon me, that I cannot refrain from laying my sentiments upon the subject before your Honourable Board. The situation of the village proprietors in large estates, in farms, and jageers, is such as to call loudly for the support of some legislative provision. This is a question which has not merely reference to the Upper Provinces; for, within the circle of the perpetual settlement, the situation of this unfortunate class is yet more desperate: and though their cries for redress may have been stifled, in many districts, by their perceiving that uniform indisposition to attempt relieving them which results from the difficulty of the operation, their sufferings have not on that account been the less acute.

139. In Burdwan, in Behar, in Benares, in Cawnpore, and indeed wherever there may have existed extensive landed property at the mercy of individuals, whether in farm, in jaghire, in talook, or in zemindarry of the higher class, the complaints of the village Zemindars have crowded in upon me without number; and I had only the mortification of finding that the existing system, established by the legislature, left me without the means of pointing out to the complainants any mode in which they might hope to obtain redress.

140. Of these complaints, I beg leave to lay before your Honourable Board the accompanying original, received at Patna from a Mokhtar on the part of the village proprietors of Tuladah, together with the abridged translation of it, which I caused to be prepared. I beg to assure your Honourable Board, however, that the oppressions alleged against the Rajah of Benares and Sheo Neragun, against the Jageerdar Nerunder Gur Ghosain, and other large holders, were not less flagrant, or apparently less substantiated, than those alleged in this petition against Baker Allee Khan, the holder of the Life-Ijara of Tuladah. In all these tenures, from what I could observe, the class of village proprietors appeared to be in a train of annihilation; and unless a remedy is speedily applied, the class will become extinct. Indeed, I fear that any remedy which could be proposed, would even now come too late to be of any effect in the several estates of Bengal, for the license of twenty years which has been left to the Zemindars of that province will have given them the power, and they have never wanted the inclination, to extinguish the rights of this class, so that no remnants of them will soon be discoverable.

141. The cause of this is to be traced to the incorrectness of the principle assumed at the time of the perpetual settlement, when those with whom Government entered into engagements were declared the sole proprietors of the soil.

soil. The under-proprietors were considered to have no rights, except such as might be conferred by Pottah; and there was no security for their obtaining these on reasonable terms, except an obviously empty injunction on the Zemindar amicably to adjust and consolidate the amount of his claims.

142. It is well known (and even if it were questionable, the practice of the provinces which have more lately fallen under our dominion would set the doubt at rest), that the cultivating Zemindars were, by a custom more ancient than all law, entitled to a certain share of the produce of their lands, and that the rest, whether collected by pergunnah Zemindars or by the officers of Government, was collected as the huk of the Sircar.

143. This indefeasible right of the cultivating proprietors to a fixed share of the produce was annihilated by our directing that pottahs should be executed for a money-payment, in which all the claims of the Zemindars should be consolidated. The under-proprietor was thus left to the mercy of the Zemindar, to whose demands there were no prescribed limits. The Zemindar offered a pottah on his own terms.* If the under-proprietor refused it, he was ejected, and the courts supported the ejectment. If the under-proprietor conceived that he could contest at law the procedure, a regular suit, under all the disadvantages to which he is known to be exposed, was his only resource: but when, after years of anxiety and of expense, the case was at last brought to a hearing, he lost his action, because it was proved that the pottah was offered and refused, and there was no criterion to which he could refer, as a means of proving that the rate was exorbitant.

144. The framers of the perpetual settlement declared their incompetency to fix any criterion for the adjustment of these disputes. The declaration stands recorded in our legislative code,† and to the present day this omission has not been supplied. The consequence of the omission, in the first instance, was a perpetual litigation between the Zemindars and the under-proprietors, the former offering pottahs on their own terms, the latter not having forgotten that they possessed rights independent of all pottahs, and refusing demands they conceived unconscionable. When, at last, the revenue of Government was affected by the confusion which ensued, without enquiring into the root of the evil, the legislature contented itself with arming those who were under engagements to the Government with additional powers, so as to enable them to realize their demands in the first instance, whether right or wrong; a procedure which unavoidably led to extensive and grievous oppression.

145. On the large estates, I believe it will be found that the system of pottah and cabooleat has not yet been fully established between the Zemindars and the cultivating proprietors. The Zemindar takes engagements from the farmers and officers he employs to collect his rents, and in the event of their failure, makes the lands and the crops answerable for the amount. The Zemindar feels none of the evils of insecurity; for, as far as the whole produce of the soil will go, he is armed by the VIIth Regulation of 1799 with the power of enforcing his demand: and considering the constitution of our civil courts, it seems unanimously agreed that the Ryot, or under-proprietor, unless he be a Putteedar, is debarred any adequate means of redress for the most manifest extortions.

146 It has been urged, however, that though the rights of the former cultivating proprietors have been suffered by the Regulations to pass away sub silentio, still, as the Zemindar and his tenants have reciprocal wants, their mutual necessities must drive them to an amicable adjustment.

147. The reciprocity is not, however, so clear. The Zemindar certainly cannot do without tenants; but he wants them upon his own terms, and he knows that, if he can get rid of the hereditary proprietors, who claim a right to terms independent of what he may vouchsafe to give, he will obtain the means of substituting men of his own: and such is the redundancy of the cultivating class, that there will never be a difficulty of procuring Ryots ready to engage on terms only just sufficient to secure bare maintenance to the engager.

148. If

148. If it were the intention of our Regulations to deprive every class, but the large proprietors who engaged with Government, of any share in the profits of the land, that effect has been fully accomplished in Bengal. No compensation can now be made for the injustice done to those who used to enjoy a share of these profits under the law of the empire, and under institutions anterior to all record for the transfer of their property to the rajahs.

149. In Behar, however, and in Benares, the stand which was made by the mofussil Zemindars has been rather more successful, and the class has not yet been entirely proscribed and hunted down: but unless some effectual measures are taken with a view to stop the evil, the petition I have now the honour to lay before your Honourable Board is sufficient to shew, that such will be the ultimate consequence of our system, even in those provinces. There is no doubt, that the exactions noticed in this petition are much exaggerated. The degree in which they have been practised, in this particular instance, is a point which I shall endeavour, in conjunction with your Honourable Board, to ascertain accurately, with a view to afford ultimate redress. But that oppression of this nature is the result of the system to which it is here attributed (that of farming and under-farming, in the manner alleged) is a point in which all the authorities I have consulted are entirely agreed: it is necessary, therefore, that some measures should be taken, in order to protect the mofussil-Zemindars from the consequences of such a system, however it may have been imposed on them.

150. It was recommended to me by the Board of Commissioners, with whom I specially consulted on this point, to consider of the re-establishment of the Mal-Adawlut under the Collector, for the trial of all cases that might occur between the Zemindar and his tenants. I do not yet feel competent to offer a decisive opinion with respect to such a measure: but there can be no doubt it would be of the highest advantage to the Ryots, that they too should possess the means of a speedy recurrence to justice, without the embarrassment, delay, and expense of litigation, in the sole mode offered to them by the present constitution of our courts.

151. There is a point, however, connected with the petition of the Zemindars of Tuladah (and which applies yet more strongly to the cases of the Rajah of Benares and Jaghiredars in general), to which I am desirous of calling the attention of your Honourable Board. The tenure of bakir ullee khan was, as I understand, a mocurruree istimraree or life ijaree; that is, a considerable portion of land was set apart with a definite assessed jumma, on which he was not to innovate; but he undertook the collection and responsibility, on the consideration of a fixed deduction from the rate assessed. He stood, therefore, in the place of Government as manager. In jaghires, and in the case of the Rajah of Benares, the whole revenues of certain districts are assigned for the maintenance of the assignee. In both these istimraree tenures and jaghires, however, all that Government could make over were the rights possessed by itself; so that it was incumbent upon the assignees to be guided, in their conduct towards the subjects of Government transferred to them, by the same rules and principles of action as regulated the proceedings of Government.

152. In practice, however, it is to be feared that the assignment on the part of Government is considered to confer a proprietary right, with all the powers and privileges attached to such a right by the Regulations. Thus, as but one proprietor of the soil is recognized, the rights of all those with whom Government had till then engaged are totally annihilated by the assignment. What was heretofore paid as revenue, must now be paid as rent: those who before held their lands with only the condition of a certain fixed payment to the Government, become tenants, subject to arbitrary exactions, and liable to ejectment if they resist the demands.

153. In the Benares jaghires, in consequence of the operation of this construction of our system, the mofussil proprietors are supposed already to be nearly extinct. In the case of the pergunnah of Belaspoor Secundra, assigned in jaghire to Nurindar Gur Goosain, a petition regarding which (presented to me at Cawnpore) is also submitted herewith to the Board, the hardship on the landholders, as explained to me, is if possible still more glaring.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

154. The British Government, on its assumption of these Provinces, secured to the Zemindars a settlement on prescribed terms, renewable for two periods of three years, for a third of four, and at the expiration of these ten years, in perpetuity. Previous to the commencement of the second triennial period, the grant of the jaghire took place, and the Zemindars have, in consequence, been excluded from the benefits of the legislative enactments and assurances by proclamation, through which Government had limited its own demand. The Jaghiredar has been left at liberty to make his settlements with such persons, on such terms, and for such periods as he might choose: the consequence has been, that he has adopted the system of farming it to strangers; and numbers of the ejected proprietors crowded in to me with complaints, which I could only virtually reject by referring them to the Dewanny Adawlut of Cawnpore, where the usual period of decision is not less than three years.

155. Your Honourable Board will be sensible, that both istimrarees and jaghires are assignments of land in lieu of a certain sum, or with a fixed amount of surplus; and that if the assignee fails to observe towards the village proprietors such conduct as may secure the faith and honour of Government from reproach, it is incumbent on the Government to take its subjects again under its own protection, and to offer to the jaghiredar or istimraree farmer such allowance, in money, for his maintenance, as the assignment might have been made in lieu of, or as might have been left to the farmer in surplus.

156. I recommend, therefore, that it be explained to jaghiredars, and to all other assignees who stand in the place of Government, that the terms on which they hold the assignment are, that they fulfil any engagements to which the Government may have been actually pledged, and that, in their conduct to the proprietors of the lands assigned, they observe those principles of action which they may see the Government observe to other proprietors its subjects. This notification may either be made by legislative enactment or by general proclamation, defining the penalty which will attach to a non-observance of it; and I leave it for our future determination to fix the mode in which this can be most advantageously effected. I should imagine, there can be no doubt of the right of Government to bind jaghiredars by legislative enactments, and to prescribe rules for their conduct equally with other classes of its subjects.

Advantages to the Country which have resulted from our Revenue Administration.

157. I have now explained to your Honourable Board, with as much perspicuity as the extensive and complicated nature of the subjects embraced in such a discussion would allow, the sentiments which I have formed, after personal inquiry and long reflection, on the nature of the system of land-revenue administered in the Western Provinces by the present Board of Commissioners. I have endeavoured also to shew its operation on the body of the people, in those prominent features which forced themselves most particularly upon my observation. The view I have taken will, I trust, be considered fair and impartial; for though I have endeavoured to vindicate the system from any ill effects or prejudicial consequences, with which I did not conceive it fairly chargeable, I have felt no disposition to refrain from the full exposition of defects which I felt ought to be acknowledged. Indeed, I have sought to convey to you every impression as it was formed in my own mind, without palliating or concealing any circumstance.

158. The advantages of our system over those of former Governments have not yet formed a part of the discussion. They may be summed up in a few words. The former systems left entirely at the discretion of the Aumils the lives and properties of all the population of their several jurisdictions: There was only an appeal to the immediate sovereign of the state, and he was generally inaccessible.

159. From the moment of the establishment of our Government, the lives of all were secured under the shield of the law; and the substitution of the practice of contracting only for the realization of a fixed assessment, instead of contracting for the revenue of a given district, to be raised at the discretion and the cost of the contractor, secured their properties also, except against minor abuse and covert villainy. The annihilation of the contract system in all its its branches has now, in some degree, given protection even against those evils.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

160. Instead of the population being subjected to the arbitrary exactions of every Aumil and of every farmer he might choose to impose, an uniform and universal system has been introduced, under which every one may know his rights and be secure of having them respected. The system is certainly not yet sufficiently perfect for its ministerial officers to know of themselves the exact amount of revenue which is demandable from all; but that is only because they cannot ascertain the actual amount of produce, the requisite information being suppressed from interested motives. All that is wanting, however, to give perfection on this point, is a fixed criterion from which the amount of produce may be known or fairly estimated, so that settlements may be formed on uniform principles and data, known to be correct, instead of only believed to be so, as at present. I have before shewn, that pergunnah surveys afford the only means of doing this effectually; but as it is obviously only the Government that suffers from the want of uniformity on this account, the advantage to the country is not less than if it were complete.

161. The advantage to the country, is, however, best judged of by its effects. There is, at present, little or no emigration of the agricultural class. Indeed, it is found that proprietors before driven into exile or into the search of other means of livelihood, such as military service, daily return to reclaim the lands they had been obliged to abandon, in the certainty that they must now have ceased to be unprofitable.

162. The wages of agricultural labour are much higher than they used to be, which is solely attributable to the increased demand for labour of this description. The more valuable articles of produce are also cultivated with much more spirit; and the most astonishing efforts are daily made to conquer natural defects of soil, as well as to preclude the evils of casual calamity of season.

163. There can be no doubt, indeed, that the produce and the profits of agriculture have been increased, in a very surprizing degree, since the country fell under our administration. The comparative prosperity of the several cities may form a good criterion of this; and the rapidity with which they are increasing, both in size and population, is scarcely credible.

164. The abolition of those arbitrary sayer imposts which each Zemindar conceived himself entitled to levy on all goods that entered his domain, has now left open to every proprietor a free market for all his produce, to which it may be carried, without the fear of violence or exaction in the transport.

165. The beneficial system on which the customs and town-duties are now collected here, at the same time, left the rates of that market free from the operation of any local circumstances, and solely regulated by the broad commercial interests of the whole of India. In consequence of these facilities, commercial capital and enterprize have been turned towards the land, and an activity has been infused, of which every class begins to feel the benefits.

166. The display of wealth is no longer avoided as dangerous; but perhaps the most direct and positive advantage to the landed interest which has resulted from our occupation of the country is, the discontinuance of the arbitrary practice of quartering troops on districts from which they were to be provided gratis, in addition to the public dues of Government, as well as the requisition of free gifts of several descriptions, besides the obligation gratuitously to furnish supplies, labourers, artificers, and carriage of every sort, whenever circumstances might bring a man in power or a body of troops to the neighbourhood of a village. The occasions for demands of this description were unlimited, and payment never was offered, nor could it be asked with safety.

167. Under our system, these are, of course, not known, although, when we obtained the country, long usage had almost given to them the sanction of legality, and the exactions might have been continued, either as they were, or modified into a more regular impost, without the fear of odium or opposition.

168. The above advantages are amongst those which have particularly attended our Revenue administration, and are in addition to those incalculable benefits benefits resulting from the comparative total absence of external or internal violence, induced by the strength of our political Government and the authority of the law.

169. I have done now with the discussion of the mode of administration and effects of our system of land-revenue. There are no other subjects connected with these points, to which I am anxious at present to call the attention of your Honourable Board: but it has been with me an object of constant solicitude, to seek the means of increasing the revenue we derive from land, without adding to the burthens of present proprietors.

Modes of increasing the Revenue introduced.

170. The discovery of land in excess, beyond what appears on the records of Government, may be considered as a legitimate source of increase, and as the assessment of such excess would be merely an equalization of the rate of the estate in which it is found, with that of other estates in which such excess may not exist, the measure has none of the features of an additional impost: it is the correction of an illicit concealment. I have before shewn the grounds on which I conceived a survey by pergunnahs would afford the means of frequent discoveries of this nature: but there are other sources of increase to which I am more desirous of calling your attention, as the prospect of availing ourselves of them is more immediate and certain.

Discontinuance of Requisition of Malzamin proposed.

171. The demand from engaging proprietors of Malzamin, or security for the payment of the jumma of Government, is, I conceive, a tax upon the land revenue, which both the nature and the value of the landed property would enable us to dispense with. No one will be security without his equivalent; and whatever may be the rate of this equivalent, it will be considered in the terms offered to Government, and deducted from the amount engaged for. From all the inquiries I have been enabled to make, I cannot find that any additional security has resulted to Governnent, or that the revenue has been at all more punctually paid, in consequence of the practice of requiring security: on the contrary, I am inclined to think that it has, in many cases, been productive of confusion, from which the Government revenue will always ultimately suffer.

172. The Malzamin, where not a fellow-proprietor, in which case both the engager and his surety maintain themselves or fall together, will be an intriguing Bunya, who receives five per cent. as a consideration, and accepts the responsibility, merely in the hopes that arrears may induce further application to him, so as to strengthen the interest he has acquired in the land. Indeed, it will generally happen that, in a short time, he will have insinuated himself into the right of the proprietor, whence all the evils will result usually attendant on an auction sale; for the Bunya will have acquired the property by intrigue, and will have the same notions respecting it as if it had been so purchased.

173. The land, I should now conceive, will be sufficient security for itself; and even though one village proprietor may fail in his engagements, some other settlement may generally be made with the rest, by which the Government will be secured from loss. On this subject I propose that a reference be made to the Board of Commissioners, and that they be requested, in the event of their concurring in the above sentiments, to prepare a Regulation, or take such other means as they may conceive necessary, to discontinue the practice of requiring security for the jumma of Government, in the manner hitherto pursued.

Nuzurana on rent-free Lands proposed.

174. There is another source of increased revenue which promises to be yet more productive. The Collector of Moradabad submitted for my consideration the propriety of levying an annual nuzurana on all rent-free lands; and he supported the proposition by alleging it to be the practice of the country that such should be exacted, stating that many af the Lakherazdars of Bareilly and Moradabad paid, to the present day, a quit rent of this description, imposed by by former Governments. In Bundlecund a similar impost is said to exist, and is known by the name of russoom tihaee, which affords ground to believe it was originally a third of the profit.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

175. Of all subjects of taxation, I should conceive the profits of the rent-free lands the most legitimate. The holders of land of this description are at present exempted from all contributions, whether to the local police or Government by which they are protected, or to the public works from which their estates derive equal benefit with the rest of the community. They are indebted for the exemption either to the superstition, to the false charity, or to the ill-directed favours of the heads of former Governments and other men in power, and have little personal claim upon ourselves for a perpetual exemption from the obligations they owe as subjects. Most of the tenures may be considered invalid. Indeed, the scruples which have saved the whole of these lands from indiscriminate resumption, have given cause to admire as much the simplicity, as the extreme good faith of all our actions and proceedings.

176. The mode of drawing a revenue from this source, and the degree in which this may be practicable without a breach of our existing pledges, should be taken into our early and deliberate consideration. Either the practice of requiring an annual share-contribution as nuzurana, or that of demanding a peshkush of a year's profit, on the occasion of every transfer or succession, would be agreeable to former usage, and to the established institutions of the country. It might be required, also, as an equivalent for an immunity from further inquisition on the part of Government.

177. From a statement furnished by the Board of Commissioners, it appears that, in the Ceded and Conquered Provinces alone, the extent of land held under rent-free grants amounts to 44,95,177 begahs, an extent exceeding the recorded area of the cultivated land in the largest of our zillahs. From this circumstance, your Honourable Board will see the extent of imposition which is practised on the Government (for the authenticity or validity of almost all these grants is highly questionable), and the productive nature of the source of increase which is pointed out.

178. In the several districts of the Lower Provinces, the extent of the land furtively alienated from the rent-roll of Government is also reported to be enormous; and the rules introduced into the code of 1793, with a view to provide for an investigation of the validity of the claims by which it was held, and for its eventual resumption, in case they should be found defective, appear to have slept as a dead letter, or at least never to have been acted on consecutively. On this point I beg to suggest, that a reference be made to the Board of Revenue, and that they be called upon to submit a particular report of the recorded extent of rent-free lands in the provinces under their administration, the proportion which has been resumed under the existing rules, and the causes to which the unsatisfactory result of those rules is to be attributed.

179. Alluvion lands, and those which have lately been brought into cultivation in the Sunderbunds, have, I believe, already presented themselves to your Honourable Board, as legitimate sources of increase to the territorial revenue. Measures have, I presume, been taken, with a view to secure to Government their undoubted right from lands of this description. In the Western Provinces, however, where Government have not yet resigned their right to participate in the profits of improved or extended cultivation, a much more just and advantageous source of increase presents itself, in those works which give fertility to tracts now desolate, and render more productive soils from which a scanty produce is now drawn with difficulty.

Dooab Canal.

180. On this subject I am desirous of again bringing under the consideration of your Honourable Board the question of re-opening the Dooab canal, which was first agitated and brought to the notice of Government in a letter from the Board of Commissioners of the 7th October 1809.

181. Their recommendation that the canal should be restored at the expense of Government, is supported by so animated and just a picture of the benefits to the country with which it would be attended, that I cannot refrain from the citation of their sentiments.

 to

"The canal in question, generally known by the name of Zabitta Khan's, "from an attempt which he made to re-establish it, but which is said to have "failed, from the interruption given to the work by the Sikhs, runs through "the whole western half of the upper Dooab, from the foot of the hills to "opposite Delhi, and previous to its being suffered to fall into decay, must "have fertilized in its windings an extent of country of not much less than "two hundred miles.

"The proofs of the former fertility of this tract of country may be still "traced in its present state of impoverishment. Extensive groves of mangoe-"trees are evidence of former populousness and prosperity; and even where "no vestige of human industry remains, the names of the villages which once "stood there are still preserved in the public accounts.

"During our residence in the district of Seharunpore, while the second "Commissioner lent his assistance to the formation of the settlement for the "pergunnahs resumed from Rajahs Ramdyal and Nyne Syng, our senior Com-"missioner visited the head of the canal, as laid down in the accompanying "sketch, with which we have been favoured by the chief Engineer; and, as "far as he may be permitted to form a judgment upon a subject of which he "can have no professional knowledge, he concurs entirely with the chief En-"gineer's opinion of the practicability of again opening it at no great "expense.

"On the important advantages which may be expected to result from the "measure if feasible, there can be no difference of opinion. Several pergun-"nahs, now almost entirely desolate, will be rapidly restored to cultivation, "and plenty will soon be diffused over a part of the country, where wild "animals now usurp the dominion over mankind.

"What expense it may require to repair the canal in its whole course, can "only be ascertained by a regular survey. From the state in which those few "parts of it which fell under our notice were found to be, the simple intro-"duction of the water from the Jumna, by a restoration of the former dam, "seems sufficient for the re-establishment of the canal: but should the labour "of excavation be found ultimately necessary, to a greater extent than we "are at present led to imagine, the charge of the undertaking, however great, "would be amply repaid by the benefits resulting from its success. Perhaps, "too, the expense might be reduced, by a requisition on the landholders to "contribute the labour of their tenants."

182. It appears that, in consequence of this recommendation, a survey was ordered, which was executed by Captain Tod, of the 25th Native Infantry. The survey report was accompanied by a rough estimate of the probable expense at which the canal might be opened, and which was stated roundly at the sum of a lack and a half or two lacks of rupees. Deterred, perhaps, by the prospect of so large an expenditure, the Government appears to have taken no further steps with a view to forward the undertaking. From every information, however, which I have been able to procure, I think there is good reason to conceive that the expense has been very considerably over-rated. Several intelligent persons whom I have consulted have given it as their opinion, that the expense would fall within the half of the amount of Captain Tod's rough estimate.* Indeed, it may almost be presumed that Captain Tod must have reckoned upon a much deeper excavation than the object of the canal would appear to require; for being merely intended for irrigation, its surface should be as little sunk from the level of the plain as possible.

183. On these grounds, and from a conviction of the inestimable benefit which would result from the execution of this work, I recommend that some further steps be taken, with a view to ascertain with greater precision the expense at which the Dooab Canal might be restored.

Delhi

* Captain Wilson, Civil Architect of Patna, mentioned 20,000 rupees as the probable expense.

Delhi Canal.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

184. To the Canal on the opposite side of the Jumna, generally known by the name of the Delhi or Ali Murdan's Canal, it is unnecessary for me to call your attention. Measures were, I believe, taken, and were already in a train of execution, with a view to ascertain the expense and practicability of re-opening it; and though these measures were interrupted for a time only by the military operations incident to the Goorkha war, which required the services of Lieutenant Blaine in the field, I presume your Honourable Board will be disposed to resume them, now that the more important calls for the services of the engineer officers have ceased.

185. I will only say, that my own inspection has fully convinced me of the facility and the policy of immediately restoring this noble work. Setting aside the consideration of its certain effect, in bringing into cultivation vast tracts of country now deserted, and thereby augmenting importantly the landed revenue of the Honourable Company, the dues to be collected for the distribution of the water from it would make a most lucrative return. This is held so sure, that individuals (for propositions were made to me) would now undertake the business, were it fitting that the credit of a work so dignified, so popular, and so beneficial, should fall to the share of any but the Government. Were a lack of rupees to be laid out yearly, for three years, on this object (and I believe I specify much more than would be actually required for perfecting the canal), it would be money laid out more profitably for the Company than it could be in any other mode of application.

Customs.

186. Next to the revenue derived from land, the most important articles of our territorial receipts are the Customs and Town-duties: These, for the last year, 1813-14, amounted, in the provinces subject to the administration of the Board of Commissioners, to the aggregate sum of Rupees 34,27,488 5. 1.; Rupees 2,43,179 of which were produced by the town-duties. The charges of collection appear to be about three lacks and a half, or somewhat more than ten per cent. The amount, however, actually paid into the treasuries of Government, for the year 1813-14, was a trifle more than thirty lacks. I understand, indeed, that a deficiency has been experienced in the year 1814-15, amounting in the aggregate to near three lacks of rupees: but this is attributed to mere temporary causes, insomuch that the anticipation of even a further increase, beyond the receipts of 1813-14, may be entertained with confidence, when the present unfavourable circumstances may cease to operate.

187. Your Honourable Board is aware of the change of system introduced, in the year 1810-11, into the administration of this branch of our revenue. Your Honourable Board is aware, also, of the advantages which have attended that measure, both to the interests of Government and the general commerce of the country. The inquiries I have made in this respect, have confirmed me in the favourable sentiments I had before conceived respecting it; and I am happy to be able to congratulate your Honourable Board on an increase in the receipts of the year 1813-14, beyond the average of the three years of 1809-10, 1810-11, and 1811-12, in the sum of nearly ten lacks of rupees.

188. The reports of the officers in charge of the Customs at the three stations in the Upper Provinces of Cawnpore, Meeruth, and Agra, I have the honour to lay before your Honourable Board. The latter will be found to contain much useful information respecting the trade in land-salt, one of the staple articles of import into these provinces. I have also the honour to lay before you a report received from the Custom-master of Moorshedabad, exhibiting a very flattering statement of the collections at that station. It appears that the exertions of this officer had procured an increase in collections on account of customs, for the seven months between November 1813 and June 1814, amounting to 1,35,479 rupees, and in the town-duties an increase of 13,502 rupees, beyond what had been collected in the same period the preceding year.

189. On the subject of this branch of territorial revenue I have no particular observations or propositions to offer. It has, however, been suggested to me, that a custom-office might be established with advantage at Monghyr, a station equidistant equidistant from Patna and Moorshedabad, between which two cities there is at present no check upon contraband trade. On the propriety of this measure a reference to the Board of Revenue might be advisable.

Town Duties.

190. It has also been suggested to me, that the town duties might be very considerably increased, by extending them to all other cities in which an European officer may reside, and by a renewal of the old kyalee or weezum kushee duties, a source of revenue apparently abandoned, at least in the Upper Provinces, rather prematurely. Upon this subject, however, a reference to the authorities in England would, perhaps, be requisite, under the legislative provisions of the new charter.

Abkarry and Stamps.

191. The revenue derived by Government from abkarry licences for the sale of spirituous liquors, may be stated generally to amount in the Western Provinces, including Benares, to the annual sum of ten lacks of rupees. This is realized at an expense of about 80,000 rupees, or at eight per cent.* No considerable increase has been obtained in this branch of revenue since the commencement of the administration of the Board of Commissions; nor in the Upper Provinces is any increase generally anticipated from the new system of administration lately introduced.

192. In the Lower Provinces, however, the anticipation appears to be very generally entertained. Indeed, the reports I received in the Lower Provinces seemed to exhibit a more flattering picture of the state of this branch of our revenue, than can be gathered from the generality of the reports of the more western districts. Perhaps this may have its origin in the greater vigilance and more strict attention which the Collectors of the former have it in their power to bestow to this particular duty, since the perpetual settlement has relieved them from so large a portion of those other duties, which fall so heavy on the Collectors of the Western Districts.

193. The modified rules for the conduct of the business of this branch of revenue, and also those respecting stamps, have had operation for so limited a period, that I have not the means, at the present moment, of offering with confidence any opinion on their efficacy or otherwise. I cannot, however, omit noticing a remark of the Collector of Furruckabad on the subject of the stamp-duties, which, as it was the object of the legislature in these modified enactments to extend their operation, may perhaps be deserving of some consideration. The duty on transactions of a commercial nature is said to be so high, that the commercial class have found it more to their interest to evade it. The modes they may find of doing this are immaterial: but it must obviously be to the interests of Government to destroy the feeling; and as it is sought to give to stamps a new and more extended circulation, the doing this, in the first instance, by lowering the rate, instead of by additional inflictions of a penal nature, wouldperhaps be preferable.

Provision of Supplies to Troops.

194. Upon the miscellaneous subjects noticed in the several reports, I shall not trouble your Honourable Board with any detailed observations. The only one which appears to require any particular attention is the necessity of some more adequate provision for the supply of troops in their march. The Collector of Kishennugger complains of the general indisposition of the Zemindars of his district to afford their aid, and of the want of any means of coercion in the event of inattention to his orders. Some of the Collectors of the Upper Provinces have also brought the subject to my notice, and have offered their opinions on the fittest mode of remedying the evil.

195. The Board of Commissioners, I understand, formerly submitted to Government the draft of a Regulation for the provision of the supplies required by individual travellers; and the general principles of it may, perhaps, suggest some hints applicable, or capable of being accommodated, to the business of public supplies. This subject, however, embraces a variety of considerations; nor nor am I yet prepared to submit any specific proposition respecting it, or to suggest with confidence, in the event of no correctives occurring to you, any adequate remedy for the evils alleged to exist under the present system.

* This does not include the commission of the Collector.

Lord Moira's Revenue Minute, 21 Sept. 1815.

Civil Advocate-General or Superintendent of Law-Suits.

196. I cannot refrain from noticing, in this report, a proposition which was lately submitted to your Honourable Board by the Board of Commissioners, a copy of their letter on the subject having been at the same time forwarded to myself. I allude to the recommendation that a civil servant should be appointed to superintend the transactions of Government with the native courts of judicature.

197. The rules under which this office is proposed to be constituted are laid down so perspicuously by the Board, that it is unnecessary for me to dwell upon the detail of the duty which would be assigned to it, or the advantages to the public interests which may be expected to result from the conduct of the several law-suits in which Government may be engaged, under the superintendence of such an officer. The appointment would, however, in my opinion, be attended with many other benefits. Indeed, I should conceive that Government will itself derive advantage from having a law-officer to whom it may apply, whose whole attention will have been devoted to the practice of the several courts, and to the observation of the principles which guide decisions, whether in matters of civil or of criminal jurisprudence.

198. Entertaining this conviction of the expediency of the establishing such an appointment, I beg to support the recommendation of the Board of Commissioners, and to propose to your Honourable Board that a civil servant be appointed to this duty, under the name of Civil Advocate-General or Superintendent of Law-Suits.

199. There are no other topics connected with this important branch of our administration, which my observations or inquiries urge me to suggest for your consideration. Indeed, so many anxious interests of the immediate juncture have pressed upon my attention, that I am by no means satisfied of my having done justice to the subject which I lay before you. Still the suggestions of one who has sought with great earnestness to inform himself accurately on the spot, and who has had the means of recurring to the amplest sources of instruction on the several points, must have their utility, although they may not be fashioned with all the perspicuity of deduction which I should have wished to connect with the exposition of facts. One general position I will advance from what I offer to your notice. The pecuniary advantages of the Company are in a rapidly progressive course in these provinces; but it must not be for a moment forgotten that they are precarious. By preponderance of power, these mines of wealth have been acquired for the Company's treasury: by preponderance of power alone can they be retained. The supposition, that we can discard the means of strength, and yet enjoy the fruits of it, is one that is certain of being speedily dissipated in the present state of India: were we to be feeble, our riches would be a dream, and a very short one.

200. The Board will observe, that in the above observations no allusion is made to the Revenue administration of the territory placed under the control of the Resident at Delhi. There are, undoubtedly, in that division, several features which distinguish it from the other districts of the Western Provinces; and I should have been desirous of tracing them in part, and of marking the shades of difference between an administration conducted under the Regulations, and one devised by the enlightened, uninfluenced mind of individuals, and carried into execution with only the control of their own judgment. The report, however, presented to me by the Resident, did not reach me until after the above observations had been fashioned. I should now have difficulty to interweave it. It is, nevertheless, in itself so perfect in every respect, is so replete with the soundest principles, and elucidates them so ably and perspicuously, that I offer it with entire confidence to your special consideration, professing that, as far as relates to the Revenue administration of the territory under his charge, the conceptions expressed by Mr. Metcalfe are exactly consonant to those which I had entertained from other sources of information.

Mr. Hastings's Minute. 1 November 1776.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 1st November, 1776.

The Governor-General delivers in the following Minute.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL. 1st November, 1776.

In whatever manner it may be hereafter determined to form the new settlements of the provinces, after the expiration of the present leases, it will be equally necessary to be previously furnished with accurate statements of the real value of the lands, as the grounds on which it is to be constructed. To obtain these will be the work of much official knowledge, some management, and unremitted labour, in compiling and collecting the accounts of the past collections, in digesting the materials which may be furnished by the provincial councils and dewans, in issuing orders for special accounts and other materials of information, and in deputing native officers on occasional investigations. It is impossible for the Board to conduct a business of such detail, neither can it be left wholly to the provincial councils: it requires uniformity in the design, authority in the execution, and an extraordinary share of responsibility, to animate the zeal of those who are entrusted with the charge of it.

I therefore propose, that a temporary office be constituted to execute this business, under the conduct of one or two covenanted servants of the Company, assisted by a Dewan and other officers, either selected from the officers of the kalsa, or occasionally chosen for special commissions; that, for the sake of dispatch, all orders issued from this office for the execution of such particular services as shall have received the general sanction of the Board be written in the name of the Governor-General, and the control of it be committed to his immediate charge.

Besides the immediate duty of this office, which I have above described, and which I suppose to be indispensably necessary and essential to the formation of an equal settlement, many other points of inquiry will be also useful to secure to the Ryots the perpetual and undisturbed possession of their lands, and to guard them against arbitrary exactions. This is not to be done by proclamations and edicts, nor by indulgencies to the Zemindars and farmers. The former will not be obeyed, unless enforced by Regulations so framed as to produce their own effect, without requiring the hand of Government to interpose its support; and the latter, though it may feed the luxury of the Zemindars or the rapacity of the farmers, will prove no relief to the cultivator, whose welfare ought to be the immediate and primary care of Government.

The design of establishing new pottahs for the Ryots, the failure of which has been often objected to as a reproach on the late administration, has been tried with equal ill success by the present, in their late settlement of Burdwan, where, notwithstanding the solemn engagement of the Zemindar, and the peremptory injunctions of Government, not a pottah has yet been granted (if my information is true, and it may easily be proved), nor will be granted, of a different tenure from those which have been customary for some years past, unless more regular means are taken to produce them. Future effects may be concluded from such simple causes, without the spirit of prophecy. It is the interest of the Zemindar to exact the greatest rent he can from the Ryots; and it is as much against his interest to fix the deeds by which the Ryots hold their lands and pay their rents, to certain bounds and defences against his own authority. The foundation of such a work must be laid by Government itself. All that I would here propose is, to collect the materials for it, by obtaining copies of the present pottahs and of the nerric bund, or rates of land by which they are regulated in each district, and every other information which may throw a light on this subject, and enable the Board hereafter to establish a more permanent and regular mode of taxation.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,
The 5th November, 1776.

Mr. Francis's Minute. 5 November 1776.

Mr. Francis delivers in the following Minute, in reply to the Governor-General's, entered on the close of last day's proceedings.

Mr. Francis.

I have considered the Governor-General's proposal for the institution of a new office in the Revenue department, for the purposes therein described, with the strictest attention, and with every disposition which the Governor-General himself could wish to impress upon me, to co-operate with him in the plan and execution of the ensuing settlement. I deem it my duty, in the first instance, to deliver my sentiments freely on every measure which has relation to this important subject; in the next, to assist even in the conduct of arrangements which I may not approve, and to promote their success when once they are resolved on. In this respect, my conduct, after a resolution taken, will not be affected by the opinion I may express in a previous debate. The Governor has been long acquainted with my general opinion on the subject of a permanent settlement, and I persuade myself, will not attribute my disapprobation of the proposal now before me to any other motives but those which I profess.

If nothing else were in question but the institution of a temporary office for the dispatch of a voluminous and intricate business, to collect and methodize confused materials, and to make inquiries, or to issue orders purely of detail, in the name of the Governor, under the general sanction of the Board, I should yield to it without difficulty, whether convinced or not of the utility of the institution. The person on whom the principal share of responsibility will fall ought to be assisted, in that way in which he may chiefly think he wants assistance.

My objections go to the avowed and implied principles of the plan, in the formation of which the new office is to be employed. I collect the principles of the Governor's plan from the inquiries he intends to make. The nature of the information he proposes to obtain suggests to me the only purpose to which it can be applied; it is possible, however, that I may be mistaken in both instances.

First proposed object. "To be previously furnished with accurate statements of the value of the lands; and these to be obtained from the accounts of the past collections, from materials furnished by the provincial councils, from special accounts and other materials of information, and by deputing native officers on occasional investigations."

I would first ask, what is the purpose of this accurate valuation of the lands? Is it meant to exact from the people the utmost revenue they can possibly pay; or shall we content ourselves, once for all, with such a revenue, as the services of the Government, constituted as it is at present, indispensably require?

If the first was a just or attainable object, it ought to have been effected by the Committee of Circuit's settlement. The lands were let to the highest bidders, without any other consideration, for the avowed purpose of ascertaining the utmost revenue which Government could obtain from them. The actual collections made on this plan ought, therefore, to be admitted as the test of what the country, upon the whole, will pay. In this sense, I am convinced it will prove too much, because no fair conclusion can be drawn from a temporary rack-rent to a permanent revenue.

If, at this time, any more particular informations are necessary, I wish to know of what nature they are, and from what sources they are to be procured. Will the farmers, or any of their agents, furnish us with accounts of their actual collections? That is, will they make us acquainted with their profits, merely because we ask them; especially after all of them have applied for remissions, and many have obtained them? Hitherto, their communications to Government exhibit nothing but loss, deficiencies, balances, and the necessity of remissions. If they give us any mofussil accounts whatsoever, we may be assured that such accounts will be falsified. Neither can we expect more credible information from the Zemindars, whom we have dispossessed of the management of their lands, and removed from any concern in the collections, or whom we have reduced to the condition of farmers, and of course obliged to act upon the same principles. These are the very last people from whom, in their their present circumstances, we have any right to expect any assistance. A system of taxation, which avowedly aims, or is supposed to aim at raising the greatest possible revenue, is in its nature hostile to every species of private property, and tends to make every proprietor an enemy to Government. To such a system the people of this country have nothing to oppose, but a concealment of whatever means or fortune they have left. This is their only and last defence; and this, it is supposed, will not be given up without difficulty, upon the first attempt of Government to penetrate through it.

But perhaps it is meant to obtain the proposed accounts from the Ryots themselves. In that case, some millions of the lowest order of the people are to be separately asked, what each of them has paid, in any given period, to the farmer or collector immediately above him, and Government must not only confide in the truth of his answer, but in the exactness of the report of it. Now, I apprehend, it is not for the interest of the Ryot to speak the truth, in any case, in answer to such an inquiry. If he supposes it made for the purpose of giving him relief, he will exaggerate his distresses and the oppression he labours under. But as his experience is not likely to suggest that idea to him, and as diffidence, distrust in Government, and fear of any alteration, are the first principles of action with the natives of all ranks, he will probably suspect that the inquiry is not made for his benefit, but either with a view to load him with new taxes, or to continue him at the utmost rate he had ever paid. In this case, he will sink the amount of his actual payments, lest what he is able to pay in future should be determined by what he has paid heretofore.

Let it be supposed, nevertheless, that by some means or other, all difficulties are overcome, and that we are in possession of exact copies of the accounts of the mofussil collections: I then wish the Board to consider what an enormous mass of loose, confused, and intricate Bengally accounts will be thrown upon our hands, out of which two of the Company's covenanted servants, with the assistance of a few native officers, are to draw a clear distinct abstract of the actual collections of every village in the three provinces. All this must be done some time before April next; and Government is to be so well assured of the accuracy of the account, that we may safely make it the foundation of our settlement. The complex idea which the whole operation gives me is a union of confusion and impossibility, through which, I am confident, no human penetration can find its way.

In considering the object of the proposed accurate valuation of the lands, supposing it attainable, it appears to me that it would be useless, except for the single purpose of levying the greatest possible revenue. The valuation itself could only be true at one given point of time. The proportionate value of land fluctuates, in all countries, according to the immediate industry or ability of the owners. In this country, more particularly, it depends on accidents of drought, inundation, or unfavourable seasons, of which no general calculation can be formed. But this object, I hope and believe, is not in contemplation. An attempt to annihilate all intermediate profits between the Ryot and the Government, if it were just and reasonable in itself, I am confident would succeed, though it would be productive of mischief in many other senses. Oppression would still exact, and fraud pervert from the receipt of Government, those profits which we might endeavour to abolish; but in that case, instead of supporting the natural and lawful proprietors of the soil, they would sink with agents, collectors, and farmers, "a race of men who have no bowels for the contributors, "who are not their subjects, and whose universal bankruptcy, if it should happen the day after their farm is expired, would not much affect their interest." The idea itself supposes the extinction of those successive ranks of subordination in society, through which the operations of Government descend, by regular and easy gradations, from the summit to the base. When the simple and natural channels of authority are quitted or discomposed, the state itself loses that shape and proportion, which constitute its strength and qualify it for duration.

What, then, is the present object of Government? We know the amount of our expenses, and we know in general what the country can pay: we also know, that in general it has been much over-rated. Our provincial councils are able to inform us, what particular districts have been favoured or oppressed, in what parts the collections have been realized without difficulty, and what districts indispensably requires relief. Our own constant experience tells us, that upon the whole there ought to be a remission. I admit that an assessment, formed on these grounds, may not be perfectly accurate or equal; but this inconvenience, whatever it may be, is neither capable of a remedy, nor does it deserve to be regarded. The inequalities of an assessment, in itself not excessive and intolerable, will soon level of themselves, provided all parties know with certainty the utmost they are to pay, and are assured they will not be exposed to an arbitrary increase of demands on future improvements. Without a fixed jumma, I affirm that no other measures whatsoever can save the country. A conquered province, especially at such a distance from the seat of empire, can have no other possible security against the ministers and representatives of the governing powers. Mr. Francis's Minute.

I am sensible that my opinion, on this or any other great political question, is no authority; I desire therefore to support it by those of men already in possession of the public respect and esteem. I fear no condemnation which may involve me with Doctor Smith, Sir James Stuart, and Montesquieu.

" It is no easy matter to frame the valuation of all the property of a country, " and it is a scheme I should be very far from proposing, unless the spirit of a " nation took such a turn as to wish it; but where a determinate sum has been " in use, to be levied upon a certain district, it does not appear so difficult to " make a proportional distribution of it according to equity, and to adhere, for " the future, to that distribution, considering it as a proportionate valuation if " not a real one. This is done every year, and without it no such tax could " be raised. But when annual distributions are made, discontents constantly " arise, and the pretended equality thereby observed produces worse effects " than the inequalities which would follow from the other scheme, because the " change in the relative value of possessions would be then chiefly owing to the " industry of every proprietor in improving his lot."—Vide Sir J. Stuart's Inquiry into the Nature of Political Economy, Volume II, Page 563.

" A fluctuating annual valuation, which is the case in France, produces " numberless inconveniences; and, upon the whole, they are far greater than " those which it is intended to avoid.

" I agree, that the same land may be worth more one year than another; " but it is impossible, by a fluctuating valuation, to ascertain that difference " over a whole country, to the satisfaction of every one: and although, by fix- " ing it at one rate upon every possession, inequalities must take place, yet " fixing it from rising in proportion to improvement will prove an encourage- " ment to industry, which will greatly overbalance such an inequality. Every " one then will be in the way of acquiring an addition to his income, free of " land-tax; and if this be thought too great an encouragement to improve- " ment, let the regulation be only fixed for a determinate time: suppose a " century. This is no more than giving every one, as it were, a lease of their " land-tax for an hundred years; and experience shews that, without granting " long leases, it is impossible that lands should ever be improved."—Vide ibid. Vol. II, Page 578.

" The uncertainty of taxation encourages the insolence and favours the cor- " ruption of an order of men who are naturally unpopular, even where they " are neither insolent nor corrupt. The certainty of what each individual " ought to pay, is in taxation a matter of so great importance, that a very " considerable degree of inequality, it appears, I believe from the experience " of all nations, is not near so great an evil as a very small degree of uncertain- " ty."—Vide Dr. Smith's Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, 4to. Vol. II, page 424.

" In forming a register of the different classes of landed property, it is very " difficult to ascertain the several differences; and still more so, to find people " who have no interest in mistaking them. This creates two kinds of injustice; " that which is in the officer of Government, and that which is inherent in the " thing itself. But if, on the whole, the tax be not excessive, if it still leaves " plenty to the people, these particular inequalities are of no moment. If, on " the contrary, nothing is left to the people but what is precisely necessary for their

Mr. Francis's Minute.

"their existence, the least disproportion will be of the greatest importance."—Montesquieu, Book XIII, chap. 7.

The second object of the proposed office is, "to secure to the "Ryots the perpetual and undisturbed possession of their lands, "and to guard them against arbitrary taxations. This is to be "effected by new pottahs, formed "on an inspection of the present "pottahs and of the rates of land by "which they are regulated in each "district."

Before I enter further into the wide field which this part of the plan opens to me, I must clear it of an argument used by the Governor, which I think represents but a part of the fact it refers to. "It is asserted, that not a pottah has "yet been granted in Burdwan, notwithstanding the "Zemindar's engagement and the injunctions of Govern-"ment."

The time limited for granting such pottahs is not escaped, and I do not yet despair of some degree of success for the rest. I shall content myself with remarking, that the measures of a divided council may be defeated by difficulties external to them, and that a failure proves nothing but that the entire strength and influence of Government did not accompany the execution. This, I fear, may happen in other instances, as long as the merits and success of one part of the administration can be interpreted as a reproach, or viewed with dissatisfaction by the other.

It is proposed to secure to the Ryots the perpetual and undisturbed possession of their lands. This language, I know, is popular, and has been often used without any apparent benefit to the Ryot, to countenance and give a colour to acts of violence and injustice against the Zemindars and other superior ranks of the natives. The real question is not clear, perhaps, to every apprehension; but it is very material not to mistake it. Before we give perpetual possession, we ought to determine the property. This state does not consist of nothing but the ruler and the Ryot; nor is it true, that the Ryot is proprietor of the land. It is not even necessary that he should be so, either for his own benefit or that of Government. The scheme of every regular Government requires that the mass of the people should labour, and that the few should be supported by the labours of the many, who receive their retribution in the peace, protection, and security which accompany just authority and regular subordination. The supposed luxury of the Zemindars is, I confess, a new idea to me. The rapacity of the farmers is not to be disputed; but it does not follow, that because the Ryot has no direct permanent property in the lands, he should therefore have no right, or that no care should be taken to protect him. Without his assistance the land is useless to the Zemindar. If they are left to themselves, they will soon come to an agreement, in which each party will find his advantage: the pottah is the evidence and security of this voluntary agreement. In the present state of the country, the Ryot has, in fact, the advantage over the Zemindar. Where so much land lies waste, and so few hands are left for cultivation, the peasant must be courted to undertake it. At all events, the interposition of Government between them should have no object but to enforce the execution of their respective engagements. To dictate the specific terms of every lease, is an invasion of the rights of property, in the first instance. It is a business of detail which no way belongs to Government, which we are in no sense equal to, and which carries a vexatious scrutiny and an arbitrary exertion of power upon the face of it. Government, after assessing the Zemindar, or landlord, according to his portion of the public revenue, is supposed to enter into the management of his patrimony, and to prescribe to him the rates at which he shall be obliged to parcel it out to his tenants. The idea of guarding the Ryots against arbitrary exaction is just and attainable, though not by the method proposed; but I affirm that it is wholly incompatible with the principles of a Government, which claims and exercises a right of arbitrary taxation, and whose professed object is to exact the greatest possible revenue from the country. Let us begin with setting an example of justice and moderation to our subjects: let us proportion our demands to our necessities, not to their utmost abilities. A mild and equitable Government will gradually extend and communicate the principles on which itself acts to the ranks and powers subordinate to it. Tyranny creates tyranny and is obliged to support it.

Upon the whole, I cannot be more clearly satisfied in my opinion, than that the Governor-General's plan tends to load him with an enormous detail of business, which it is impossible for him to accomplish; that the proposed accounts cannot cannot be procured without dispersing a multitude of indigent and rapacious black officers through the country; that if attainable, they could not be depended upon; and that if they were ever so accurate, they ought not to be the grounds of the ensuing settlement.

Mr. Francis's Minute.

Occasional aumeens and other incidental charges: these cannot be fixed nor estimated. He has affixed the names of the gentlemen whom he wishes to be nominated to the superintendency of this establishment, because he considers them as essential parts of it, having made choice of them as persons endowed both with talents and knowledge, peculiarly adapted to the duties assigned them, and on whose dispositions he can entirely depend for their cordial agreement with each other in the discharge of them. He recommends Mr. Henry Vansittart to be the Persian translator: he also recommends that the office of Peshkar be assigned to Gunga Govind Sing, the Naib Dewan of the kalsa, and that he be allowed 700 rupees per month for his salary as Naib Dewan of the kalsa only, none having yet been allotted to that station.

The known abilities of Gunga Govind Sing will justify the preference shewn to him in this appointment. The business, in its detail, must be conducted by a Peshkar. The gentlemen to whom the Governor-General proposes to commit the direction of it will think it no derogation from their characters, of which which no man can have an higher estimation than he has, or a more perfect reliance on their integrity, if he expresses it as his opinion, that the greatest experience which can fall to the lot of any covenanted servants of the Company, will prove unequal to the minute investigation of all the progressive operations of the revenue in this country, without the aid of that professional knowledge which is possessed by the native Muttsuddies of Bengal, of whom Gunga Govind Sing is incontestibly the first.

For the reimbursement of the charges of this office, should the amount prove so considerable as to require it, a small fee may be taken on each aumeelnama or cabooleat to be granted in the future settlement, which will not affect the jumma, nor be felt, at such a time, by those who will be required to pay it.

Mr. Barwell.

MR. BARWELL.—I approve.

Mr. Francis.

MR. FRANCIS.—My objections to the measure itself have been stated at large. As they have been overruled by a resolution of the Board, I shall make no others.

Resolved, That the office be established, and the appointments made as proposed by the Governor-General.

Ordered, That the Secretary advise Messrs. Anderson and Bogle of their appointments.

Mr. Barwell delivers in the following minute:

Mr. Barwell's Minute.

MR. BARWELL.—I assent to the Governor-General's minute. A compilation and digest of materials, whereon to form a new and permanent settlement of the provinces, must be useful, and is, in my opinion, unavoidable. The last leases have furnished the means which will give an insight into the real value of the lands; but these means are not yet in our possession, and may still leave something for completer discovery, and for the guidance of a decision on which the prosperity of an extensive kingdom for a considerable period is probably suspended. No researches can be too minute, no informations too voluminous. I see my own, and I see the situation of every Member of Council to be equally delicate on this important affair: an affair liable to be viewed in various and even opposite lights, and to be canvassed in every step of its progress. The grand object in which all our sentiments unite, and to the necessity of which we all subscribe, is a solid establishment of the revenues upon an abated taxation. But it is not my opinion, in support of Mr. Francis or of any other member of administration, that will impress a conviction of this necessity upon the minds of those whose distant situations debar them from all possibility of personal observation.

My own sentiments, it is true, are clearly for a reduction of the revenue, as absolutely requisite for the future welfare of this country; and while I heartily coincide with Mr. Francis in most of his general ideas upon this subject, so far as they clash not with the peculiar customs of Bengal, I think they may well be reconciled to the investigations proposed by the Honourable Governor, and that our judgment in so interesting a business should be formed upon the best principles of accuracy.

To set this matter in the clearest point of view, let us consider it from the Governor's proposition for the institution of a temporary office. A new settlement of the provinces will be necessary upon the expiration of the present leases. We are unanimously agreed, that a fixed valuation should take place in the revenues, and that some diminution should be made in the present rents; lastly, we propose that this important settlement should be permanent. On such a step we should surely endeavour to convince the Company, whose agents we are, and whose prosperity is blended with that of this country, that we have not negligently slumbered over their interests, or omitted any possible mode of ascertaining the true and ultimate value of their possessions. Nor is this all: we would convince them decisively, that no future administration may have the smallest opening to hint that deeper researches might might have produced a more equal and equitable system for the natives, and a more advantageous bargain for our employers. Another good effect, to which we should turn our thoughts, is that of rendering the bulk of the people well affected to Government; an attempt which can never succeed, but in their steady reliance on its impartiality. And with all deference to the high authorities quoted by Mr. Francis, and in concurrence with them, I will venture to affirm, that an equitable taxation is the great desideratum, and should be the first object of a good Government; and that such an attention to the welfare of the peasant and the manufacturer, is the ground-work of a well-regulated state.

The first improvements of the revenues, and relief of the laborious part of the kingdom in France, were projected by the great Duke of Sully, upon the same principles, and brought to effect by an application of the very same means as those now proposed by the Governor-General. He commenced with a most extensive and arduous collection of minute details in that branch; and from mature consideration of those detached voluminous materials, detected every species of artifice and fraud committed by the farmers, and employed the result of his discoveries towards lightening the burden upon the shoulders of the commonalty.

We now wish to shake off all rival adventurers, and instead of farming, to fix the rates of lands with the several old Zemindars, wherever it can be done with a probability of success. This mode of settlement, though it has certainly many advantages, is yet liable, under certain circumstances, to very strong objections, some arising from the Zemindar himself, such as his minority or total incapacity for business, and some from the nature of the lands. Besides, as the present proposed system must preclude all competition of candidates for the same lands, by granting them to their hereditary proprietors, it necessarily opens a large field for indulgence and partiality, to which the former mode of settlement precluded all access, by allowing the indiscriminate tender of proposals; for which reason it is clearly my opinion, that our employers will but faintly co-operate with our measures, or ratify our decisions, if we appear to have hastily employed the informations gained from the temporary engagements, which they may possibly think imperfect, as materials for our own more lasting establishment, especially while we had in our hands the means of procuring more accurate knowledge, and while we were timely warned by the first member of the state to exert them.

Therefore, when we propose a more impartial, and at the same time a reduced taxation, the least we can do is surely to give the Company satisfactory reasons for this drawback upon their income, and sufficient evidence that the impoverished state of the country loudly pleaded for such an abatement. A proposition of this nature does not carry self-evident conviction upon the face of it, but must be supported by argument, confirmed by experience and established upon proofs, by which the present excess of the taxation may be made to serve as a reason, and as the authority for our admission of a decrease. The most probable method of acquitting ourselves by these proofs is offered to us by the Governor-General, in the proposal of gaining the most accurate possible account of the payments actually made by the husbandmen, exclusive of its being essential to the relief which it may be necessary to give them, before Government can venture to expect any adequate advantage from fixing the revenue. Add to this, that there seems but small occasion for doubting the authenticity of the materials to be procured. Collateral informations will always serve as a check upon each other, while every man is actuated by a separate and peculiar motive, or so long as there remains a divided opinion in the world.

I am likewise persuaded, that Administration cannot have a more important topic of discussion, or object of action, than to define and secure the rights of the people: and in this country, where all territorial property centers ultimately in Government, and where the Zemindar holds his own lands but by a pottah, the same tenure by which his under-tenants hold them again from him, I think the public eye should have a watch upon those as well as the former, and that it would tend as much to the interest of the state as to the satisfaction of the greater number of inhabitants, that all pottahs should be equally well defined, and be guaranteed from all violation with an equal authority.

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12November 1776.

Mr. Barwell's Minute.

Personal property ought as much to be sacred in the pittance of the poor as in the possessions of the rich: and as I have said, "the welfare of the husbandmen and manufacturer is the ground-work of a well regulated state," it follows that I deem it to be the first object of this Government to fence and secure the Ryots against the arbitrary power of their Zemindars; otherwise no one regulation we may resolve on can, in its immediate or remote consequences, answer the beneficent design for which it was formed. The wealth of every country is to be found in the wealth of the commonalty alone; especially in this country, where the peculiar manners and superstitions of the higher class either influence them to secrete their acquisitions, to dissipate them in religious endowments out of the provinces, or in the ostentatious folly of giving daily food and subsistence to a number of idle dependents, who by such means are totallly separated from the bulk of the people, and who must otherwise have been usefully employed in the manufactures and cultivation of the country I acknowledge the task is extremely difficult and arduous; but unless the rights of the common people are well defined and well secured, I am persuaded all our speculations will only tend to enrich the Zemindars, and either lock up in their hands a large portion of the current specie, or divert it to the most pernicious purposes, and precipitate that very decay we are endeavouring to guard against.

The Secretary lays before the Board the following Minute received from the General on the same subject.

General Clavering.

General Clavering's Minute.

I have perused with attention the Governor-General's minute of 1st instant, and confess myself at a loss for words to express my astonishment at such an attempt to wrest out of the hands of the Council so important a branch of the administration of this country, as the ordering, management, and government of all the territorial acquisitions of the kingdom of Bengal, &c. vested in them by the late Act of Parliament, of which I hold it a direct breach, being a most illegal usurpation of the powers conferred by that Act upon the united Members of this Government, and as such I most solemnly protest against it.

If, to elude this protest, it should be stated that the object of the measure protested against is only to collect materials for future management, and not to usurp the ordering or management itself, let me ask, Why, at this time, when it is notorious that the Government of this country is in fact vested in the Governor-General and Mr. Barwell exclusively, though nominally and descriptively in the Governor-General and Council, that the Governor-General should propose to have all orders written in his own name, and the controul committed to his immediate charge? Again: will not the orders to be issued by the Governor-General throughout the provinces suspend the action of all the other orders given by the Governor-General and Council, or their delegates, the provincial councils, by virtue of the independent powers now required to be given to him? And will not the existence of such authority, unlimited both in duration and extent, deprive the other members of Administration of the power of taking any further steps in the ordering and management of the revenues, for the purpose of forming the new settlement, although legally indivisibly conferred upon the united body of the whole Council? And then, will not this suspension, in effect, amount to an usurpation of a separate management or sole control, which I protest against?

Independent of this, the plan of establishing an office under the immediate and sole control of the Governor, in order to be furnished with accurate statements of the real value of the land; or, in other words, once more to investigate them, for the probable purpose of forming a new settlement at the presidency, to be executed by such powers, and entrusted in the hands of such agents as will be employed, appears to me incompatible with the rules of the former administration of the Revenue, with the constitution of the offices already established under the presidency, and indeed with every political principle that should regulate a wise Government; in short, solely tending to disturb the minds of the people, and to throw the whole system of the administration of the revenue into confusion. All the mischiefs of the Committee of Circuit will be be renewed, by the unjustifiable hopes it will hold out of acquiring wealth by obtaining farms distributed under the influence of this newly created office. The country will flock to the presidency, and Europeans and natives will all crowd the Governor's levees, in expectation of sharing a part of the plunder.

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 November 1776.

Gen. Clavering's Minute.

It is difficult to guess by whom a project, so big with mischiefs, could be devised. I am told the natives, however, ascribe it to Cantoo Baboo, the Governor's Banyan. He had been absent for more than a year from the presidency: he was no sooner returned than the plan made its appearance. It is true, he is more interested than any body in concealing the actual collection of his farms, and in secreting the value of his talooks, which he holds as an inheritance.

Whether or not I have ascribed the project to its proper owner, and have accounted rightly for his intention in it, it is most certain that it will be carried on and managed under his immediate influence, and that he will have the appointment of all the native officers under it.

The first obvious measure of the new office must be to establish their own power, and that of their agents, throughout the provinces: and with what moderation they will exercise that power, countenanced and supported as they will be, I leave Mr. Hastings' knowledge of the character of the people to determine. He can well judge whether they are likely to be disinterested in taking the mofussil accounts, and not shewing favour where they are most rewarded. He can determine whether they are not likely to disturb the present collections; and whether, in that case, the failure of the present year's revenue is to be imputed to the measures of the late majority, or to the appearance of so many rapacious agents in the districts. I think it cannot be doubted, but that when it is so much the interest of the Ryot to conceal his property, it is not likely he will withhold a tribute to the agent to secure himself against a perpetual taxation.

The Governor-General must know the necessity there is of holding the poonah in April for the new settlement, and, for that purpose, that at least two months' previous notice ought to be given of the intentions of Government in forming it; and he ought, therefore, to be aware of the shortness of the time, and how improbable it is that these agents, even supposing they were not to be diverted from the object of their mission by the honour and lucre of their employ, would be able to go through an accurate investigation of the accounts of each village in such a short period.

Upon a supposition, however, that they had over-run the country and collected together the accounts, such as they may be supposed to be under such management, then there still remains the inconvenience of concentring in the Governor-General all the information which may be obtained by their inquiries.

If the Eagle packet, which the Company acquainted us would sail in June last, should arrive, and bring out orders that should obstruct the Governor-General in the pursuit of his plan, just at the time when it may be ripe for execution, the Council, unacquainted with the whole plan, will neither be able to complete it nor to adopt any other.

Next, as to the expense; if that can be allowed to be a consideration when so great a benefit is in contemplation. The small part of it already fixed amounts to 5,000 rupees per month, and for the rest, the Governor himself does not even venture to throw a guess at what it may amount to, but this he deems immaterial, as he readily obviates the difficulty by the old plan of levying it upon the country by a mahtook, which he concludes it will be able to bear, forgetting how far the remissions he has lately found necessary to make of the whole amount balances of the Kisnagur Rajah and others will support that opinion. But not to discuss a point so evident, let me ask, whether any payment from the country, instead of the treasury, can be a saving to the Company, one being supplied from the other, and both equally their property? But arguments upon savings are vain, when the necessity of an expense is so urgent as in the present instance. Having no establishment of local agents already in pay and authority, from whose long residence and experience we

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

Gen. Clavering's Minute.

we can expect the required information, it follows that new powers and new expenses must be framed to effect it. And had the Committee of Circuit (whose regulations the Court of Directors have enjoined us to consider as standing orders) not appointed a Roy-Royan, a Superintendent of the Khalsa, and an Accountant-General, for the purpose of digesting and reporting upon all mofussil statements and accounts, the Governor-General might have urged, that the Board being inadequate to the labour of digesting them a new office was necessary.

I will only add, that by the present plan, all former arguments of the late majority against the Committee of Circuit stand not only confirmed, but redoubled, by this self-condemnation. What the penetrating eye of the most experienced and oldest servants (all Members of the Council, with the Governor at their head) themselves upon the spot, with the whole power of Government in their hand, could not attain a true insight of, and this since corrected and discussed by five years collections, is yet to be sought for, and now to be expected, at the distance of some hundred miles, by two junior servants, one of whom is barely out of his writership, above one year of which he was absent from the country.

If a new investigation is now necessary, I can see no point of it that cannot be as effectually compassed, and even much more so, by the provincial councils; a natural unalarming channel, without expense and without any unnatural medium or unconstitutional authority: whereas the new plan is directly the contrary, and will possibly be totally thwarted (at least in the attainment of any good) in the very first outset, by the universal alarm so eccentric a motion will create and must continue to cause.

Mr. Francis has more fully answered the particulars; wherein chiefly coinciding, I forbear repetitions, excepting to the circumstance of the pottahs, upon which I will only say, that if they have not yet been issued, although ordered five years past, the Governor-General must look to himself for the blame; for had he exerted his authority when the Committee was upon the respective spots, or had he not, by himself and the influence of his executive powers and the counteractions of his dependents, thwarted our attempts to effect it, they would not now remain to be discussed in a new plan: and considering the present constitution of the Government, I cannot, with Mr. Francis, flatter myself with hopes of success in the accomplishment of our late orders to Burdwan upon this subject.

In one point further I differ with Mr. Francis. My objections to this measure not depending on opinion, but being made directly to its illegality, I cannot strain my sense of duty to promise, as he does, that I will support it when it is resolved to be carried into execution.

In the appointment that the Governor-General has made of officers to fill the new office, he has very particularly set forth the merits of Gunga Govind Sing, whom he had but a few days before restored to his office of Dewan to the Calcutta Committee, as if the office of right belonged to him. It must be remarked, however, that the Governor-General has been very guarded, in not adding official probity in the encomiums which he has so liberally given to him. It is very well known that he was dismissed from his office on an accusation of Comaul ul Deen Cawn, whose testimony the Governor-General cannot but admit; particularly as the fact has been established in the supreme court, on the trial of Mr. Fowke, that he, Gunga Govind Sing, had taken from him twenty-two thousand rupees collusively, for certain purposes, and for which he was to allow Comaul ul Deen to run a quantity of salt.

As the duties of the new office must necessarily engage the whole time of this minister, it would have been reasonable, when the Governor-General thought proper to appoint him Peschcar at the khalsa, with the salary of Rupees 700 a month, that he would have been pleased to have taken into consideration that it will be impossible for this same man to perform so many various duties, together with those belonging to his office of Dewan to the Calcutta Committee, which office will probably be totally neglected if some other man is not appointed to superintend it.

The

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

The Governor-General delivers in the following reply to Mr. Francis' minute of the 5th instant:

Governor-General.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL.—I am thankful to Mr. Francis for the promise which he has given me of his assistance in promoting the arrangements which may be formed for the new settlement, even though they may not be such as he approves. After such an assurance, even his objections to the office, which I have recommended for that purpose, have a claim to my acknowledgements; and I hope to benefit by his assistance, more cheerfully given, when he shall discover that our objects are the same, and that though we do not agree in our opinion of the means which I have recommended, yet the difficulties which he apprehends in the execution of them are not only surmountable, but such as have always yielded to the same mode of investigation, constantly and successfully practised under the Mogul Government.

When I recommended the institution of an office for compiling the materials which were necessary for the new settlement, I meant no more than to shew the necessity of it, and to propose the ultimate objects of its researches. It was as foreign from my purpose, as it would have been premature, to mark out every stage of its progress, which from the nature of it, must be subject to variations, or to determine either the precise mode or amount of the settlement, which it was the professed design of this investigation to ascertain.

For the satisfaction, however, which Mr. Francis requires, I will endeavour to give him a fuller explanation of the design of the office which I have recommended, and of the detail business which is to be, or may be assigned to it.

I have already said, that the general design of it was to obtain an accurate state of the real value of the lands, as the only ground-work on which the new settlement could be constructed. I mean, on which it could be constructed, so that the burthen of the public revenue should rest with an equal weight upon the whole body of the people.

On this subject, Mr. Francis' minute contains two propositions: first, that the inconveniences of an unequal assessment ought not to be regarded; and next, that those inconveniences do not admit of a remedy.

More used to the practice of business than to speculation, I beg to be excused from discussing these propositions as general and abstract questions; and instead of considering them as principles which are equally applicable to any country, I wish to confine them merely to the revenue of Bengal.

The opinions of Montesquieu, Sir James Stuart, and Dr. Smith, which are produced to shew that an unequal assessment is attended with few or no inconveniences, may be just, as to those countries where the land-tax bears but a small proportion to the amount of the produce; and any attempt to alter the proportions of a land-tax which have been established by ancient custom, might, as they suppose, give rise to those discontents, which amongst a high spirited people every innovation is apt to excite: but the case is different in Bengal.

Let us suppose, for instance, that in England the proportion of the rent of land taken by Government is a fifth-part, and in some places, from an inequality in the assessment, amounts only to an eighth part. In the first case, the proprietor, after paying the tax, will have four-fifths, or sixteen shillings in the pound, and in the last, seventeen shillings and sixpence, to himself. But in Bengal, nine-tenths of the net produce, or eighteen shillings in the pound, are generally supposed to belong to Government, and the remaining tenth to be the property of the landholder; or, in other words, a Zemindar, whose land produces 1,00,000 rupees, pays 90,000 rupees to Government, and has a right to retain 10,000 rupees to himself: but should this land happen to be rated at 1,05,000 rupees, or only one-twentieth part above its value, then instead of 10,000 rupees the possessor would receive only 5,500 rupees, or little more than one-half of his just income; while another man, who inherits a zemindarry of equal value, but which is reputed to be worth only 95,000 rupees, or one-twentieth part under-rated, will, instead of 10,000 rupees, enjoy an income of 14,500 rupees. Thus the inaccuracy of a twentieth part of the valuation,

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

Governor-General;

valuation, more or less, will render the estate of one Zemindar almost three times more profitable to him than that of another, whose lands are of equal value; and this operates not only as an inconvenience, but as a heavy oppression.

It is easy to shew, that the unequal valuation of lands in Bengal is productive of this evil, and that while some landholders, after paying their rents, retain enough to live in ease and affluence, others are reduced to beggary; and unless the mercy of Government interposes to save them, their estates are sold, to make good the portion of revenue which has been arbitrarily assessed upon them. The truth of this fact is established by the disposal which has been made of zemindarries in the division of Dacca, by the sale which was proposed of the Rajah of Nuddea's land, by the number of wealthy farmers who have been ruined in the Behar province, and by the sale of talooks lately made by the council at Moorshedabad.

Nor is any alteration in the assessment likely to produce discontents, because it will be no innovation. The ancient tumar and tuckseen, or distribution of the land-rent, which was formed about two hundred and twenty years ago, has long since ceased to serve as a rule. Under the old Government, this distribution was annually corrected by the accounts which the Zemindars and other collectors of the revenue were bound to deliver into the office of the Canongoes, or king's registers, of the increased or diminished rents of their lands and of the amount of their receipts: but the neglect of these institutions, the wars and revolutions which have since happened in Bengal, the inundations of rivers, the increase of cultivation in some parts of the province and the decrease in others, and the unequal depredations of the famine, have totally changed the face of the country, and rendered the tumar rent-roll a mere object of curiosity. The land-tax has, therefore, been collected, for these twenty years past, upon a conjectural valuation of the land, formed by the amount of the receipts of former years and the opinions of the officers of revenue; and the assessment has, accordingly, been altered almost every year.

Having thus shewn that the present assessment is unequal, that the inequality is productive of great evils, that it is fluctuating and annual, and that therefore any alteration in the distribution of it is not likely to occasion discontents, I hope that Mr. Francis will see, with me, the expediency, and even necessity of obtaining an accurate state of the value of the lands, to enable us to lay the public revenue with an equal weight throughout the whole province. Considerations of the same kind, though not so weighty as those I have mentioned, induced the most free people in the world to adopt a similar measure, and in the year 1692 all the lands in England were valued anew.

Mr. Francis' second proposition is, that the inconvenience of an unequal assessment is not capable of a remedy, because it is impossible to obtain an accurate valuation of the lands. I confess, the attempt is not unattended with difficulties; but as I have been led to propose it from a conviction of its necessity, I trust, if I am supported by the Board, to be able, in a great measure, to surmount them. I will not pretend to fix with precision the means by which this design is to be prosecuted. These must, in a great measure, arise out of the business in its progress; but by pointing out some of the principal sources from which I expect to derive materials, I hope to shew that the present juncture is peculiarly favourable to the attempt, and that the work is not undertaken without a fair prospect of success.

An accurate valuation of the lands is to be made, either by an actual survey and measurement, or from the accounts of the land-rents. The first mode is too tedious, expensive, and uncertain, to be adopted. I would propose to make a trial of the second. The accounts of revenue in Bengal are kept with a regularity and precision unknown in Europe. They are drawn out, I understand, nearly on one uniform plan, and are balanced and adjusted at fixed periods. A separate account current (or kurca) is kept for every Ryot or tenant, in which the different articles which compose his rent for one year are stated on the one side, and the payments which he makes are entered on the other. The whole of these accounts are afterwards annually digested into abstracts, which contain a particular state of the rent, the receipt, and arrears of each village. The abstract of all the villages from the pergunnah accounts and and the general state of the rent of the zemindarry or capital division, is composed of the aggregate of the accounts of the pergunnahs. In order to convey an idea of the distinct and circumstantial manner in which these accounts are kept, I have annexed translations of the two first, viz. that of a single Ryot, and that of a village: it will be unnecessary to produce specimens of the two last. All these are called mofussil accounts.

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

Governor-General.

The history which I have given of these accounts will serve, I hope, to redeem their character from the imputation of being loose, confused, and intricate, and shew that, if we can succeed in procuring them, they will furnish us with ready-formed abstracts of the actual collections, which will require only to be compared. For this purpose, it will not be necessary to examine the accounts of every Ryot nor of every village. The inferior accounts are useful only as checks to the greater. From the regular process in which the whole are formed, it will be seen how easily the falsehood of any account may be detected, since it is impossible to falsify the sum total of a pergunnah without falsifying all parts of it, which of course will differ from those of each village; and those again, if forged, will be corrected by the accounts-current of the Ryots. Thus the fidelity of the greater accounts, when suspected, may be easily tried by a reference to the subsidiary accounts, which can hardly be falsified, as it is almost impossible to join in one combination so many people as must be concerned in it.

All these different accounts are publicly kept in their respective cutcherries. It is by them that the rents are collected, and they are always delivered over to such persons as have the charge of collecting them, whether Zemindar, Sezawul Wadadar, or farmer. I am sensible, that to obtain the original accounts of the rents of every part of Bengal will be a very difficult task; for the inferior Zemindars will, as Mr. Francis has observed, probably use every artifice to conceal the accounts of their rents, or perhaps even attempt to fabricate them. But this in the large divisions, for the reasons which I have already given, will be almost impossible; besides, as the farmers are bound by their original engagements to deliver to Government an account of their collections, as the custom of the country requires that they should give up the mofussil accounts at the expiration of their lease, and as they have little interest to withhold them, since they must yield up the farms at the end of the year, the present juncture is more favourable for procuring a true valuation or hustabood of Bengal than any other. It would be almost impossible to form it afterwards, in the event of the land being restored to the Zemindars; and thus one of the great objects of the five years' settlement, the discovery of a rule for an equal assessment, would be lost.

To collect these different accounts, and to digest and methodize them for our guidance in forming a new settlement, is one of the principal objects of the temporary office which I have proposed.

I am sensible that it would be a far more easy task to prepare the materials for a new settlement in the manner Mr. Francis proposed, by taking the accounts of the actual receipts of rent for three years past, and correcting them by the opinions of the provincial councils, on such districts as have been either favoured or over rated. But although I consider these as useful information, I do not think that we can by them alone ascertain the real value of the lands, or safely make them the only grounds of the future settlement of the Revenue. Many of the lands have suffered by drought, inundations, or other temporary calamities, which though affecting the immediate collections cause no diminution in their real value. In some instances, the rents have been completed by loans, or made up from the private fortunes of the landholders: in other places, they have been enabled to fulfil their engagements by oppressive exactions. The value of some lands, on the contrary, have been fully equal, or even superior to the rent assessed upon them; but the collections have fallen short, through the neglect or incapacity of the farmer or Zemindar, or have been received and dissipated in idle expenses, or been embezzled by the Collectors. In each of these cases (and every district in the province, without an exception, is liable to one or other of them) the actual receipts of Government would prove a false estimate of their worth, and often widely remote from it: and if a settlement were formed upon such a principle, what would it be, but to hold out a reward to fraud and dissipation, to encourage the Zemindars and landlords landlords to keep back their payments as the means of diminishing their rents, and to furnish punctuality by loading it with a full share of the assessment?

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

Governor-General.

But to correct the irregularities of an estimate constructed upon such uncertain grounds, the opinions of the provincial councils are thought sufficient. Now these must be formed either on materials such as I have described, or on the opinions of their dependent officers. The former would be useful, and spare the labour of further researches; the latter, if the evidence of accounts can be procured, ought not to be admitted as authority in a matter of such great importance, and in which an error in the valuation of the land, even of a twentieth part, may reduce an ancient family to beggary, or double the income which it formerly enjoyed. Surely it will not be urged as an objection to official accounts, that they may be fraudulent, and yet propose to take private opinion for authority. The forger of false accounts is liable to the severest penalties, and those accounts are liable to detection; but the errors of opinion are always difficult of conviction, nor has any Government ever devised a punishment for those who maintained them.

To elucidate and support many of the arguments which I have above used, I will only state one case.

At the close of the last Bengal year, several Talookdars, or petty landholders, in the neighbourhood of Moorshedabad, fell largely in arrears in the payment of their rents, and their lands were sold to make good the deficiency. Some of these families had enjoyed their estates for above an hundred years. The Board, knowing that the revenue is unequally assessed, and in some places beyond the abilities of the proprietors, wrote to the provincial council at Moorshedabad, to know whether the estates of these Talookdars had been really over-rated, or whether the arrears were to be attributed to neglect or mismanagement. They have lately returned an answer, with accounts of the rents, receipts, and arrears of all these different talooks, by which it appears that the rents had in general been paid with much regularity for the three preceding years, but had fallen in balance during the last. One of the talookdars (Shazadpore), whose annual rent is about 15,000 rupees, had last year paid no more than 4,000 rupees in part of it. The following is an extract of the answer to our enquiries as to the causes which had thrown these talooks into arrears.

" How far these balances have been owing to the neglect and mismanage" ment of the proprietors, or to the lands having been over-rated, it is not in " our power accurately to determine; but from the collections having been " regularly kept up for three years, and falling so much in arrear the fourth,
" it affords room for supposing that the complaints of the Zemindars of the " drought of the season were not without foundation, and this might be the " cause of that year's deficiency."

It appears, therefore, that the regular payment of rents for three years is no proof of the proprietor's ability to continue to pay the same rent; that if he falls in arrear, his estate is sold; and that a provincial council, of which both the English members and the native officers, in point of abilities, yield to none in Bengal, are unable to say whether any particular district has been favoured or over-rated: for if it is not in their power to give an opinion of the under or over-valuation of the rents of an estate in their own neighbourhood, which had been sold, and the rent of which amounts only to 15,000 rupees, how can we expect exact reports concerning the rents of the whole of their division, which amounts to fifty lacks of rupees? The truth is, that it is impossible to form a just judgment of the value of lands, and consequently of the revenue which they should pay, but by an inspection of their mofussil accounts.

But admitting that the receipts of revenue, and the opinions of the provincial councils, should apppear to us satisfactory grounds for establishing a fixed assessment, yet the concurrence of the Zemindars also will be necessary. Suppose the case of the talook abovementioned, Shazadpore. We offer to fix the rent at 15,000 rupees, the possessor declares it to be over-rated. Upon what grounds can we compel him to subscribe to our conjectural valuation, or how can we admit his pleas without examining them? Should we, however, persist in dictating our own terms, the proprietor will very probably accede to them, like the Rajah of Nuddea, in the dread of losing his talook, which if unequal to the assessment, must afterwards be sold, not for any crime or fault of the proprietor, but for the despotism of Government in exacting from him what he had not to give.

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

Governor-General.

If the commands and exigencies of the Company will admit of it, I shall be ready to join in lowering the revenue. But the peculiar necessities of this Government will not perhaps allow of a considerable diminution of the rents; and whatever it may be, it will be felt as a relief only according to the distribution of it, and the manner in which it is proportioned to the state and abilities of those who are to pay it.

I concur entirely with Mr. Francis in his arguments against raising the greatest possible revenue from Bengal, by destroying all the intermediate orders of men between the ruler and the cultivator. But as my object, in endeavouring to procure an accurate account of the rents, is only to make an equal distribution, and has no kind of connection with the proposition of raising the largest revenue, nor with that of destroying the intermediate orders of men, I imagine it is unnecessary to follow Mr. Francis through all the abstract reasonings which he has introduced on subjects so remote from my own intentions.

Besides the intermediate business of the proposed office, I have recommended, as a second object of its researches, the better and more effectual regulation of pottahs for the security of the Ryots in the perpetual and undisturbed possession of their lands, and to guard them against arbitrary taxations. The words "perpetual possession" and "their land," which may be mere inaccuracies of expression, for they were not meant to convey the idea of any positive or exclusive right of possession, have been noticed by Mr. Francis as contradictory to the rights of property which are vested in the Zemindar. I shall not here attempt to account for the distinctions of property as they are understood in this country: it is sufficient for me to observe, that while the Ryot pays his rent, the Zemindar has no right to dispossess him; nor can the Zemindar, by any legal right, exact a higher rent from him than his pottah prescribes.

Mr. Francis seems to suppose, that there is no necessity for the interposition of Government between the Zemindar and the Ryot. He observes, "that if "they are left to themselves, they will soon come to an agreement, in which "each party will find his advantage." This would be a just conclusion, if the Zemindars were all capable of distinguishing what was for their advantage: but it is a fact, which will with difficulty obtain credit in England, though the notoriety will justify me in asserting it here, that much the greatest part of the Zemindars, both of Bengal and Behar, are incapable of judging or acting for themselves, being either minors, or men of weak understanding, or absolute idiots. This circumstance, and the consequent oppressions which are exercised by those who act for them without interest in the prosperity of the zemindarry, renders it necessary to provide for the security of the Ryots by checks and regulations. It is to be observed, also, that there are two kinds of Ryots. The more valuable are those who reside in one fixed spot, where they have built themselves substantial houses or derived them by inheritance from their fathers. These men will suffer much before they abandon their habitations, and therefore they are made to suffer much; but when once forced to quit them, they become vagrant Ryots. The vagrant Ryots (as Mr. Francis observes) have it in their power, in some measure, to make their own terms with the Zemindars. They take land at an under-rent, hold it for one season; the Zemindar then increases their rent, or exacts more from them than their agreement, and the Ryots either desert, or if they continue, they hold their land at a rent lower than the established rate of the country. Thus the ancient and industrious tenants are obliged to submit to undue exactions, while the vagrant Ryots enjoy lands at half price, which operates as an encouragement to desertion and to the depopulation of the country.

The general subject of pottahs, and the abuses and oppressions arising from their present uncertainty and the variety of articles that compose the Ryots accounts, have been often matter of just complaint; and I believe every member of the Board is satisfied that they require to be reformed. All that I now propose

Bengal Revenue Consultations, 12 Nov. 1776.

Governor-General.

propose is to collect the materials of information on this subject, to be laid before the Board for their future determination, on the most effectual means of regulating the pottahs. At present, I am not prepared to propose a complete plan, and decline giving a premature and partial opinion, while I am professedly seeking for the grounds to determine it.

Par. 3. THE recurrence of the preceding subject* leads us naturally to bring, next in order, under your notice, that of a very ingenious and, as we have every reason to believe, most valuable treatise,† which has lately been composed and submitted to us by Mr. James Grant, junior, one of our covenanted servants on this establishment, consisting of an historical and comparative analysis of the finances of Bengal, from the Mogul conquest to the present time. In this treatise it will appear, that Mr. Grant's sentiments, in respect to the legal and constitutional rights of the Zemindars, nearly agree with those which we have above submitted to your consideration from the late Committee of Revenue; but the direct object and most interesting part of the work relates to the important branch of your revenues, and to the defalcations they have suffered, and the confusion into which they were thrown about the date of your acquisition of the Dewanny, from which it is the design of Mr. Grant's researches to discover and point out the best means to retrieve them, and by restoring and reverting, as nearly as possible, to the ancient simplicity and regularity of the former financial system of this country, to provide equally, and by the operation of the same general rules, for the security of the rights of Government and those of the subject. Such being the magnitude and importance of the object held out by Mr. Grant's treatise, and the data which he adduces in support of his positions carrying with them, at least, a strong appearance of theoretical truth, which is all that can be expected from the present stage of his inquiry, we think we should not have discharged our duty to you and the public, had we not determined to afford to that gentleman every proper scope to bring his subject into practical explanation; and we have, acccordingly, vested him with adequate, and at the same time moderate powers for this purpose, by appointing him, under the Board of Revenue, and occasional review of our own department, to the office of Sheristadar, or general superintendant of the native revenue accounts, and keeper of all rules, forms, and ordinances in the native administration and collection of the revenues: in which station it will be a principal branch of his duty to proceed gradually to inquire after, and to endeavour to restore the ancient proportional accounts of the several districts, and to ascertain and fix, as far as possible, their ancient limits, as well as to re-establish the officers of the Canongoes' department upon their ancient footing, so as to render them altogether independent of the Zemindars, and thereby gradually to discover all that may be practicable of ancient regularity, and to prevent greater confusion in time to come. These are some of the principal objects, and an imperfect sketch of the outline of the office we have thus instituted of Sheristadar. But, for your more minute information, we must beg leave to refer you to the treatise composed by Mr. Grant, which will be transmitted to you from the Secret Department, as well as to the Governor-General's minute thereon, recorded in our consultation of the 4th of last month, together with our subsequent instructions on the subject to the Board of Revenue; of both which last-mentioned papers copies are sent numbers in the packet.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 4*th July* 1786.

Governor-General's Minute.

The Governor-General lays before the Board the following Minute, relative to the prosecution of Mr. Grant's researches concerning the Revenue of these provinces.

Governor-General.

The Board have been some time in possession of Mr. Grant's very ingenious work, in which he has given an account of the revenues of the provinces, and the rates at which they were formerly assessed, together with other matters relating to this most important branch of the public interests.

The Company have had an opportunity of perusing a similar work, which Mr. Grant submitted to the Board in January 1785, on the subject of the revenues and political importance of the Northern Circars. I doubt not but it has engaged their attention, and has influenced their opinion in the orders which we have lately received, relative to the negociations at Hyderabad on the subjectof the Circars.

The work with which Mr. Grant has lately presented this Government embraces the particular subject of the revenues of these provinces.

I am happy to acknowledge that I gave him every encouragement in my power to prosecute so important an undertaking. The most interesting part of it remains still to be brought forward; but the Board have seen enough, in what has been submitted to them, to induce them, on the ground of duty, as well as of earnest disposition, to give Mr. Grant every scope to bring his subject into practical explanation.

After an attentive perusal of Mr. Grant's analysis, I have not, for my own part, a doubt, but the genuine ancient revenue accounts of these provinces have been either mutilated, or kept back from the knowledge of the Company's agents, from the time of our acquisition of the Dewannee.

I am likewise persuaded, that the original checks of the ancient Bengal exchequer have never been properly or regularly established in favour of the Company.

Our ablest servants in the Revenue branch are not as yet completely informed, though the progress made by them in acquiring the native languages, and ascertaining the ancient forms and most regular mode of collecting the just revenue of Government is much to be admired.

Instead,

* Consultations, 21 August 1786. † Consultations, 7 September 1786.

Governor-General's Minute.

Instead, therefore, of being surprised that the Company's servants did not gain earlier access to an intimate knowledge of the ancient revenue system (which, in regular gradation from the highest native officer in the exchequer to the lowest native writer or collector, is a chain of mystery and profit) we have rather to admire the knowledge they have acquired; and if it is further considered, that the system of extensive farming, favoured in all despotic countries by indolence and avarice, was peculiarly recommended in Bengal by the supposed rights and influence of great Zemindars, we may easily account for the arrears into which the Company's administration has fallen in this particular branch of their revenue. Such errors are the more dangerous, as they are supported in Europe on an imaginary system of justice and sound policy. It was not to be expected, when the accounts of great zemindarries or provinces were left to the adjustment of a single native farmer, that the revenue details of lesser districts would be scrupulously examined, and upon the correct principles of the ancient system, which established a complete record, in every part of the country, of the just dues of the Sovereign, the Zemindar, and the Ryot.

It is much to discover, with certainty, that we have yet a great deal to learn in the revenue line, and we are fortunate if we can collect and take up the links of ancient forms. The regular chain has been broken and concealed: it is to be hoped, we can take it up again, trace the parts and connect them. One thing is certain: nothing was more complete, more simple, correct, and systematic, than the ancient revenue system of this country. It was formed so as to protect the people who paid it from oppression, and secure to the sovereign his full and legal rights.

The helplessness and the poverty of the native, combined with the force of despotism to the establishment of such system. For to draw the greatest regular revenue from millions of unarmed cultivators and manufacturers, a system was necessary, that connected the security of every Ryot or peasant with the punctuality and equalization of the payments. A thousand checks became necessary, from the accountant and assessor of the village, through many gradations, to the accountant-general of the exchequer. Such was the nature of these checks, that if oppression had been committed, or a default of payment arose in any quarter, the error could be found out by investigation and re-examination of accounts, which were faithfully and regularly recorded in every district of the country, and from thence transferred, through different offices, to the final grand account of the year, in the khalsa or exchequer.

This equal, regular, and just system, arose originally, perhaps, from the mild principles of the Gentoo religion, which the ruling, or the Bramin power, found it necessary to accommodate, for the support of the indolent and idle castes, to the equal assessment of the cultivation of the soil and the industry of the manufacturer. When the ruling power devolved upon chiefs not of the Bramin race, and afterwards on the Mahomedan conqueror, both found it necessary to continue the original system. We have reason to suppose that the Mahomedans improved it, by adopting some of the ancient Persian and Arabian revenue regulations. The revenue terms which occur in accounts are mostly of Persic or Arabic etymology; nor is the revenue system of those parts of India, where the Mahomedan conquests have not extended, found so perfect as that where their administration has long prevailed.

Conquest must, at first, have disturbed the established regulations of every country. A short time would convince the invaders, that justice and lenity towards the inhabitants could alone give value to the conquest. The tyrant and the conqueror might demand a greater revenue than the regular due of Government, and they might put the individuals who were called upon to pay it to the torture for more, and finally to death; but such acts would soon be found to have the same effect as killing the individual bees for their particular portions of honey. A revenue which many millions were to pay in small individual proportions, was only to be collected like the honey of the hive. The whole nation of the industrious was to be cherished and supported in their respective functions of industry, and at this day we find that the Ryots and manufacturers manufacturers of Bengal quit the field of the oppressor, and punish him by leaving his district a desolate waste.

Governor-General's Minute.

Such is the chief shield which these helpless people have to oppose against oppression; and it is more powerful than can, at first view, be imagined by an European. The Ryot possesses other means of defence, and they are a disposition and great ability, in his little line, to defraud the collector of the revenue. Innumerable, I am told, are his acts and endeavours in this way: and here comes the first aid of the regular ancient system of accounts.

The Ryots will not venture to refuse to pay the established due to the Circar or Government. Custom is a law, whose obligation operates in their own defence, nor have they an idea of disputing it; they consider it as a species of decree from fate. But as the value of money, in proportion to its plenty, must have decreased in India as well as in Europe, so it has been found that the Ryots of a village and of a whole district could pay a greater revenue than that originally settled by custom. Hence arose the oppressive catalogue of abwabs, or special additional assessments, by Government. On this head Mr. Grant has given us much useful light. The abwabs, or successive additional taxes, make regular heads in the accounts of every village and district; nor are the abwabs, established openly by Government, of that oppressive nature which Mr. Francis in his ingenious minutes has supposed.

The sources of real oppression are in secret abwabs, or unavowed taxes, which the great farmer or Zemindar imposes at will on the Ryots, and of which we have such cruel examples in the investigation at Rungpore.

Here, again, we see the great advantage of being able to examine the revenue system, and to trace back oppression to its source, according to the thread and light of established usage and ancient accounts.

Here humanity, as well as the public interest, call upon us to leave no part of the revenue science unexplored, so as to remain a secret in the hands of native writers, Sheristadars, Canongoes, Zemindars, and Dewans.

A clear principle is ascertained. It is fortunately the check against the oppression of the Ryot or peasant, and the bulwark against corruption in the offices of Government. If, for example, an additional revenue is imposed upon the Ryot, it cannot be imposed secretly: it must be by abwab, or additional tax, which must appear in the accounts in every village pergunnah or zemindarry, and be recorded, in some shape, in various native accounts of the revenue for the year.

The accounts of every village are kept, on the part of the Ryots, by an accountant of their own free election, called a Mocuddum, or Potail, which accountant settles the just due of Government with officers on the part of Government called Putwarries. After adjusting their accounts, respectively, they both repair, or send deputies, at stated periods, to the principal town of the district, with their accounts and collections, to be rendered to their respective principals, viz. the Zemindar and Canongoe. The first receives the money, the latter records the accounts, which are transmitted after to the exchequer. The ingenuity of the native collectors of the revenue has endeavoured to destroy and confound the limits of different districts, to vitiate accounts, to increase old abwabs, and involve oppression in such mystery and difficulty, as cannot but defeat the labours of any European, or even native investigator.

To endeavour to apply a remedy to this evil, is an arduous but a most meritorious undertaking; and the first steps to it are to ascertain, as much as possible, the ancient limits and accounts of each district, and to establish the officers of the Canongoe's office upon its ancient footing, independent of the Zemindars, so as to discover all we can of former regularity, and prevent greater confusion in future.

It was early my wish, and that wish is now nearly accomplished, to see the Company's junior servants placed in situations to learn the whole business of the revenue in all its branches, from the collection of the village to the duties of a member of the Revenue Board. The late appointments made by the Board, and the code of instructions which we have ordered to be made out for the Collectors and their assistants, will, I trust, form the best school for instructing the Company's servants in this line, and render our Government ultimately independent of a total native agency.

I have thus endeavoured to give the Board my ideas of what is to be gained, by going back, as much as possible, to the ancient revenue system. It is a subject to which I have paid as much general attention as my time could afford, and it is certainly the most important branch of the Company's concerns in this country. Much has been written upon it by the Company's servants, and much is the public indebted to their labours in acquiring information. Mr. Shore, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Ducarel, and Mr. Jonathan Duncan, and many gentlemen now employed in the Revenue line, have acquired much valuable knowledge in this great branch of the public service, and to their writings and explanations am I indebted for all I know of the subject. Mr. Grant has thrown new lights on their researches; and by having procured for himself the best access to the writings of the ancient authors on the finances of Bengal and the Circars, and by examining the system of the collections as a curious scientific arrangement, he has made the discoveries of which we should avail ourselves, for the advantage of the Company and of the nation.

It may be truly observed, that we have made these discoveries, and are pushing such researches at an interesting period, when our debts are almost insupportable, when the acts of the native officers of the revenues had gradually deprived the Company of perhaps a fourth of their rightful revenue, by secret alienations of lands, under different heads of charity, religious, rent-free, and gift lands. All the efforts of Government, by the institution of offices to investigate these alienations, and the different fictitious tenures under which they are held, have hitherto produced little benefit to the state and no advantage to the country, which has been only thrown in confusion by inquiries of the officers of the Bazey Zemeen. Upon this subject I have a proposition to make to the Board, which will, I hope, meet with their approbation. The object of it is to invest the different Collectors with power to ascertain the estranged or alienated lands, and not to attempt to dispossess the occupants of those lands, but to assess them gradually with an increasing revenue to Government. Such an arrangement will prevent confusion and oppression in the country, and, in the course of time, will realize the full revenue of the soil to the Company. Upon this head, we may derive useful aid from the explanations given by Mr. Grant. And here I cannot but remark, how much the Company appears to have been indebted to the industrious efforts of Mr. John Johnstone, during his revenue service at Burdwan, in the years 1762, 1763, and 1764. Independent of the revenue which he secured from that province at a very critical time, to support the arms of the Company in Cossim Ali's war, the steps which he took to ascertain and realize the full revenue of Government have ever since kept up the revenue of that valuable province. He seems to have been the first servant of the Company who traced the revenues of any district through all their details to the source. By his inquiries into the original accounts, he checked the usual practice of alienating the lands, or disengaging them from their proportion of tribute to the Government. The system of farming, which he was obliged to pursue at first, was afterwards disapproved; nor has it, on a greater scale, produced the effects expected from it in 1772: but it certainly enabled Government to form a more correct estimate of the value of the lands. The Twenty-four Pergunnahs have likewise been investigated in the same manner as the province of Burdwan; and if we compare their revenues, respectively, with those of equal extents of country, as valuable in their soil and production, we can then form some idea of what the Company have lost, and have yet to gain, in the revenues of many districts. The zemindarry of Radshy affords a melancholy spectacle of this failure or loss of revenue, and so does the province of Dacca and many other districts.

In order to stop these evils, and to avail ourselves, as much as possible, for the benefit of the Company and the public, of the knowledge and services of Mr.

Governor-General's Minute.

Mr. Grant, I propose the revival of an office well known in Hindostan by the designation of Serishtadar, and that Mr. Grant be invested with that office, under the Revenue Board, and to attend as Serishtadar at the deliberations of that Board and of the Governor-General in Council in their Revenue department.

The Serishtadar* is the keeper of the serishta, or the superintendent of the native revenue accounts, and keeper of all the rules, forms, and ordinances, in the native administration and collection of the revenues. There was formerly, and there is still, a serishtadar in each dufter or office, such as of the khalsa, jagueer, abwabs, ameen, dufters, &c. These offices all unite in the Dewanny Dufter of the Company, and these respective native Serishtadars should be placed under Mr. Grant's special control, as principal or chief Serishtadar.

Mr. Grant, by being placed in this office, will be armed with the requisite authority to complete his inquiries into the nature and sources of the revenue, with the mode of collection through native agency, as well as its disbursements in the different branches of collection and expenditure with net amount received at the khalsa. He will thereby be enabled to correct and establish the proof of his several informations to the Board on these several heads of finance. His signature, as Serishtadar, will be necessary to all the Persian accounts, and to authenticate all papers hitherto requiring the signature of the native Dewan, and he is to be equally responsible with that officer, in all attestations by his signature, and to have access to the deliberations of the Board of Revenue and superior council, with official propositions for the re-establishment of any part of the ancient institutions of the revenue, or for forming new regulations to supply their want.

The great object of his appointment is a reform in that department of the revenue hither entrusted to the native officers of the sudder, or exchequer, and their delegates and subordinates in the mofussil, or country, so that the complete legal revenue, equally consistent with the rights of the sovereign and those of the landholders with the happiness of its inhabitants, may be secured to the state.

Mr. Grant, as Serishtadar, should possess a power of control over the native Canongoes and Serishtadars, who draw out and keep, at present, all the native revenue accounts. He will require the utmost support of the Revenue Board and of Government, to give efficacy to any Regulations he may propose for re-establishing the ancient forms and constitution of the revenue system, as it stood at the acquisition of the Dewanny. His office neither supersedes or extinguishes any revenue office held by a Company's servant, but relates entirely to a control over the native officers

I shall not, at present, propose any salary for Mr. Grant. He has, in fact, been employed for the public since he relinquished his last appointment. The expense of his undertaking has been considerable. He will give it in to the Board fairly attested · they will not hesitate to reimburse him; it will remain with the Company to reward him finally.

It is not, I fear, his intention to remain long in India. The utmost I expect is his stay to put his own system into operation, and bring it into proof. The office once established and put into order, there are some of the Company's servants who are sufficiently versed in the revenue line to fill it after him with credit. Upon their integrity and responsibility we can with safety rely, and with a confidence which cannot be placed in native accountants, Canongoes, and Dewans.

I have only to add, that without the determined support of the Governor-General and Council and the Board of Reveuue, it will be impossible for Mr. Grant to succeed in the office proposed for him. The reasons are obvious. But the service to be rendered to the Company and to the nation, by giving the proposed office the necessary support, is so very essential, that I am confident

* The etymology of Serishtadar is Persian, and is derived from ser " headrisht," of the thread, and " dar," holder, or the holder of the thread.

Governor-General's Minute.

fident every member of the general Board and of the Revenue department will vie with each other, in endeavouring to give Mr. Grant every official aid he can require, to bring his revenue information and discoveries into successful operation for the public.

READ again the Honourable the Governor-General's minute, recorded in the Consultation of the 4th instant.

Resolved, That Mr. James Grant be appointed Serishtadar; and Ordered, That this appointment be accordingly communicated to him, with a copy of the minute above referred to.

Resolved, that the following letter be written to the Board of Revenue.

To John Stables, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter to the Board of Revenue, 19 July 1786.

We have lately had submitted to us, by Mr. James Grant, a very ingenious treatise, in which he has given an account of the revenues of these provinces, and of the rates at which they were formerly assessed, together with other matters relative to this most important branch of the public interest.

The most interesting part of this work, by which we mean the practical improvement to be deduced from it, remains yet to be brought forward; but we feel ourselves sufficiently induced, from what that gentleman hath already laid before us, to afford Mr. Grant every scope to bring his subject into practical explanation, as from the analysis which he has made, we think it at least highly probable that the genuine ancient accounts of the revenues have been either mutilated or kept back from the knowledge of the Company's agents, ever since the acquisition of the Dewanny, at the same time that the original checks of the ancient Bengal exchequer have never since that period, been properly or regularly established in favour of the Company, by which we have hitherto been, in a great measure, deprived of the advantage of being guided by the simple and correct ancient revenue system of the country, which by its useful checks from the accountant and assessor of the village, through its several gradations upwards to the Accountant General of the exchequer, was, we have reason to believe, no less calculated to protect the great body of the people from oppression, than to secure the full and legal rights of the sovereign.

That the adherence to this system, in all its simplicity and accuracy, may not at all times have been complete, even during the existence of the native Government, and more especially in the time of its later Nazims, we think not improbable; but we are, at the same time, fully convinced, that the evil has from that period, and principally about the time, and since our acquisition of the Dewanny, continued rapidly to increase, during which period the ingenuity of the native Collectors has endeavoured to confound the limits of different districts, to vitiate accounts, to increase old abwabs and superadd new ones, and in short, to involve oppression in such mystery and difficulty, as nearly to defeat and set at defiance all attempts at detection.

To endeavour to apply a remedy to those evils, is an arduous, but we think a most meritorious undertaking; and the first steps towards it are to ascertain and fix, as much as possible, the ancient limits and accounts of each district, and to establish (which we have already repeatedly wished) the officers of the Canongoe's department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemindars, so as to discover all that may be practicable of ancient regularity, and to prevent greater confusion in time to come.

For

For these purposes, and to avail ourselves, as much as possible, for the benefit of the Company and the public, of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we have determined on the institution of an office, well known in this country, under the designation of chief Serishtadar, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such, at your deliberations, as well as at our own meetings in the Revenue department. Letter to the Board of Revenue, 19 July 1786.

By this establishment of the office of chief Serishtadar in favour of Mr. Grant, we mean that, without removing the records of the khalsa, in its several departments, from the actual charge of those who may have them now in their respective custodies, he be considered as the general superintendent of the native revenue accounts, and keeper of all the rules, forms, and ordinances, in the native administration and collection of the revenues; that the respective native Serishtadars, as well as the Canongoes, must be placed under Mr. Grant's special control, as chief or principal Serishtadar, so far as to secure to him, at all times, the freest and readiest access to their official records and information of every kind that they may possess.

With these powers, or such further authority as experience may shew to be necessary, we trust that Mr. Grant will be enabled to complete his valuable inquiries into the nature and sources of the revenues, with the mode of collection through native agency, as well as its disbursements in the different branches of collection and expenditure, with the net amount received at the khalsa. His signature, as Serishtadar, will be necessary to all the Persian accounts, and to authenticate all papers hitherto requiring the signature of the native Dewan; and he is to be equally responsible with that officer in all attestations by his signature, and to have free access to the proceedings of your Board, as well as of ours, in this department, with the right of suggesting and bringing forward official propositions, for the re-establishment of any part of the ancient institutions of the revenue, or for forming new Regulations to serve in their stead.

In short, the great object of his appointment is a reform in that department of the revenue, hitherto entrusted to the native officers of the Sudder or exchequer, and their delegates or subordinates in the Mofussil or country; so that the complete legal revenue, equally consistent with the rights of the sovereign and those of the landholders, with the real prosperity of the country and the happiness of its inhabitants, may be secured to the state.

Finally, we must earnestly recommend to you to afford Mr. Grant the most effectual and cordial support, and to give efficacy to the Regulations he may propose for the due execution of his charge, and for re-establishing the ancient forms and constitution of the revenue system, as they stood prior to our acquisition of the Dewanny; and we have only farther to observe, that the establishment of this department is not meant either to supersede any other revenue office held by a Company's servant, its principal object being, as already sufficiently noticed, a control over the native officers.

EXTRACT BENGAL REVENUE CONSULTATIONS,

The 21st August 1786.

The following letter from Mr. James Grant, lately appointed to the office of Serishtadar, having been received on the 5th instant, was circulated that day to the members of the Board, upon which the Governor-General delivered the minute thereafter recorded. Letter from Mr James Grant, 30 July 1786.

To the Honourable John Macpherson, Governor-General, &c. in Council, Fort William.

Honourable Sir and Sirs:

I had the honour to receive yesterday official notification of the resolution passed at the Honourable Board on the 19th instant, appointing me to the office of Serishtadar, with communication of the contents of a minute delivered vered in by the Honourable the Governor-General, introductive of the appointment, and apparently to explain or define its relative duties, as far as might be necessary, in terms of general description, or until specifically pointed out in the practice of current business.

Letter from Mr. James Grant, 30 July 1786.

I am extremely sensible, on this occasion, of the honour done to me, as well as the great condescension of the Honourable Board, in so readily adopting a proposition calculated to bring forward to public view any little or doubtful merit, which may possibly be ascribed to the past, or can be hoped in future, from the continued exertion of the humble labours of an individual in my situation, wholly inexperienced in the practical detail of every revenue office at the presidency under the Company's administration, and deriving that small portion of theoretical knowledge, which I can pretend to, entirely from a view of the preceding Mogul system of finance, with such further imperfect information of the change introduced since the acquisition of the Dewanny, as I have been enabled to extract from the more recent published reports of the British House of Commons.

Nevertheless, however arduous the task assigned to me may turn out (a task which certainly doth not appear the less difficult, that the success of the undertaking will wholly depend on the adoption of some general principles far from being universally received, though perhaps requisite to influence the support and execution of others, in carrying into effect such measures as may suggest themselves necessary in the prosecution of a work involving the restoration of the ancient form of Government, after a lapse of twenty-one years, productive undoubtedly of many considerable deviations, and that the expected great pecuniary benefits to be derived from the reform, besides the advantage of a fixed permanent system of future administration, seem to hinge altogether on the duration, constructive spirit, and constitutional enforcement of some relative clauses in the late regulating Act of Parliament for this country), yet however unequal my own powers may be to the attainment of the grand objects in view, I feel too sensibly my obligations to my Honourable Masters, respectful deference to the commands of the representatives here, and particular thankful consideration due to the wishes of the Honourable the Governor-General, whose favourable opinion I shall ever be proud to justify in my public conduct, to decline the honour now conferred on me, whatever reasons I might have to offer for doing so, from rather a precarious state of health, with still the purpose of returning to Europe in the course of the ensuing season. I shall, therefore, accordingly attend the deliberations of the Board of Revenue and Superior Council, always, or as often as directed, to endeavour to learn and fulfil all the duties expected or required from the station allotted to me, whether in completing my inquiries on the subject of finance, or aiding to substantiate what may yet partially be regarded as a mere speculative improvement, until the practicability of it be generally admitted, being an issue that ought assuredly to be much accelerated, through the co-operation of such of the native officers as have hitherto filled all the efficient employments in the khubra, when subjected to a single powerful or sufficient control. But before I incur any official responsibility, particularly in attesting to the serrishtah or constitutional forms of the annual bundabust, in the accounts of demand of rent, the receipts, expense and balances, or to those of zemindarry sunnuds, perwannahs, and all such writings requiring the Dewanny seal or signature, as may affect the relative rights of sovereign and subject, I could wish the Honourable Board to adopt some leading regulations, indicated, indeed, as already in contemplation, if I may be permitted so to interpret parts of the Honourable the Governor-General's minute, and calculated, with many more infinitely essential views, to ascertain with some precision the lesser one, in the authority and duties to be annexed to the office with which I have been invested.

Sic. orig.

As the grand object seems to be, to re-establish the ancient forms of Mogul Government, in the management of the revenue agreeable to what may be construed the "law and the constitution of India," as referred to in the late Act of Parliament, to fix the relative situation and rights of the Zemindars or landholders, it may be necessary to fix on some known period of time, whence to learn and determine a standard of rule for all future proceedings: for though the

Letter from Mr. James Grant, 30 July 1786.

the general original principles of Mogul government may have ever been kept in view, and even formally adhered to throughout the desevered members of the empire, down to the latest periods of every regular civilized Government yet existing in Hindostan, still great variations have successively taken place in the practical mode and amount of the yearly assessments on the country or people. These, however, have been, for the most part, tolerated or incorporated in the old established system of finance, and are all so deeply rooted in the soil where they first sprang up, that now they form an essential necessary part of the annual revolving fund of supply to answer public exigencies. In Bengal, more especially, this will be found the case; and as the proper Mogul administration of the revenues, as acknowledged by the present possessors of the country, ceased in the year 1765, when the Dewanny was formally transferred in perpetuity to the Company, under whose management alone it is pretended grievances have originated, and are still suffered by different classes of the native landholders, whose complaints may have therefore occasioned the injunctions of Parliament, in the 39th clause of the late Act; so it may be necessary to revert to the constitution, laws, or customs, then actually in current practical use; to determine the territorial rights of the sovereign, the relative situation and privileges of the Zemindars, as well as to secure the Ryots, or immediate occupants of the soil, against the encroachments of the agents of both prince and landholder, when the latter, acting in the capacity of farmer-general, in terms of the annual bundabust or settlement, may be said to have the separate authority of a contractor, independent of his official jurisdiction, derived from and held under Government.

The adoption of this Regulation will undoubtedly occasion a very material change in all the forms of internal management. But such perhaps ought, and may only be admitted of, when productive of a safe, legal, allowable, manifest advantage to the state, in reduction of present expense, bringing forth actually existing but hitherto concealed resources of finance, and tending to introduce order and stability, with a precise definite knowledge in matters of form, as well as in the rights of persons and of things universally, which if altogether wanting, or imperfectly instituted, must be productive of eternal change and confusion in justice; progressive diminution of revenue, with additional burdens on the helpless oppressed peasantry, until relief be found in a new revolution, the civil death of existing society, only to be guarded against by wise and moderate policy founded on local experience.

First, it supposes covenanted servants of the Company substituted in the room of Mussulman Aumildars, in like manner deputed into all the great zemindarry or provincial divisions of the country, and vested with all the efficient powers of supervision, control, and receipt of the revenues, with superintendence of the Dewanny or exchequer courts of Adawlut within their respective local jurisdictions, under the denomination of collectorships, as were heretofore given to the subordinate Mogul delegates in matters of finance; acting on the same or similar instructions as were drawn out for the supervisors appointed in 1769, subject, of course, to all restrictions of the British Legislature, the Company, their representatives in India, and to the immediate orders of the Board in its Revenue department.

Secondly, it supposes the freedom of all the Canongoes and Putwarries, dispersed through the pergunnahs and villages of the Soubahs, from that slavish corrupt dependence on the Zemindars, under which they have been long since unconstitutionally held, and henceforth, with all the other Mutsuddies and native officers of the revenue in the mofussil, to be subject to the control of the Collectors within their several districts, as well as placed in due subordination to their respective heads or principals at the sudder, agreeable to the ancient customary rules of gradation.

Thirdly, it supposes the re-establishment of the old constitutional forms, set aside at the acquisition of the Dewanny, in ascertaining the nature and sources of revenue, mode of management, amount collected and allowed, mofussil expenditure in prescribing the rules to be observed, in drawing out zemindarry sunnuds or perwannahs, in constructing the yearly accounts of the jumma receipts and balances, and finally in settling the bundabust invariably, according according to the formerly stated divisions of country, exactly defined in boundary, and assessed by measurement, or a long series of annual valuations, proportionably to each other, as set forth in the ansil jumma toomary, last corrected under complete legal authority by the Nabob Sujah Khan, and in the jumma of the several abwabs kiffyut or towfeer, since established, rateably on the foundation of the original standard assessment under the formal acknowledged constitutional authority of Soubadars holding of the crown of Delhi, down to the expulsion of Cossim Ali Khan, or transfer of the Dewanny to the Company.

Farther, in respect to the analysis of the revenues of the Soubah of Bengal, continued to the year 1765 and lately laid before the Board, I am ready, whenever called on, to adduce the proofs of the facts stated, which have influenced my own individual belief of their truth, after learning any assigned sufficient reasons serving as a foundation for the actual system But, perhaps, complete demonstrative evidence cannot be given, until they are substantially and effectively admitted by the Zemindars, and other native officers of Government, in concluding the annual settlement. This, as involving a large additional revenue, cannot be expected immediately, and already the season is elapsed for terminating the jummabundy; yet if one or two districts, such as Rajeshahy and Dacca, are left khas for the investigation of the Collectors, who may continue to receive the public demand of rent according to the standard of last year, adding the moshaherah, with reservation of Government's right to any further collections ascertained to have been made from the Ryots, the mode and practicability of an universal reform will be sufficiently manifested, as perhaps those two divisions of the soubah will be found to include one-third of the whole extent and valuation.

I venture humbly to suggest so much as is requisite for my own security, as I wish to be at liberty, towards the close of the present year, to avail myself of the indulgence held out by the Company for such of their servants unemployed as may be inclined to return to Europe, and as it might be ineligible, in my own particular circumstances, to change my situation from that line of the service in which I have hitherto risen, and have been altogether engaged.

THE Board having considered the above letter addressed to the Honourable Governor-General and Council by Mr. Grant,* agree to adopt the Regulation proposed by him previous to his incurring responsibility; namely, that in all cases when it may be necessary to refer to the law and constitution of this country, the regulations and usage of the Mogul Government, previous to the year 1765, when the Dewanny was formally transferred to the Company, shall be considered the standard.

Extract of the Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, dated 17th August 1786.

Read the following letter from Mr. James Grant.

To John Stables, Esq., President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen:

Letter from Mr. Jas. Grant, 16 Aug 1786.

I had the honour, this day, to receive from the Secretary an extract of the proceedings of the Board on the 8th instant, in consequence of my address to the Honourable Governor-General and Council of the 30th ultimo, in reference, from which I am willing to understand, without giving further trouble on a point rather of individual than public importance, that it has been agreed to adopt the regulation proposed, previous to my incurring responsibility, so far that, in cases where it may be required of me to act in discharging duties indicated as belonging to my office, the regulations and usage of the Mogul Government, previous to the year 1765, shall be considered as the standard of rule for ascertaining the laws and constitution of this country, in all questions of financial policy, not otherwise specially determined by an Act of the British Legislature, or in virtue of powers derived from that authority. In further explanation of what I have written on this head, I have only to observe, that it was alone on the idea of possible instances of deviation from the revenue system of India occurring, and being apparently productive of a diminution in the established dues of Government, deducible from derangement in the legal mode of management introduced by the first native agents employed by the Company, that I could feel reluctnce to incur any degree of official responsibility sibility thence forward; as it can only be after learning precisely the nature and extent of the disorder, a suitable remedy can be suggested or efficaciously supplied: and this, I apprehend, is one of the leading purposes of my appointment.

To attain it, according to the old customary forms of financial administration, seemed greatly to depend on having a control over the native Mutsuddies or officers of the exchequer, who have always been considered the efficient agents in the business of the collections, as well as original framers or keepers of the yearly accounts of settlement; and it was, probably, from this consideration, that such a power hath been vested in a covenanted servant, who, under the designation of chief Serishtadar, might have a general superintendence over all the native heads of offices uniting in the Dewanny Dufter of the Company. But the full effect of the very recent change in the mode of managing the revenues, universally, throughout Bengal by British Collectors, perhaps in exclusion totally of the class of former native agents in question, may not even yet be perfectly understood. At any rate, I have much to learn on this particular subject; for if all trust, management, and responsibility, hitherto vested in the native officers of the exchequer, be entirely withdrawn, they at least can do no wrong, and may not be proper objects of control; neither can their services, in any shape, be useful, in my own humble opinion, beyond the time that may be necessary to obtain their attestation to a few simple original accounts of revenue, two of the most essential of which were indicated by me in a letter to the Honourable Governor-General, in the month of April last. On the other hand, if any share of trust, management, and responsibility, be left with them, either in the collection of the revenues, framing accounts from original transactions, in the detail of zemindarry receipts from the country and payments into the khalsa provincial treasuries, or as the experienced depositaries of necessary local information, derived from actual practice, with inspection and use of the authentic original records confined generally within their own narrow circle; so I hope it will appear as reasonable as it is conformable to my wish, that that share be ascertained, with the names and offices of all the native Serishtadars, head Mutsuddies, and Canongoes, to be subjected to my control, specifying the present actual duties of each, with as much precision as may be thought necessary, to prevent the exercise of any improper or contestible authority or unintentional encroachment on the departments of other servants of the Company, who may also have a concurrent special control, for different purposes, over the same native individuals placed under mine. This appears the more requisite, as the Board have thought it proper to transmit an extract of the Honourable Governor-General and Council's letter, defining the nature and duties of my department, to the Preparer of Reports, Registers of the Canongoes' office, and Accountant-General to the Revenue department; which seems to indicate that the heads of these offices have hitherto virtually exercised a greater or less degree of control immediately over the inferior native officers of the khalsa, all of whom, in form, were probably considered to act in subordination to the Roy-Royan, now separately written to, apparently in his capacity of chief Mutsuddy under the Dewanny.

I have, &c.

Calcutta, 16th August 1786. (Signed) JAMES GRANT.

Agreed, That a perwannah be issued to the Roy-Royan, directing him to furnish the Board instantly with a list of all the native revenue officers acting under his authority, specifying the duties of each, respectively.

Agreed, that the head Canongoes be called on to furnish the Board instantly with a particular account of their duties, and those of the officers acting under them.

Agreed, That the further consideration of the functions appertaining to the office of the chief Serishtadar be postponed.

REGULATION

REGULATION VIII, A. D. 1793.

Regulation VIII, A. D. 1793.

Section 54. The impositions upon the Ryots, under the denomination of abwaub, mahtoot, and other appellations, from their number and uncertainty having become intricate to adjust, and a source of oppression to the Ryots, all proprietors of land and dependent talookdars shall revise the same, in concert with the Ryots, and consolidate the whole with the assul into one specific sum. In large zemindarries or estates, the proprietors are to commence this simplification of the rents of their Ryots, in the pergunnahs where the impositions are most numerous, and to proceed in it gradually till completed, but so that it be effected for the whole of their lands by the end of the Bengal year 1198, in the Bengal districts, and of the fussily and willaity year 1198, in the Behar and Orissa districts, these being the periods fixed for the delivery of pottahs, as hereafter specified.

55. No actual proprietor of land, or dependent Talookdar or farmer of land, of whatever description, shall impose any new abwaubs or mhatoots upon the Ryots, under any pretence whatever. Every exaction of this nature shall be punished, by a penalty equal to three times the amount imposed; and if, at any future period, it be discovered that new abwaubs or mhatoots have been imposed, the person imposing the same shall be liable to this penalty for the entire period of such impositions.

56. It is expected that, in time, the proprietors of land, dependent Talookdars and farmers of land, and the Ryots, will find it for their mutual advantage to enter into agreements, in every instance, for a specific sum, for a certain quantity of land, leaving it to the option of the latter to cultivate whatever species of produce may appear to them likely to yield the largest profit. Where, however, it is the established custom to vary the pottah for lands according to the articles produced thereon, and while the actual proprietors of land, dependent Talookdars or farmer of lands, and Ryots, in such places, shall prefer an adherence to this custom, the engagements entered into between them are to specify the quantity of land, species of produce, rate of rent and amount thereof, with the term of the lease, and a stipulation that, in the event of the species of produce being changed, a new engagement shall be executed for the remaining term of the first lease, or for a longer period if agreed on; and in the event of any new species being cultivated, a new engagement, with the like specification and clause, is to be executed accordingly.

57. First. The rents to be paid by the Ryots, by whatever rule or custom they may be regulated, shall be specifically stated in the pottah, which, in every possible case, shall contain the exact sum to be paid by them.

Second. In cases where the rate only can be specified, such as where the rents are adjusted upon a measurement of the lands after cultivation or on a survey of the crop, or where they are made payable in kind, the rate and terms of payment, and proportion of the crop to be delivered, with every condition, shall be clearly specified.

58. Every Zemindar, independent Talookdar or other actual proprietor of land, and every dependent Talookdar, shall prepare the form of a pottah or pottahs, conformably to the rules above prescribed, and adapted to the circumstances of his estate or talook; and after obtaining the Collector's approbation of it (which approbation shall be signified by such officer superscribing the form with his name and official appellation), he is to register a copy of the form or forms in the Dewanny Adawlut of the zillah, and to deposit a copy in each of the principal cutcherries in his estate or talook. Every Ryot shall be entitled to receive corresponding pottahs on application; and no pottahs, of any other form, shall be hereafter held valid.

59. A Ryot, when his rent has been ascertained and settled, may demand a pottah from the actual proprietor of land, dependent Talookdar or farmer, of whom he holds his lands, or from the person acting for him; and any refusal to deliver the pottahs, upon being proved in the court of Dewanny Adawlut of the zillah, shall be punished by the court by a fine, proportioned to the expense and trouble of the Ryot in consequence of such refusal. Actual proprietors of land, dependent Talookdars and farmers, are also required to cause a pottah for the the adjusted rent to be prepared and tendered to the Ryot, either granting the same themselves, or entrusting their agents to grant the same. No farmer, however, without special permission from the proprietor of the lands, or (if the lands form part of a dependent talook) the dependent Talookdar, shall grant a pottah extending beyond the period of his own lease; nor shall any agent grant a pottah without authority from the proprietor or dependent Talookdar, or the manager of disqualified proprietors.

60. First. All leases to under-farmers and Ryots, made previous to the conclusion of the settlement, and not contrary to any regulation, are to remain in force until the period of their expiration, unless proved to have been obtained by collusion, or from persons not authorised to grant them.

Second. No actual proprietor of land or farmer, or persons acting under their authority, shall cancel the pottahs of the khode-khoost Ryots, except upon proof that they have been obtained by collusion, or that the rents paid by them within the last three years have been reduced below the rate of nirkbundy of the pergunnah, or that they have obtained collusive deductions, or upon a general measurement of the pergunnah for the purpose of equalizing and correcting the assessment. The rule contained in this clause is not to be considered applicable to Behar.

61. The proprietor of estates, and the dependent Talookdars and farmers of land in Bengal, are allowed until the end of the Bengal year 1198, and those in Behar and Orissa until the end of the fussily and willaity year 1198, to prepare and deliver pottahs to the Ryots, in conformity to the preceding rules; but after the expiration of the year 1198, no engagements for rent, contrary to those ordered, are to be held valid: and in the event of any claims being preferred by proprietors of estates or dependent Talookdars, farmers, or Ryots, on engagements wherein the consolidation of the assul, abwab, &c. shall appear not to have been made, they are to be nonsuited with costs.

A. D. 1796. REGULATION III.

A Regulation for excluding from the Jurisdiction of the Court of Wards, certain Descriptions of landed Estates belonging to disqualified Landholders; and for declaring the Rules in Section V, Regulation XLIV, 1793, to extend to the cancelling wholly the Leases of those under-Farmers, a part only of the Land included in whose Leases may be sold for Arrears of Revenue.—Passed by the Governor-General in Council, on the 22d April 1796; corresponding with the 13th Bysaak 1203 Bengal era; the 30th Chyte 1203 Fussily; the 13th Bysaak 1203 Willaity; the 30th Chyte 1853 Sumbut; and the 13th Showaul 1210 Higeree.

Regulation III, A. D. 1796.

REGULATION X, 1793, exempting the lands of disqualified proprietors from sale of arrears of public revenue accruing whilst under the management of the Court of Wards, instances have occurred in which individuals have transferred their estates to their minor sons, in order to bring the lands under the jurisdiction of that court. As the admission of transfers of this description would not only be inconsistent with the object of the said Regulation (which was intended for the security of the property of disqualified persons succeeding to estates in the regular course of inheritance, on the demise of the party from whom they might inherit), but would also enable every individual, the revenue assets of whose estate might be diminished by mismanagement, or from other causes, so as to be inadequate to the payment of the public demands, to bring his estate under the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards, by a real or fictitious transfer of it to a minor son, or other disqualified person, and thereby, in fact, not only compel Government to undertake the management of his estate, but also to submit to a loss equivalent to the deficiency in its revenue assets; and doubts having been entertained whether the rules in Section V, Regulation XLIV, 1793, extend to the cancelling wholly the leases of those under-farmers, a part only of the lands included in whose leases are sold for arrears of public revenue; the following rules have been enacted.

inheritance, on the demise of the party from whom they inherit the same; and all landed estates, whether subject to or exempt from the payment of revenue, which have or may become the property of any disqualified landholder, by purchase, gift, or in virtue of any other right, excepting that of inheritance, as aforesaid, are declared exempt from the jurisdiction and authority of the Court of Wards, and if subject to the payment of public revenue, shall be liable to sale for arrears thereof, and all other demands on the part of Government, in the same manner as if the proprietor or proprietors were not under any disqualification. Provided however, that the above rule shall not be construed to extend to exempting from the jurisdiction of the Court of Wards, any lands the property of a disqualified landholder now under their charge, which did not devolve to him or her in the regular course of succession, as aforesaid; nor to subjecting any such lands to sale for arrears of revenue, on account of the period during which they have been, or may be, under the charge of the court; and provided also that it shall be competent to the Governor-General in Council to commit to the charge of the Court of Wards any estate paying revenue to Government, being the sole property of any disqualified person, or of any two or more persons, both or all of whom may be disqualified, although the same shall not have descended to such person or persons in the regular course of inheritance, as aforesaid; and also any lakheraje lands belonging to such proprietor or proprietors, whenever the same shall appear to him for the interests of Government and proprietor or proprietors; and such estate and lands, so committed to the charge of the Court of Wards, shall be exempt from sale for arrears of revenue accruing whilst they shall be under the charge of the court, and shall be considered, in all respects, as far as regards the management of them by the court, the same as if they had devolved to the proprietor or proprietors in the regular course of inheritance as aforesaid, and the proprietor or proprietors shall, in all respects, be treated by the court accordingly.

Exception with respect to lands of other descriptions belonging to disqualified proprietors, which may be now under charge of the court, or which the Governor-General in Council may hereafter commit to the charge of the court, under the power hereby reserved to him.

III. The rules contained in Section V, Regulation XLIV, 1793, are hereby declared to extend to the cancelling wholly the leases of those under-farmers, a part only of the lands included in whose leases may be sold for a discharge of arrears of public revenue.

Board of Commissioners.

To the Honourable N. B. Edmonstone, Esq. Vice-President in Council, Fort William.

Honourable Sir:

Letter from the Board of Commissioners, 30th May 1815.

1. Having maturely considered the extract of a letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors, dated 29th January 1813, transmitted to us with the Chief Secretary's letter of the 11th September 1813, we have now the honour to lay before Government such remarks and suggestions as occur to us on the subject.

2. The recognition of the right of property in the Zemindars, at the first introduction of the British Government into the Ceded and Conquered Provinces, the legislative enactments declaratory of such recognition, and the successive settlements made, in consequence, with the Zemindars, as actual proprietors of the soil, have left it no longer in the option of Government to recur to the cultivators of the soil, and to introduce the system of Ryotwarry settlements as a general measure. The adoption of it is, therefore, confined to those few instances, where no obstacle is opposed by the undeniable claim of the Zemindar, in consequence either of his declining to engage or of his being excluded under any particular circumstances, or of no Zemindar being known and forthcoming. In the former instances, the measure can only be considered as a temporary alternative, in lieu of the usual recourse to a farmer, since the re-entry of the Zemindar is secured to him by law, on the expectation of the short period to which the orders of the Honourable Court of Directors have restricted all leases, on the cessation of the particular grounds of exclusion. In the latter instance, a recourse to the measure will be frequently barred, by the preferable right which the regulations for the formation of the original settlement in these provinces have vested in the farmers of the first settlement to a renewal of these engagements ad infinitum, where no better title may be forthcoming.

3. The permanent settlement in the province of Benares with the Zemindars, as proprietors of the soil, and the right of re-entry on the Tushkees Jumma, at the expiration or avoidance of the lease, in all lands originally let to farm, which is secured by law to the ousted Zemindars, preclude the adoption of a ryotwarry settlement, in any instance except where no zemindarry claim may be forthcoming to a lapsed farm.

4. In all cases of the exclusion of the Zemindar, in consequence of his refusal to engage on the terms demandable from him under the provisions of the existing Regulations, a further obstacle arises to the introduction of a ryotwarry settlement, from the difficulty of inducing the tenants to come forward. Independently of any attachment on their part towards the Zemindar, or of any disinclination in them to contribute directly to his exclusion, they are sufficiently awake to and provident of their own individual interests, not to run the risk of incurring his future resentment by engaging directly with Government in opposition to his wishes.

5. The occasional instances of the collection of the rents from the tenants directly by the officers of Government, in case of the attachment of an estate preparatory to the sale of it, or in consequence of a precept from the courts of judicature, do not offer an opportunity for the introductiou of a ryotwarry settlement, as the connection between Government and the tenants is only temporary, and the Regulations have already prescribed the terms on which the rents of such estates are to be collected. But the invariable result of the direct interference of the officers of Government, in the collection of the mofussil rent of each individual jotedar, in all such instances, may furnish grounds for estimating the probable failure of every arrangement of minute detail, where the ministry of native agents may be necessary: and however few the instances in which a ryotwarry settlement can be adopted, the ministry of native agents, in the present constitution of the revenue branch of service in these provinces, appears unavoidable.

6. Some instances have, indeed, occurred, and may occur again, while the assessment of these provinces is not declared permanent, in which the ryotwarry settlement on a large scale might be introduced. The instances here alluded to are some large estates, the proprietors of which have been disqualified by minority or mental incapacity; the pergunnah of Khyragurh, and some considerable talooks which have become the property of Government by purchase on their exposure to sale. But the impossibility of the Collector, consistently with his other very important avocations, superintending personally the adjustment of the mofussil jummabundy, mussahut, nuzerandaz, and kunkoot, at two or three periodical returns in each year, has induced a recourse, in preference, to the system of mouzawarree or mokudumee settlements, by leasing such village separately, or any cluster of connected villages, to the Mokuddum or principal resident tenant, on specific engagements for a term of years. The successful result of this plan, particularly in the punctual realization of the rents during five years, in the extensive estate of the disqualified proprietor of mauda, to the amount of four lacks of rupees annually, on a village settlement formed by Mr. Christian, will be a sufficient proof of the solidity of mokuddumee arrangements.

7. The same impossibility of a direct superintendence, on the part of the Collector, in a few khas villages dispersed through every pergunnah of his jurisdiction, has led to the adoption of the same system of mokuddumee settlement, in every practicable instance where the party entitled to engage may have declined it, or where no party possessed of a preferable title to engage may be forthcoming. But, in the former cases, the same difficulties occur in drawing forth the Mokuddums to engage directly with Government, as have been already noticed in regard to the tenants of recusing Zemindars; and without the the occasional resource of farmers, competent by their capital and industry of counteracting the influence of the Zemindar over the fears of his tenants, Government must be left wholly at the mercy of the landed proprietors in regard to the terms of the settlement.

8. The success of a ryotwarry settlement appears to depend altogether on European agency, and the efficacy of such agency must depend on the contraction of the sphere of its superintendence. No arguments can be requisite to prove that the same energy of supervision cannot be extended to a district of twenty-five lacks, which may be exercised in a single pergunnah; and although the nature of the landed tenures in these provinces, as established by law, does not admit of the general introduction of ryotwarry settlements, a similar multiplication of European agency would, even in the present state of landed property, be productive of the greatest benefits, both to Government and to the Public, in the suppression of those abuses to which all native ministry is liable. To judge by the experience of six years, the punishment of a convicted Tehsildar appears to have no effect in deterring even his immediate successor from following the same course of peculation.
